SPAIN.—PROHIBITORY OF ILLEGAL EXPEDITIONS IN THE UNITED STATES.

BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

A PROCLAMATION.

WHEREAS information has been received that sundry persons, citizens of the United States, or residents within the same, and especially within the State of Louisiana, are conspiring together to begin and set on foot, provide, and prepare the means for a military expedition or enterprise against the dominions of Spain, with which the United States are happily at peace; that, for this purpose, they are collecting arms, military stores, provisions, vessels, and other means; and deceiving and seducing honest and well-meaning citizens to engage in their unlawful enterprises; or organizing, officering, and arming themselves for the same, contrary to the laws in such cases made and provided: I have therefore thought fit to issue this my proclamation, warning and enjoining all faithful citizens, who have been led, without due knowledge or consideration, to participate in the said unlawful enterprises, to withdraw from the same without delay; and commanding all persons whatsoever engaged or concerned in the same to cease all further proceedings therein, as they will answer the contrary at their peril. And I hereby enjoin and require all officers civil and military of the United States, or of any of the States or Territories, all judges, justices, and other officers of the peace, all military officers of the army or navy of the United States, and officers of the militia, to be vigilant, each within his respective department, and according to his functions, in searching out and bringing to punishment all persons engaged or concerned in such enterprises; in seizing and detaining, subject to the disposition of the law, all arms, military stores, vessels, or other means provided or providing for the same; and, in general, in preventing the carrying on such expedition or enterprise, by all the lawful means within their power: and I require all good and faithful citizens and others, within the United States, to be aiding and assisting herein; and especially in the discovery, apprehension, and bringing to justice of all such offenders; in preventing the execution of their unlawful combinations or designs; and in giving information against them to the proper authorities.

In testimony whereof, I have caused the seal of the United States of America to be affixed to these presents, [L. S.] and signed the same with my hand. Done at the city of Washington, the first day of September, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and fifteen, and of the independence of the said United States of America the fortieth.

JAMES MONROE, Secretary of State.

14th CONGRESS.] No. 278. [1st SESSION.

MESSAGE AT THE COMMENCEMENT OF THE FOURTEENTH CONGRESS, FIRST SESSION.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, DECEMBER 5, 1815.

Fellow-citizens of the Senate and of the House of Representatives: WASHINGTON, December 5, 1815.

I have the satisfaction, on our present meeting, of being able to communicate to you the successful termination of the war which had been commenced against the United States by the regency of Algiers. The squadron in advance on that service, under Commodore Decatur, lost not a moment, after its arrival in the Mediterranean, in seeking the naval force of the enemy then cruising in that sea, and succeeded in capturing two of his ships—one of them the principal ship, commanded by the Algerine admiral. The high character of the American commander was brilliantly sustained on the occasion, who brought his own ship into close action with that of his adversary, as was the accustomed gallantry of all the officers and men actually engaged. Having prepared the way by this demonstration of American skill and prowess, he hastened to the port of Algiers, where peace was promptly yielded to his victorious force. In the terms stipulated, the rights and honor of the United States were particularly consulted, by a perpetual relinquishment, on the part of the Dey, of all pretensions to tribute from them. The impressions which have thus been made, strengthened as they will have been by subsequent transactions with the regencies of Tunis and of Tripoli, by the appearance of the larger force which followed under Commodore Bainbridge, the chief in command of the expedition, and by the judicious precautionary arrangements left by him in that quarter, afford a reasonable prospect of future security for the valuable portion of our commerce which passes within reach of the Barbary cruisers.

It is another source of satisfaction that the treaty of peace with Great Britain has been succeeded by a convention on the subject of commerce, concluded by the plenipotentiaries of the two countries. In this result a disposition is manifested on the part of that nation corresponding with the disposition of the United States, which, it may be hoped, will be improved into liberal arrangements on other subjects, on which the parties have mutual interests, or which might endanger their future harmony. Congress will decide on the expediency of promoting such a sequel, by giving effect to the measure of confining the American navigation to American seamen—a measure which, at the same time that it might have that conciliatory tendency, would have the further advantage of increasing the independence of our navigation, and the resources for our maritime defence.

In conformity with the articles in the treaty of Ghent relating to the Indians, as well as with a view to the tranquillity of our western and northwestern frontiers, measures were taken to establish an immediate peace with the several tribes who had been engaged in hostilities against the United States. Such of them as were invited to Detroit acceded readily to a renewal of the former treaties of friendship. Of the other tribes, who were invited to a station on the Mississippi, the greater number have also accepted the peace offered to them. The residue, consisting of the more distant tribes or parts of tribes, remain to be brought over by further explanations, or by such other means as may be adapted to the dispositions they may finally disclose.

The Indian tribes within and bordering on the southern frontier, whom a cruel war on their part had compelled us to chastise into peace, have latterly shown a restlessness which has called for preparatory measures for repressing it, and for protecting the commissioners engaged in carrying the terms of the peace into execution.

The execution of the act for fixing the military peace establishment has been attended with difficulties which even now can only be overcome by legislative aid. The selection of officers; the payment and discharge of the troops enlisted for the war; the payment of the retained troops, and their re-union from detached and distant stations; the collection and security of the public property in the Quartermaster, Commissary, and Ordnance Departments; and the constant medical assistance required in hospitals and garrisons, rendered a complete execution of the act impracticable on the 1st of May, the period more immediately contemplated. As soon, however, as circumstances would permit, and as far as it has been practicable, consistently with the public interests, the reduction of the army has been accomplished. But the appropriations for its pay and for other branches of the military service having proved inadequate, the earliest attention to that subject will be necessary; and the expediency of continuing upon the peace establishment the staff officers who have hitherto been provisionally retained is also recommended to the consideration of Congress.

In the performance of the executive duty upon this occasion, there has not been wanting a just sensibility to the merits of the American army during the late war; but the obvious policy and design in fixing an efficient military peace establishment did not afford an opportunity to distinguish the aged and infirm, on account of their past services; nor the wounded and disabled, on account of their present sufferings. The extent of the reduction, indeed, unavoidably involved the exclusion of many meritorious officers of every rank from the service of their country; and so equal as well as so numerous were the claims to attention, that a decision by the standard of comparative merit could seldom be attained. Judged, however, in candor, by a general standard of positive merit, the Army Register will, it is believed, do honor to the establishment; while the ease of those officers whose names are not included in it devolves, with the strongest interest, upon the legislative authority, for such provision as shall be deemed the best calculated to give support and solace to the veteran and the invalid; to display the beneficence as well as the justice of the Government; and to inspire a martial zeal for the public service upon every future emergency.

Although the embarrassments arising from the want of a uniform national currency have not been diminished since the adjournment of Congress, great satisfaction has been derived in contemplating the revival of the public credit, and the efficiency of the public resources. The receipts into the Treasury, from the various branches of revenue, during the nine months ending on the 30th of September last, have been estimated at $12,500,000; the issues of Treasury notes of every denomination, during the same period, amounted to the sum of $14,000,000; and there was also obtained upon loan, during the same period, a sum of $9,000,000, of which the sum of $6,000,000 was subscribed in cash, and the sum of $3,000,000 in Treasury notes. With these means, added to the sum of $1,500,000, being the balance of money in the Treasury on the 1st of January, there has been paid, between the 1st of January and the 1st of October, on account of the appropriations of the preceding and of the present year, (exclusively of the amount of the Treasury notes subscribed to the loan, and of the amount redeemed in the payment of duties and taxes,) the aggregate sum of $33,500,000, leaving a balance then in the Treasury estimated at the sum of $3,000,000. Independent, however, of the arrearages due for military services and supplies, it is presumed that a further sum of $5,000,000, including the interest on the public debt payable on the 1st of January next, will be demanded at the Treasury to complete the expenditures of the present year, and for which the existing ways and means will sufficiently provide.

The national debt, as it was ascertained on the 1st of October last, amounted, in the whole, to the sum of $120,000,000, consisting of the unredeemed balance of the debt contracted before the late war, ($39,000,000,) the amount of the funded debt contracted in consequence of the war, ($64,000,000,) and the amount of the unfunded and floating debt, including the various issues of Treasury notes, ($17,000,000,) which is in a gradual course of payment. There will probably be some addition to the public debt, upon the liquidation of various claims which are depending; and a conciliatory disposition on the part of Congress may lead honorably and advantageously to an equitable arrangement of the militia expenses incurred by the several States, without the previous sanction or authority of the Government of the United States. But when it is considered that the new as well as the old portion of the debt has been contracted in the assertion of the national rights and independence; and when it is recollected that the public expenditures, not being exclusively bestowed upon subjects of a transient nature, will long be visible in the number and equipments of the American navy, in the military works for the defence of our harbors and our frontiers, and in the supplies of our arsenals and magazines, the amount will bear a gratifying comparison with the objects which have been attained, as well as with the resources of the country.

The arrangements of the finances, with a view to the receipts and expenditures of a permanent peace establishment, will necessarily enter into the deliberations of Congress during the present session. It is true that the improved condition of the public revenue will not only afford the means of maintaining the faith of the Government with its creditors inviolate, and of prosecuting successfully the measures of the most liberal policy, but will also justify an immediate alleviation of the burdens imposed by the necessities of the war. It is, however, essential to every modification of the finances, that the benefits of a uniform national currency should be restored to the community. The absence of the precious metals will, it is believed, be a temporary evil; but, until they can again be rendered the general medium of exchange, it devolves on the wisdom of Congress to provide a substitute, which shall equally engage the confidence and accommodate the wants of the citizens throughout the Union. If the operation of the State banks cannot produce this result, the probable operation of a national bank will merit consideration; and, if neither of these expedients be deemed effectual, it may become necessary to ascertain the terms upon which the notes of the Government (no longer required as an instrument of credit) shall be issued, upon motives of general policy, as a common medium of circulation.

Notwithstanding the security for future repose which the United States ought to find in their love of peace, and their constant respect for the rights of other nations, the character of the times particularly inculcates the lesson that, whether to prevent or repel danger, we ought not to be unprepared for it. This consideration will sufficiently recommend to Congress a liberal provision for the immediate extension and gradual completion of the works of defence, both fixed and floating, on our maritime frontier; and an adequate provision for guarding our inland frontier against dangers to which certain portions of it may continue to be exposed.

As an improvement in our military establishment, it will deserve the consideration of Congress, whether a corps of invalids might not be so organized and employed as at once to give support to meritorious individuals, excluded by age or infirmities from the existing establishment, and to preserve to the public the benefit of their stationary services and of their exemplary discipline. I recommend, also, an enlargement of the Military Academy already established, and the establishment of others in other sections of the Union. And I cannot press too much on the attention of Congress such a classification and organization of the militia as will most effectually render it the safeguard of a free State. If experience has shown, in the recent splendid achievements of militia, the value of this resource for the public defence, it has shown also the importance of that skill in the use of arms, and that familiarity with the essential rules of discipline, which cannot be expected from the regulations now in force. With this subject is intimately connected the necessity of accommodating the laws, in every respect, to the great object of enabling the political authority of the Union to employ promptly and effectually the physical power of the Union in the case designated by the constitution.

The signal services which have been rendered by our navy, and the capacities it has developed for successful co-operation in the national defence, will give to that portion of the public force its full value in the eyes of Congress, at an epoch which calls for the constant vigilance of all Governments. To preserve the ships now in sound state, to complete those already contemplated, to provide amply the imperishable materials for prompt augmentations, and to improve the existing arrangements into more advantageous establishments, for the construction, the repairs, and the security of vessels of war, is dictated by the soundest policy.

In adjusting the duties on imports to the object of revenue, the influence of the tariff on manufactures will necessarily present itself for consideration. However wise the theory may be which leaves to the sagacity and interest of individuals the application of their industry and resources, there are in this, as in other cases, exceptions to the general rule. Besides the condition which the theory itself implies, of a reciprocal adoption by other nations, experience teaches that so many circumstances must concur in introducing and maturing manufacturing establishments, especially of the more complicated kinds, that a country may remain long without them, although sufficiently advanced, and in some respects even peculiarly fitted for carrying them on with success. Under circumstances giving a powerful impulse to manufacturing industry, it has made among us a progress, and exhibited an efficiency, which justify the belief that, with a protection not more than is due to the enterprising citizens whose interests are now at stake, it will become, at an early day, not only safe against occasional competitions from abroad, but a source of domestic wealth, and even of external commerce. In selecting the branches more especially entitled to the public patronage, a preference is obviously claimed by such as will relieve the United States from a dependance on foreign supplies, ever subject to casual failures, for articles necessary for the public defence, or connected with the primary wants of individuals. It will be an additional recommendation of particular manufactures where the materials for them are extensively drawn from our agriculture, and consequently impart and insure to that great fund of national prosperity and independence an encouragement which cannot fail to be rewarded.

Among the means of advancing the public interest, the occasion is a proper one for recalling the attention of Congress to the great importance of establishing throughout our country the roads and canals which can best be executed under the national authority. No objects within the circle of political economy so richly repay the expense bestowed on them; there are none, the utility of which is more universally ascertained and acknowledged, none that do more honor to the Governments whose wise and enlarged patriotism duly appreciates them. Nor is there any country which presents a field where nature invites more the art of man to complete her own work for his accommodation and benefit. These considerations are strengthened, moreover, by the political effect of these facilities for intercommunication, in bringing and binding more closely together the various parts of our extended confederacy. Whilst the States, individually, with a laudable enterprise and emulation, avail themselves of their local advantages, by new roads, by navigable canals, and by improving the streams susceptible of navigation, the General Government is the more urged to similar undertakings requiring a national jurisdiction and national means, by the prospect of thus systematically completing so inestimable a work. And it is a happy reflection, that any defect of constitutional authority which may be encountered can be supplied in a mode which the constitution itself has providently pointed out.

The present is a favorable season, also, for bringing again into view the establishment of a national seminary of learning within the District of Columbia, and with means drawn from the property therein, subject to the authority of the General Government. Such an institution claims the patronage of Congress, as a monument of their solicitude for the advancement of knowledge, without which the blessings of liberty cannot be fully enjoyed or long preserved; as a model instructive in the formation of other seminaries; as a nursery of enlightened preceptors; and as a central resort of youth and genius from every part of their country, diffusing on their return examples of those national feelings, those liberal sentiments, and those congenial manners, which contribute cement to our Union, and strength to the great political fabric of which that is the foundation.

In closing this communication, I ought not to repress a sensibility, in which you will unite, to the happy lot of our country, and the goodness of a superintending Providence to whom we are indebted for it. Whilst other portions of mankind are laboring under the distresses of war, or struggling with adversity in other forms, the United States are in the tranquil enjoyment of prosperous and honorable peace. In reviewing the scenes through which it has been attained, we can rejoice in the proofs given that our political institutions, founded in human rights, and framed for their preservation, are equal to the severest trials of war, as well as adapted to the ordinary periods of repose. As fruits of this experience, and of the reputation acquired by the American arms, on the land and on the water, the nation finds itself possessed of a growing respect abroad, and of a just confidence in itself, which are among the best pledges for its peaceful career. Under other aspects of our country, the strongest features of its flourishing condition are seen in a population rapidly increasing on a territory as productive as it is extensive; in a general industry, and fertile ingenuity, which find their ample rewards; and in an affluent revenue, which admits a reduction of the public burdens, without withdrawing the means of sustaining the public credit, of gradually discharging the public debt, of providing for the necessary defensive and precautionary establishments, and of patronizing, in every authorized mode, undertakings conducive to the aggregate wealth and individual comfort of our citizens.

It remains for the guardians of the public welfare to persevere in that justice and good will towards other nations which invite a return of these sentiments towards the United States; to cherish institutions which guaranty their safety, and their liberties, civil and religious; and to combine with a liberal system of foreign commerce an improvement of the national advantages, and a protection and extension of the independent resources of our highly favored and happy country.

In all measures having such objects my faithful co-operation will be afforded.

JAMES MADISON.

14th CONGRESS.] No. 279. [1st SESSION.

ALGIERS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, DECEMBER 6, 1815.

To the Senate of the United States: WASHINGTON, December 6, 1815.

I lay before the Senate, for their consideration and advice, as to a ratification, a treaty of peace with the Dey of Algiers, concluded on the 30th day of June, 1815; with a letter relating to the same from the American commissioners to the Secretary of State.

JAMES MADISON.

Treaty of peace and amity concluded between the United States of America and His Highness Omar Bashaw, Dey of Algiers.

ART. 1. There shall be, from the conclusion of this treaty, a firm, inviolable, and universal peace and friendship between the President and citizens of the United States of America, on the one part, and the Dey and subjects of the regency of Algiers in Barbary, on the other, made by the free consent of both parties, and on the terms of the most favored nations: and if either party shall, hereafter, grant to any other nation any particular favor or privilege in navigation or commerce, it shall immediately become common to the other party—freely, when it is freely granted to such other nations; but when the grant is conditional, it shall be at the option of the contracting parties to accept, alter, or reject such conditions, in such manner as shall be most conductive to their respective interests.

ART. 2. It is distinctly understood between the contracting parties, that no tribute, either as biennial presents, or under any other form or name whatever, shall ever be required by the Dey and regency of Algiers from the United States of America, on any pretext whatever.

ART. 3. The Dey of Algiers shall cause to be immediately delivered up to the American squadron now off Algiers all the American citizens now in his possession, amounting to ten, more or less; and all the subjects of the Dey of Algiers now in possession of the United States, amounting to five hundred, more or less, shall be delivered up to him; the United States, according to the usages of civilized nations, requiring no ransom for the excess of prisoners in their favor.

ART. 4. A just and full compensation shall be made by the Dey of Algiers to such citizens of the United States as have been captured and detained by Algerine cruisers, or who have been forced to abandon their property in Algiers, in violation of the twenty-second article of the treaty of peace and amity concluded between the United States and the Dey of Algiers on the 5th of September, 1795.

And it is agreed between the contracting parties, that, in lieu of the above, the Dey of Algiers shall cause to be delivered, forthwith, into the hands of the American consul residing at Algiers, the whole of a quantity of bales of cotton left by the late consul general of the United States in the public magazines in Algiers; and that he shall pay into the hands of the said consul the sum of ten thousand Spanish dollars.

ART. 5. If any goods belonging to any nation with which either of the parties are at war should be loaded on board vessels belonging to the other party, they shall pass free and unmolested, and no attempts shall be made to take or detain them.

ART. 6. If any citizens or subjects, with their effects, belonging to either party, shall be found on board a prize vessel taken from an enemy by the other party, such citizens or subjects shall be liberated immediately; and in no case, or on any pretence whatever, shall any American citizen be kept in captivity or confinement, or the property of any American citizen found on board of any vessel belonging to any other nation with which Algiers may be at war be detained from its lawful owners, after the exhibition of sufficient proofs of American citizenship and of American property by the consul of the United States residing at Algiers.

ART. 7. Proper passports shall immediately be given to the vessels of both the contracting parties, on condition that the vessels of war belonging to the regency of Algiers, on meeting with merchant vessels belonging to the citizens of the United States of America, shall not be permitted to visit them with more than two persons besides the rowers; these only shall be permitted to go on board, without first obtaining leave from the commander of said vessel, who shall compare the passport, and immediately permit said vessel to proceed on her voyage; and should any of the subjects of Algiers insult or molest the commander, or any other person, on board a vessel so visited, or plunder any of the property contained in her, on complaint being made by the consul of the United States residing in Algiers, and on his producing sufficient proof to substantiate the fact, the commander or rais of said Algerine ship or vessel of war, as well as the offenders, shall be punished in the most exemplary manner.

All vessels of war belonging to the United States of America, on meeting a cruiser belonging to the regency of Algiers, or having seen her passports and certificates from the consul of the United States residing in Algiers, shall permit her to proceed on her cruise unmolested, and without detention. No passports shall be granted by either party to any vessels but such as are absolutely the property of citizens or subjects of the said contracting parties, on any pretence whatever.

ART. 8. A citizen or subject of either of the contracting parties having bought a prize vessel condemned by the other party, or by any other nation, the certificate of condemnation and bill of sale shall be a sufficient passport for such vessel for six months, which, considering the distance between the two countries, is no more than a reasonable time for her to procure proper passports.

ART. 9. Vessels of either of the contracting parties, putting into ports of the other, and having need of provisions or other supplies, shall be furnished at the market price; and if any such vessel should so put in from a distance at sea, and have occasion to repair, she shall be at liberty to land and re-embark her cargo, without paying any customs or duties whatever; but in no case shall she be compelled to land her cargo.

ART. 10. Should a vessel of either of the contracting parties be cast on shore within the territories of the other, all proper assistance shall be given to her crew; no pillage shall be allowed; the property shall remain at the disposal of the owners; and, if re-shipped on board of any vessel for exportation, no customs or duties whatever shall be required to be paid thereon; and the crew shall be protected and succored, until they can be sent to their own country.

ART. 11. If a vessel of either of the contracting parties shall be attacked by an enemy within cannon-shot of the forts of the other, she shall be protected as much as is possible. If she be in port, she shall not be seized or attacked, when it is in the power of the other party to protect her; and when she proceeds to sea, no enemy shall be permitted to pursue her from the same port within twenty-four hours after her departure.

ART. 12. The commerce between the United States of America and the regency of Algiers, the protections to be given to merchants, masters of vessels, and seamen, the reciprocal rights of establishing consuls in each country, and the privileges, immunities, and jurisdictions to be enjoyed by such consuls, are declared to be on the same footing, in every respect, with the most favored nations, respectively.

ART. 13. The consul of the United States of America shall not be responsible for the debts contracted by citizens of his own nation, unless he previously gives written obligations so to do.

ART. 14. On a vessel or vessels of war belonging to the United States anchoring before the city of Algiers, the consul is to inform the Dey of her arrival, when she shall receive the salutes which are, by treaty or custom, given to the ships of war of the most favored nations on similar occasions, and which shall be returned, gun for gun; and if, after such arrival, so announced, any Christians whatsoever, captives in Algiers, make their escape and take refuge on board any of the ships of war, they shall not be required back again; nor shall the consul of the United States or commanders of said ships be required to pay any thing for the said Christians.

ART. 15. As the Government of the United States of America has, in itself, no character of enmity against the laws, religion, or tranquillity of any nation; and as the said States have never entered into any voluntary war, or act of hostility, except in defence of their just rights on the high seas, it is declared by the contracting parties, that no pretext arising from religious opinions shall ever produce an interruption of the harmony existing between the two nations; and the consuls and agents of both nations shall have liberty to celebrate the rites of their respective religions in their own houses.

The consuls, respectively, shall have liberty and personal security given them to travel within the territories of each other, both by land and sea; and shall not be prevented from going on board any vessels they may think proper to visit; they shall likewise have liberty to appoint their own dragoman and broker.

ART. 16. In case of any dispute arising from the violation of any of the articles of this treaty, no appeal shall be made to arms, nor shall war be declared, on any pretext whatever; but, if the consul residing at the place where the dispute shall happen shall not be able to settle the same, the Government of that country shall state their grievance in writing, and transmit the same to the Government of the other; and the period of three months shall be allowed for answers to be returned, during which time no act of hostility shall be permitted by either party; and, in case the grievances are not redressed, and a war should be the event, the consuls and citizens or subjects of both parties, respectively, shall be permitted to embark with their effects unmolested, on board of what vessel or vessels they shall think proper, reasonable time being allowed for that purpose.

ART. 17. If, in the course of events, a war should break out between the two nations, the prisoners captured by either party shall not be made slaves; they shall not be forced to hard labor, or other confinement than such as may be necessary to secure their safe keeping, and shall be exchanged rank for rank; and it is agreed that prisoners shall be exchanged in twelve months after their capture; and the exchange may be effected by any private individual legally authorized by either of the parties.

ART. 18. If any of the Barbary States, or other Powers at war with the United States, shall capture any American vessel and send her into any port of the regency of Algiers, they shall not be permitted to sell her, but shall be forced to depart the port on procuring the requisite supplies of provisions; but the vessels of war of the United States, with any prizes they may capture from their enemies, shall have liberty to frequent the ports of Algiers for refreshment of any kinds, and to sell such prizes in the said ports, without any other customs or duties than such as are customary on ordinary commercial importations.

ART. 19. If any of the citizens of the United States, or any persons under their protection, shall have any disputes with each other, the consul shall decide between the parties; and whenever the consul shall require any aid or assistance from the Government of Algiers to enforce his decision, it shall be immediately granted to him; and if any disputes shall arise between any citizens of the United States and the citizens or subjects of any other nation having a consul or agent in Algiers, such disputes shall be settled by the consuls or agents of the respective nations; and any disputes or suits at law that may take place between any citizens of the United States and the subjects of the regency of Algiers shall be decided by the Dey in person, and no other.

ART. 20. If a citizen of the United States should kill, wound, or strike a subject of Algiers; or, on the contrary, a subject of Algiers should kill, wound, or strike a citizen of the United States, the law of the country shall take place, and equal justice shall be rendered, the consul assisting at the trial; but the sentence of punishment against an American citizen shall not be greater or more severe than it would be against a Turk in the same predicament. And if any delinquent should make his escape, the consul shall not be responsible for him, in any manner whatever.

ART. 21. The consul of the United States of America shall not be required to pay any customs or duties whatever on any thing he imports from a foreign country for the use of his house and family.

ART. 22. Should any of the citizens of the United States of America die within the limits of the regency of Algiers, the Dey and his subjects shall not interfere with the property of the deceased, but it shall be under the immediate direction of the consul, unless otherwise disposed of by will. Should there be no consul, the effects shall be deposited in the hands of some person worthy of trust, until the party shall appear who has a right to demand them, when he shall render an account of the property; neither shall the Dey nor his subjects give hindrance in the execution of any will that may appear.

ON BOARD THE UNITED STATES SHIP GUERRIERE, July 6, 1815.

I certify the foregoing to be a true copy of a treaty of peace negotiated by Commodore Decatur and myself with the regency of Algiers, and signed by the Dey of that regency on the 30th June, 1815.

WILLIAM SHALER.

SIR: UNITED STATES SHIP GUERRIERE, BAY OF ALGIERS, July 4, 1815.

We have the honor to refer you to the official reports of Commodore Decatur to the Navy Department, for an account of the operations of this squadron previous to our arrival off Algiers, on the 28th ultimo.

Having received information that the Algerine squadron had been at sea for a considerable time longer than that to which their cruises usually extend, and that a despatch boat had been sent from Gibraltar to Algiers to inform them of our arrival in the Mediterranean, we thought that they might have made a harbor where they would be in safety. We, therefore, whilst they were in this state of uncertainty, believed it a proper moment to deliver the President's letter, agreeably to our instructions. Accordingly, on the 29th ultimo, a flag of truce was hoisted on board the Guerriere, with the Swedish flag at the main. A boat came off about noon, with Mr. Norderling, consul of Sweden, and the captain of the port, who confirmed the intelligence we had before received, and to whom we communicated information of the capture of their frigate and brig. The impression made by these events was visible and deep. We were requested by the captain of the port (Mr. Norderling declaring he was not authorized to act) to state the conditions on which we would make peace; to which we replied by giving the letter of the President to the Dey, and by a note from us to him; a copy of which (No. 1) we have the honor to transmit herewith. The captain of the port then requested that hostilities should cease pending the negotiation, and that persons authorized to treat should go on shore; he and Mr. Norderling both affirming that the Minister of Marine had pledged himself for our security and return to our ships when we pleased. Both these propositions were rejected, and they were explicitly informed that the negotiation must be carried on on board the fleet, and that hostilities, as far as they respected vessels, could not cease. They returned on shore. On the following day the same persons returned, and informed us that they were commissioned by the Dey to treat with us on the proposed basis, and their anxiety appeared extreme to conclude the peace immediately. We then brought forward the model of a treaty, which we declared would not be departed from in substance; at the same time declaring that, although the United States would never stipulate for paying tribute under any form whatever, yet, that they were a magnanimous and generous nation, who would, upon the presentation of consuls, do what was customary with other great nations in their friendly intercourse with Algiers. The treaty was then examined, and they were of opinion that it would not be agreed to in its present form, and particularly requested that the article requiring the restitution of the property they had captured, and which had been distributed, might be expunged; alleging that such a demand had never before been made upon Algiers. To this it was answered that the claim was just, and would be adhered to. They then asked whether, if the treaty should be signed by the Dey, we would engage to restore the captured vessels? which we refused. They then represented that it was not the present Dey who had declared the war, which they acknowledged to be unjust; conceding that they were wholly in the wrong, and had no excuse whatever; requesting, however, that we would take the case of the Dey into consideration, and, upon his agreeing to terms with us, more favorable than had ever been made with any other nation, to restore the ships, which they stated would be of little or no value to us, but would be of great importance to him, as they would satisfy the people with the conditions of the peace we were going to conclude with him.

We consulted upon this question, and determined that, considering the state of those vessels, the sums that would be required to fit them for a passage to the United States, and the little probability of selling them in this part of the world, we would make a compliment of them to His Highness in the state they then were; the commodore engaging to furnish them with an escort to this port. This, however, would depend upon their signing the treaty as presented to them, and could not appear as an article of it, but must be considered as a favor conferred on the Dey by the United States.

They then requested a truce, to deliberate upon the terms of the proposed treaty, which was refused; they even pleaded for three hours. The reply was, "not a minute; if your squadron appears in sight before the treaty is actually signed by the Dey, and the prisoners sent off, ours would capture them." It was finally agreed that hostilities should cease when we perceived their boat coming off with a white flag hoisted, the Swedish consul pledging his word of honor not to hoist it unless the treaty was signed, and the prisoners in the boat. They returned on shore, and, although the distance was full five miles, they came back within three hours, with the treaty signed as we had concluded it, and the prisoners.

During the interval of their absence a corvette appeared in sight, which would have been captured if they had been detained one hour longer. The treaty has since been drawn out anew, translated by them, and duly executed by the Dey; which we have the honor to transmit herewith.

Mr. Shaler has since been on shore, and the cotton and money mentioned in the fourth article have been given up to him. They now show every disposition to maintain a sincere peace with us, which is, doubtless, owing to the dread of our arms; and we take this occasion to remark that, in our opinion, the only secure guaranty we can have for the maintenance of the peace just concluded with these people is, the presence in the Mediterranean of a respectable naval force.

As this treaty appears to us to secure every interest within the contemplation of the Government, and as it really places the United States on higher grounds than any other nation, we have no hesitation, on our part, in fulfilling such of its provisions as are within our power, in the firm belief that it will receive the ratification of the President and Senate.

We have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your obedient servants,

STEPHEN DECATUR,
WILLIAM SHALER.

The Hon. JAMES MONROE, Secretary of State.

No. 1.

The American Commissioners to the Dey of Algiers.

The undersigned have the honor to inform His Highness the Dey of Algiers that they have been appointed by the President of the United States of America, commissioners plenipotentiary to treat of peace with His Highness; and that, pursuant to their instructions, they are ready to open a negotiation for the restoration of peace and harmony between the two countries, on terms just and honorable to both parties; and they feel it incumbent on them to state, explicitly, to His Highness, that they are instructed to treat upon no other principle than that of perfect equality, and on the terms of the most favored nations: no stipulation for paying any tribute to Algiers, under any form whatever, will be agreed to.

The undersigned have the honor to transmit, herewith, a letter from the President of the United States; and they avail themselves of this occasion to assure His Highness of their high consideration and profound respect.

STEPHEN DECATUR,
WILLIAM SHALER.

14th CONGRESS.] No. 280. [1st SESSION.

GREAT BRITAIN—COMMERCIAL CONVENTION.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, DECEMBER 6, 1815.

To the Senate of the United States: WASHINGTON, December 6, 1815.

I lay before the Senate, for their consideration and advice, as to a ratification, a convention to regulate the commerce between the United States and Great Britain, signed by their respective plenipotentiaries on the 3d of July last, with letters relating to the same, from the American plenipotentiaries to the Secretary of State; and also the declaration with which it is the intention of the British Government to accompany the exchange of the ratifications of the convention.

JAMES MADISON.

A convention to regulate the commerce between the territories of the United States and His Britannic Majesty.

The United States of America and His Britannic Majesty, being desirous, by a convention, to regulate the commerce and navigation between their respective countries, territories, and people, in such manner as to render the same reciprocally beneficial and satisfactory, have respectively named plenipotentiaries, and given them full powers to treat of and conclude such convention: that is to say, the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof, hath appointed for their plenipotentiaries John Quincy Adams, Henry Clay, and Albert Gallatin, citizens of the United States; and His Royal Highness the Prince Regent, acting in the name and on the behalf of His Majesty, has named for his plenipotentiaries the right honorable Frederick John Robinson, vice-president of the committee of privy council for trade and plantations, joint paymaster of His Majesty's forces, and a member of the Imperial Parliament; Henry Goulburn, Esq., a member of the Imperial Parliament, and under Secretary of State; and William Adams, Esq., doctor of civil laws: and the said plenipotentiaries, having mutually produced and shown their said full powers, and exchanged copies of the same, have agreed on and concluded the following articles, viz:

ART. 1. There shall be, between the territories of the United States of America and all the territories of His Britannic Majesty in Europe, a reciprocal liberty of commerce. The inhabitants of the two countries, respectively, shall have liberty freely and securely to come with their ships and cargoes to all such places, ports, and rivers in the territories aforesaid, to which other foreigners are permitted to come, to enter into the same, and to remain and reside in any parts of the said territories, respectively; also to hire and occupy houses and warehouses for the purposes of their commerce; and, generally, the merchants and traders of each nation, respectively, shall enjoy the most complete protection and security for their commerce, but subject always to the laws and statutes of the two countries, respectively.

ART. 2. No higher or other duties shall be imposed on the importation into the United States of any articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of His Britannic Majesty's territories in Europe, and no higher or other duties shall be imposed on the importation into the territories of His Britannic Majesty in Europe of any articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of the United States, than are, or shall be, payable on the like articles being the growth, produce, or manufacture of any other foreign country; nor shall any higher or other duties or charges be imposed in either of the two countries, on the exportation of any articles to the United States, or to His Britannic Majesty's territories in Europe, respectively, than such as are payable on the exportation of the like articles to any other foreign country; nor shall any prohibition be imposed on the exportation or importation of any articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of the United States, or of His Britannic Majesty's territories in Europe, to or from the said territories of His Britannic Majesty in Europe, or to or from the said United States, which shall not equally extend to all other nations.

No higher or other duties or charges shall be imposed, in any of the ports of the United States, on British vessels, than those payable in the same ports by vessels of the United States; nor in the ports of any of His Britannic Majesty's territories in Europe on the vessels of the United States, than shall be payable in the same ports on British vessels.

The same duties shall be paid on the importation into the United States of any articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of His Britannic Majesty's territories in Europe, whether such importation shall be in vessels of the United States or in British vessels; and the same duties shall be paid on the importation into the ports of any of His Britannic Majesty's territories in Europe, of any article the growth, produce, or manufacture of the United States, whether such importation shall be in British vessels or in vessels of the United States.

The same duties shall be paid, and the same bounties allowed, on the exportation of any articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of His Britannic Majesty's territories in Europe, to the United States, whether such exportation shall be in vessels of the United States or in British vessels; and the same duties shall be paid, and the same bounties allowed, on the exportation of any articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of the United States, to His Britannic Majesty's territories in Europe, whether such exportation shall be in British vessels or in vessels of the United States.

It is further agreed, that, in all cases where drawbacks are, or may be, allowed upon the re-exportation of any goods the growth, produce, or manufacture of either country, respectively, the amount of the said drawbacks shall be the same, whether the said goods shall have been originally imported in a British or an American vessel. But when such re-exportation shall take place from the United States in a British vessel, or from the territories of His Britannic Majesty in Europe in an American vessel, to any other foreign nation, the two contracting parties reserve to themselves, respectively, the right of regulating or diminishing, in such case, the amount of the said drawbacks.

The intercourse between the United States and His Britannic Majesty's possessions in the West Indies and on the continent of North America shall not be affected by any of the provisions of this article, but each party shall remain in the complete possession of its rights with respect to such an intercourse.

ART. 3. His Britannic Majesty agrees that the vessels of the United States of America shall be admitted, and hospitably received, at the principal settlements of the British dominions in the East Indies, viz: Calcutta, Madras, Bombay, and Prince of Wales's island; and that the citizens of the said United States may freely carry on trade between the said principal settlements and the said United States, in all articles of which the importation and exportation, respectively, to and from the said territories, shall not be entirely prohibited: Provided, only, That it shall not be lawful for them, in any time of war between the British Government and any State or Power whatever, to export from the said territories, without the special permission of the British Government, any military stores, or naval stores, or rice. The citizens of the United States shall pay for their vessels, when admitted, no higher or other duty or charge than shall be payable on the vessels of the most favored European nations; and they shall pay no higher or other duties or charges on the importation or exportation of the cargoes of the said vessels than shall be payable on the same articles when imported or exported in the vessels of the most favored European nations. But it is expressly agreed, that the vessels of the United States shall not carry any articles from the said principal settlements to any port or place, except to some port or place in the United States of America, where the same shall be unladen.

It is also understood that the permission granted by this article is not intended to allow the vessels of the United States to carry on any part of the coasting trade of the said British territories; but the vessels of the United States, having in the first instance proceeded to one of the said principal settlements of the British dominions in the East Indies, and then going with their original cargoes, or part thereof, from one of the said principal settlements to another, shall not be considered as carrying on the coasting trade.

The vessels of the United States may also touch for refreshment, but not for commerce, in the course of their voyage to or from the British territories in India, or to or from the dominions of the Emperor of China, at the Cape of Good Hope, the island of St. Helena, or such other places as may be in the possession of Great Britain, in the African or Indian seas; it being well understood that, in all that regards this article, the citizens of the United States shall be subject in all respects to the laws and regulations of the British Government from time to time established.

ART. 4. It shall be free for each of the two contracting parties, respectively, to appoint consuls for the protection of trade to reside in the dominions and territories of the other party; but, before any consul shall act as such, he shall, in the usual form, be approved and admitted by the Government to which he is sent; and it is hereby declared, that in case of illegal or improper conduct towards the laws or Government of the country to which he is sent, such consul may either be punished according to law, if the laws will reach the case, or be sent back; the offended Government assigning to the other the reasons for the same.

It is hereby declared, that either of the contracting parties may except from the residence of consuls such particular places as such party shall judge fit to be excepted.

ART. 5. This convention, when the same shall have been duly ratified by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of their Senate, and by His Britannic Majesty, and the respective ratifications mutually exchanged, shall be binding and obligatory on the United States and His Majesty for four years from the date of its signature; and the ratifications shall be exchanged in six months from this time, or sooner, if possible.

Done at London, this third day of July, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and fifteen.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS,
HENRY CLAY,
ALBERT GALLATIN,
FREDERICK JOHN ROBINSON,
HENRY GOULBURN,
WILLIAM ADAMS.

Extract of a letter from the American Commissioners, Messrs. Clay and Gallatin, to the Secretary of State, dated LONDON, May 18, 1815.

Having had reason to believe that the British Government had abstained from answering the communication of the joint commission from Ghent of the —— day of December, 1814, until they received official information of the American ratification of the treaty of peace, we thought it advisable, soon after that event was known to us, to repair to this city, in order that we might ascertain the disposition of this Government as to the commercial intercourse between the two countries.

Shortly after our arrival here, we were invited by Lord Castlereagh to an interview with him. A minute of the substance of the conversation which took place on that occasion, as drawn up and agreed to by the parties, is enclosed. We communicated to Mr. Goulburn, the next day, our answer upon the three subjects to which the conversation related.

In the interview with Lord Castlereagh, he had stated that four or five days might be necessary on their part to prepare for the proposed conversation. Nearly three weeks having elapsed without hearing further on the subject, we took what appeared to us a fit occasion to intimate our intention of leaving London. A few days after, we received an invitation from the vice-president of the board of trade, Mr. Robinson, to call at his office on the 11th instant. We accordingly attended, and were received by him and Messrs. Goulburn and Adams, two of the British commissioners who had negotiated the treaty of Ghent.

They opened the conversation by adverting to what had led to this interview, and professed themselves to be ready to receive any propositions we might choose to make. We observed, that in the treaties which America had heretofore made (particularly with this country) regulating commercial intercourse, there were generally comprised two subjects: one, which respected commercial regulations, applicable to a state of peace as well as of war; the other, which respected the rights and duties of the parties, one being at war and the other remaining at peace. Accordingly, our Government had instructed us to bring forward both those subjects.

As to the commercial intercourse, without at this time going into details, or minor points, which it might be necessary in the progress of the negotiation to adjust, we would content ourselves, in this unofficial conversation, with touching on the most important topics which it seemed to us desirable to discuss and arrange. These were, that the two countries should respectively be placed on the footing of the nation the most favored; that, in the trade between America and the British European dominions, all discriminating duties on tonnage and on merchandise, either imported or exported, should be abolished; that the trade between America and the British West Indies should be regulated, and placed on some more permanent basis than the occasional acts of the colonial authorities; that the nature and kind of intercourse between America and the adjoining British provinces should be defined and provided for; and that the trade with the British India possessions should be opened to America on liberal principles.

In regard to the discriminating duties, we remarked, that a proposition to abolish them first came from Great Britain, and a provision to that effect was inserted in the unratified treaty of 1806. Congress had taken up the matter at their last session, and passed an act, which we explained. We thought it desirable that they should be abolished, in order to prevent those collisions, and that system of commercial welfare, in which the two countries would probably be involved by an adherence to them. As an example, we mentioned the great extra duty to which, as we understood, the article of cotton was liable by the British laws, when imported in foreign vessels, and which, if persisted in, would certainly be met by some countervailing regulations.

With respect to the trade to British India, we observed, that we had no equivalent to offer for it; that it was for Great Britain to consider whether a commerce, consisting as it did almost entirely in the exchange of our specie for India produce, was not of a nature to deserve the most liberal encouragement; but that we had rather enter into no stipulation on the subject than be restricted to a direct intercourse, as had been proposed by the unratified treaty, both on the outward and return voyage.

On the other subject, (the rights and duties of the parties, one being at war and the other in a condition of peace,) we proceeded to remark, that whilst a prospect of a long European peace appeared to exist, as was the case when the treaty of Ghent was concluded, it was less important to provide for questions arising under this head. But it was impossible to shut our eyes to the demonstrations every where making of a new war, which, if it should assume a maritime character, might again menace the harmony and good understanding between the two countries. It was desirable, therefore, to anticipate and provide for the evil. The first and most important point was that of impressment. Great Britain had always professed a willingness to receive and consider any proposition which America should be disposed to make on that subject. It would, perhaps, be unprofitable at this time to go into a discussion of the right; as to which we would merely remark, that it was impossible that there could be a stronger conviction on the part of Great Britain that it was with her, than there was on the part of America that it was on her side. It was better to look to some practical arrangement, by which, without concession of right by either party, the mischiefs complained of on both sides might be prevented. To this end the attention of our Government had been turned. We believed that Great Britain had never heretofore contended that the American Government was bound to prohibit the merchants of the United States from employing foreign seamen, any more than it was bound to forbid their shipping contraband articles. America was, however, now willing to take upon herself such an obligation, and to exclude British seamen from her merchant service; and we believed such exclusion might be as effectually executed as our revenue laws. Here we called their attention to the act which Congress had passed on that subject, and to the message of the President to that body towards the close of its last session. Upon the supposition that the exclusion of British seamen should be absolute and entire, there would no longer exist any ground for the claim of impressment, and, of course, no objection to its abandonment. We stated that, besides the motive which existed with our Government of guarding against collision with Great Britain, another powerful one operated—that of encouraging our native seamen, and of not being obliged to rely on the uncertain supply of foreigners. To this system, as a substitute for that of impressment, it did not appear to us that Great Britain could object, unless it was thought to be impracticable in its execution. We had no doubt ourselves that, even admitting that there might be, as in cases of smuggling, occasional instances of evasion of the system of exclusion, it would nevertheless be, upon the whole, much more favorable in its result to Great Britain. This system would apply to and operate upon every American vessel; whilst that of impressment reached only the cases of those vessels with which it accidentally came in contact. We were aware of the difficulties which had heretofore opposed a satisfactory arrangement on this subject. Still, it was one of such vital importance, so tending to bring the two countries into collision, that it was impossible it should receive a consideration too earnest and too anxious.

The next point which it seemed to us important to settle was, the trade of America with the colonies of the enemies of Great Britain. Towards the end of the last European war, questions growing out of that trade had been terminated by the conquest of those colonies by Great Britain; but many of them having been restored at the peace, the disputes which heretofore existed might again arise. The former arrangements on this subject might, with some modifications, serve as a basis.

We then stated that we did not intend, in this preliminary and unofficial conversation, to discuss the other points belonging to this branch of the subject. A definition of blockades was desirable, and could not, it seemed, be attended with much difficulty, as we believed that there was no real difference between the two countries with respect to the abstract principle; but we apprehended that the disputes which might hereafter take place on that subject would arise almost exclusively from questions of fact, which no previous definition could prevent.

As, in the event of war, Great Britain might desire to know the disposition of our Government on the subject of privateers and prizes, we would only now say that the principle which might be adopted with respect to Great Britain, whether of admission or exclusion, must equally and impartially apply to all the parties to the war.

These were all the topics noticed by us, and we enforced and illustrated them by various other observations.

The British gentlemen, professing not to have expected those points to be brought forward which applied to a belligerent state of one of the parties, expressed a wish to know whether, in our view, the two subjects were inseparable, and whether we could not come to an agreement on those topics which were probably less difficult to be adjusted, leaving the others for further consideration and future arrangement? We replied, that, heretofore, they had always been blended together by our Government, and that we intended to bring them all up for consideration; that, at present, however, we only presented them for consideration, as it would be premature, at this time, to make any of them a sine qua non; and that whether a treaty omitting some of them would be acceptable, must depend on its general tenor, and upon the extent and importance of the subjects which might be comprehended in the arrangement.

They proceeded to remark that some of the subjects had been always found to involve extreme difficulty, particularly that of impressment; that Great Britain was certainly prepared, at all times, to receive and to consider any proposition that America might be disposed to make in relation to it; but one of the gentlemen remarked that, from the deep interest which was felt by Great Britain in it, she must view with great jealousy (by which, he said, he meant vigilance) any such proposition; that the inquiry which they had just made as to our willingness to separate the two subjects proceeded from a wish to ascertain whether it were likely that any practical result could be speedily obtained, if they entered upon the negotiation at this time.

On the subject of discriminating duties, mentioned by us, they said their Government would receive favorably the proposition for a mutual abolition of them. As to the trade with India, their Government was not at all disposed to shut us out from it. In regard to the trade to the West Indies, considering the difficulties which had heretofore presented themselves in placing it, by treaty, upon a footing satisfactory to both parties, they feared it would not now be practicable to enter into any stipulation respecting it which should meet the views of the two countries.

The interview terminated by their stating that they would report to the cabinet the substance of what had passed between us, and by their pledging themselves to do all in their power to afford us an early answer.

On the 16th instant, having been again invited by the vice-president of the board of trade to call at his office, we accordingly attended, and were received by the same gentlemen. They stated that they had reported to the cabinet what had passed at the last interview, and were now prepared to give us an answer on the several topics to which the conversation related; in doing this, they would observe the order which had been marked out by us.

1st. On the commercial intercourse between the two countries, they were authorized to state that their Government was ready to treat with us on the footing of the most favored nation, and was also willing to enter into any arrangement by which all discriminating duties on importations and tonnage should be mutually done away. They were willing to admit us to the enjoyment of the trade with British India, unclogged by the restriction on the outward voyage contained in the unratified treaty, but must still insist on that contained in the treaty of 1794, on the return voyage. Considering that we had candidly stated that we had no equivalent to offer, except what was to be found in the trade itself, they would expect, for this concession, a spirit of accommodation on our side in other parts of the commercial arrangement—the fur trade, or some other.

The trade with the British West Indies, they stated, had always been a subject of great difficulty, and their Government was not prepared to make any change in that colonial policy to which they had so long adhered; but they would hope that this would not form any obstacle to the negotiation.

With respect to the trade with their North American possessions, they were ready to receive and discuss any propositions we might have to offer, with an anxious desire to place it on a footing mutually satisfactory.

2dly. On those subjects which related to a state in which one of the parties should be at war and the other in peace, it was not necessary to disguise that they had been always attended with great difficulties. Still they were willing, in a spirit of amity and with candor, to receive and to discuss any propositions we might offer.

With regard to blockades, they could not think it necessary to enter into any treaty definition of them, as the questions which might hereafter arise on that subject, according to our own statement, would relate rather to the fact than to the principle, on which the two Governments seemed to agree. Indeed, they thought that such a definition might tend to weaken, as implying a doubt of the correctness of the principle.

In relation to the trade with enemies' colonies, besides the intrinsic difficulty of the question, as heretofore experienced in all attempts to arrange it, there was another, arising out of their want of information as to whether France had adopted any, and what, system of colonial policy, since the restoration of her colonies. It might be that she had opened their trade to foreign nations in peace as well as in war; in which case, the questions that had heretofore existed could not be agitated again.

Impressment had, they continued, of all this class of subjects, been found most difficult to arrange. They were aware how important it was considered in both countries, and how, in both, it touched public sensibility. As heretofore, they were now ready to receive and consider any proposition our Government might make respecting it; and, even without any treaty stipulation, their Government was now anxiously engaged in devising means to prevent the abuses of which we complain. If the law which we had mentioned at the last interview should be effectual in its object, it would doubtless do away a great motive with them for impressment. Still they were bound to consider, with the most vigilant attention, any proposition for the abandonment of what they must consider a right essential to their safety. That law did not, however, as they understood, settle the question who were to be considered as British subjects—a question on which the two countries might not be able to come to an understanding.

With regard to our ideas respecting privateers and prizes, they were certainly fair and unexceptionable.

As they had hinted at some accommodation in the fur trade, or in other parts of the commercial arrangement, for their supposed concession respecting the India trade, we thought the occasion suitable for stating that we were positively instructed not to consent to the renewal of the trade between British subjects and the Indians within our territories. We stated that the disposition of our Government on this subject did not proceed from commercial, but political considerations. They did not insist upon it, nor seem to think that the determination of our Government would prevent an arrangement of the Canada trade. One of them inquired whether we expected, in like manner, to be excluded from the trade with the Indians in their territories? To which we replied, certainly.

We explained the law for the exclusion of foreign seamen from our service, and mentioned that the naturalization of seamen would be almost altogether prevented, in future, by the necessity of a continued residence of five years. We stated that we were authorized to enter into stipulations that would forbid the employment of such British seamen as might, under our laws, be hereafter naturalized; but that we could not do it with respect to those who were already naturalized. We had thought that, as to them, an exception might be made, permitting, on both sides, the voluntary employment of such seamen, natives of one country, as might have heretofore been naturalized under the laws of the other country. We added, that the number of British seamen already naturalized, which could constitute, as it appeared to us, the only difficulty in an arrangement, was very inconsiderable. Doctor Adams concurred in opinion that there were not many.

We made some further explanations, and finally told them that, considering the dispositions which we had been happy to meet with in them, we would now say, that we would enter upon the negotiation; reserving to ourselves, however, the right, as our powers were several as well as joint, to withdraw from it if circumstances should make it eligible to do so, and to leave Mr. Adams, whom we daily expected, to conclude it.

The interview closed by their undertaking to provide themselves immediately with the necessary powers to proceed in the negotiation, and by an assurance that they would continue to do all in their power to bring it to a speedy and successful issue.

Extract of a minute of a conversation which took place at Lord Castlereagh's, between his lordship and Messrs. Clay and Gallatin, April 16, 1815.

Lord Castlereagh then called the attention of the American commissioners to a communication made by them at Ghent, relative to their power to treat on the commercial intercourse between the two countries. He said, before he gave an answer to that communication, he should be glad, if it were agreeable to the American commissioners, that there should be an unofficial conversation between them and the British commissioners who negotiated the treaty of peace, together with Mr. Robinson, whom he would associate with them for that purpose, to ascertain if it were likely that some general principles could be agreed upon to form the basis of a treaty of commerce. He should prefer that this conversation, like that which he understood had taken place in the former negotiation between Lords Holland and Aukland, and Messrs. Monroe and Pinkney, should be free from official forms; and thought such a course best calculated to ascertain if it were likely that the two Governments could come to any practical result on this interesting subject.

It was observed by one of the American commissioners, that such a conversation would be on terms of inequality, (the American commissioners being invested with powers, and the other gentlemen having none,) unless it was understood not only that it should be considered as entirely unofficial, but that the same gentlemen should afterwards be commissioned to conclude a treaty, if it were thought that one could be formed. Lord Castlereagh remarked, in reply, that such was certainly his intention.

The conversation ended in an understanding that the American commissioners would consult together upon the three topics mentioned by Lord Castlereagh, and communicate on the following day to Mr. Goulburn the result of their deliberations.

The American Plenipotentiaries to the Secretary of State.

Sir: London, July 3, 1815.

We have the honor to transmit a convention for regulating the commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain, which we concluded this day with the British plenipotentiaries.

Messrs. Clay and Gallatin's despatch of the 18th May last has informed you of the preliminary steps taken by them on that subject. Mr. Adams arrived in London on the 25th of May, and on the 5th of June we were invited by Messrs. Robinson, Goulburn, and Adams, to meet them on the 7th. At this conference, after a mutual exhibition of our powers, and some general observations, we delivered to them our projet of a commercial convention, a copy of which (marked No. 1) is herewith enclosed. They promised to take it into immediate consideration, and on the 9th informed us that they would prepare and transmit to us a contre-projet.

Believing that there was no prospect of an immediate arrangement on the subject of seamen, and knowing that without it no treaty defining the rights and duties of belligerents and neutrals was admissible, we excluded all that related to that branch of the subject from our projet, and confined it to objects purely commercial.

We took the third article of the treaty of 1794, respecting the intercourse with Canada, as the basis of the corresponding article; omitting, according to our instructions, whatever related to the Indian trade. In drawing the other articles, we were principally guided by the unratified treaty of 1806; by the instructions given in relation to it by the Secretary of State, in his despatch of May 20th, 1807; and by the act of Congress of 3d March last, for abolishing all discriminating duties. From the previous explicit declarations of the British plenipotentiaries, we deemed it useless to offer any article on the subject of the intercourse with the West India islands, and only inserted a clause to prevent the application to that intercourse of the provisions contemplated by the convention.

On the 16th the British plenipotentiaries addressed to us a note, enclosing their contre-projet, (marked No. 2;) and on the 17th we transmitted our answer, (marked No. 3.) The whole subject was discussed at large in conferences held on the 19th and 21st. The British plenipotentiaries, in a note of the 20th, (marked No. 4,) stated the substance of their answer to ours of the 17th. In the conference of the 21st we delivered the additional clause to the second article of the contre-projet, (marked No. 5;) and afterwards, on the same day, we transmitted our note marked No. 6.

It will be perceived, by these notes, that we had come to an understanding as to the intercourse between the United States and the British territories in Europe, and that we disagreed on three points: the intercourse with Canada; placing, generally, both countries on the footing of the most favored nations; and the intercourse with the British East Indies.

On the first point, the British plenipotentiaries persisted in refusing to admit that the citizens of the United States should have the right to take their produce down the river St. Lawrence to Montreal, and down the river Chambly (or Sorel) to the St. Lawrence; and, without that permission, the article was useless to us, and unequal in its practical operation. The provision that the importation of our produce into Canada should not be prohibited, unless the prohibition extended generally to all similar articles, afforded us no security, as no similar articles are imported into Canada from any other foreign country; whilst the corresponding provision, respecting the importation into the United States, through Canada, of the produce and manufactures of Great Britain, effectually prevented us from prohibiting such an importation, since this could not be done without extending the prohibition to the importation of all similar articles, either of British or other foreign growth or manufacture, into the Atlantic ports of the United States.

The article for placing, respectively, the two countries on the footing of the most favored nation, limited, as was insisted on by the British plenipotentiaries, to the intercourse between the United States and the European territories of Great Britain, was unnecessary, since all that appeared desirable on that subject was secured by the second article; and a provision of that nature, unless offering some obvious advantage, was deemed embarrassing, on account of the difficulties attached to its execution.

With this view of the two subjects, and finding that to arrange them in a satisfactory manner was impracticable, we proposed, in our note of the 21st, to omit altogether the articles relating to them.

On the subject of the intercourse with India, the British plenipotentiaries, contrary to the impression made in the unofficial conversations on Messrs. Clay and Gallatin, insisted, on our official conferences, that our admission to that trade was, on the part of Great Britain, a concession altogether gratuitous, and for which, particularly as to the privilege of indirect outward voyages, she ultimately expected an equivalent; whilst we strenuously contended that an equivalent was found in the trade itself, which was highly beneficial to India, or, at all events, considering the nature of the commercial intercourse generally between the two countries, in the other provisions of the convention. On the same ground, we urged our claim to be placed in India on the same footing, at least, as the most favored nations; to which it was replied that they made a distinction between those nations which had possessions there and those which had none. The refusal not being altogether explicit, we renewed our proposal to that effect in our note.

The British plenipotentiaries, in a note of the 23d, (marked No. 7,) acceded to our proposal to omit the third and fifth articles, and, refusing that on the subject of India, offered to omit the article altogether, and to sign a convention embracing only the provisions respecting the intercourse between the United States and the British territories in Europe.

This proposal we rejected in our note of the 24th, (marked No. 8.) But in order to meet, if practicable, the views of the British Government, and to avoid making any distinction between the East India trade and the other branches of commercial intercourse, we proposed to limit the duration of the whole convention to four years; and we offered, as an alternative, an arrangement for the sole purpose of abolishing the discriminating duties, in conformity with the act of Congress of the last session.

In a note of the 26th, (marked No. 9,) the British plenipotentiaries informed us that they found it necessary to refer our last proposals to their Government; and by their note of the 29th, (marked No. 10,) they accepted our offer of a convention embracing the East India article, and limited to four years, to be calculated from the date of its signature. We replied to this in a note dated 30th June, (and marked No. 11,) and on the same day arranged, in a conference, the details of the convention.

We beg leave to add, that the same restriction which confines our vessels to the principal ports of India is, except in special cases, imposed by the act of Parliament on British subjects; and that, besides the discrimination in the export duty from England, the difference on the import duty on the article of cotton had, by a late act of Parliament, been increased to two-pence sterling per pound in favor of every species imported in British vessels, and even of Brazil cotton imported in Portuguese vessels.

We have the honor to be, respectfully, sir, your obedient servants,

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS,
H. CLAY,
ALBERT GALLATIN.

The Hon. JAMES MONROE, Secretary of State, Washington.

No. 1.

Projet of the American Minister.

ART. 1. There shall be, between the territories of the United States and all the dominions of His Britannic Majesty in Europe, a reciprocal and perfect liberty of commerce and navigation. The people and inhabitants of the two countries, respectively, shall have liberty, freely and securely, and without hindrance and molestation, to come with their ships and cargoes to the lands, countries, cities, ports, places, and rivers within the territories and dominions aforesaid, to enter into the same, to resort there, and to remain and reside there, without any limitation of time; also, to hire and possess houses and warehouses, for the purposes of their commerce; and, generally, the merchants and traders on each side shall enjoy the most complete protection and security for their commerce, but subject always, as to what respects this article, to the laws and statutes of the two countries, respectively.

ART. 2. No other or higher duties shall be imposed on the importation into the United States of any articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of the dominions of His Britannic Majesty in Europe, nor on the importation into His Britannic Majesty's dominions in Europe, of any articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of the United States, than are or shall be payable on the like articles being of the growth, produce, or manufacture of any other foreign country. Nor shall any higher duties or charges be imposed, in either of the two countries, on the exportation of any articles to the United States, or to His Britannic Majesty's dominions in Europe, respectively, than such as are payable on the exportation of the like articles to every other foreign country; nor shall any prohibition be imposed on the exportation or importation of any articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of the United States, or of His Britannic Majesty's dominions in Europe, to or from the said States, or the said dominions, which shall not equally extend to all other nations. No other or higher duties or charges shall be imposed, in any of the ports of the United States, on British vessels, (such only excepted as may be bound from or to British possessions to which vessels of the United States are not permanently admitted,) than shall be payable, in the said ports, by vessels of the United States; nor in the ports of any of His Britannic Majesty's dominions in Europe, on the vessels of the United States, than are or shall be payable in the said ports by British vessels. The same duties of exportation and importation, and also the same drawbacks and bounties, shall be respectively paid and allowed, in either country, on all articles the produce, growth, or manufacture of the United States, or of His Britannic Majesty's dominions in Europe, whether such exportation or importation be in vessels of the United States or in British vessels.

ART. 3. His Britannic Majesty agrees that the vessels of the United States shall be admitted, and hospitably received, in all the seaports and harbors of the British dominions in the East Indies; and that the citizens of the said States may freely carry on a trade with the said territories, in all articles of which the importation or exportation respectively to or from the said territories shall not be entirely prohibited: Provided, only, That it shall not be lawful for them, in any time of war between the British Government and any other Power or State whatever, to export from the said territories, without the special permission of the British Government there, any military or naval stores, or rice.

The citizens of the United States shall pay for their vessels, when admitted into the said ports, no other or higher duty or charge than shall be payable on British vessels in the ports of the United States; and they shall pay no higher or other duties or charges on the importation or exportation of the cargoes of the said vessels than shall be payable on the same articles when imported or exported in British vessels. But it is expressly agreed that the vessels of the United States shall not carry any of the articles exported by them from the said British territories to any port or place, except to some port or place in America, where the same shall be unladen; or to some port or place, or ports or places in China, or in the Indian seas, whence the said vessels shall proceed, as aforesaid, to some port or place in America, and there unlade the whole of the articles exported, in the manner above mentioned, from the aforesaid British territories; and such regulations shall be adopted by both parties as shall from time to time be found necessary to enforce the due and faithful observance of this stipulation. It is also understood that the permission granted by this article is not to extend to allow the vessels of the United States to carry on any part of the coasting trade of the said British territories, without the special permission of the British Government there; but the vessels going from one port to another of the said territories, for the sole purposes either of discharging their original cargoes, or part thereof, or of completing their return cargoes, are not to be considered as carrying on the coasting trade. Neither is this article to be construed to allow the citizens of the United States to settle or reside within the said territories, or to go into the interior parts thereof, without the permission of the British Government established there; and if any transgressions should be attempted against the regulations of the British Government in this respect, the observance of the same shall and may be enforced against the citizens of America, in the same manner as against British subjects or others transgressing the same rule. And the citizens of the United States, whenever they arrive in any port or harbor in the said territories, or if they should be permitted, in manner aforesaid, to go to any other place therein, shall always be subject to the laws, government, and jurisdiction, of whatsoever nature, established in such harbor, port, or place, according as the same may be. The vessels of the United States may also touch for refreshment at the island of St. Helena, or at such other ports or places as may be in the possession of Great Britain in the African or Indian seas, but subject, in all respects, to such regulations as the British Government may from time to time establish there.

ART. 4. The navigation of all the lakes, rivers, and water communications, the middle of which is the boundary between the United States and His Britannic Majesty's dominions on the continent of North America, shall, at all times, be free to the citizens of the United States and to His Majesty's subjects. The said citizens and subjects may freely carry on trade and commerce with each other, and for that purpose pass and repass by land or inland navigation into the respective territories of the two parties on the said continent; and no higher or other tolls, or rates of ferriage, than what are or shall be payable by natives, shall be demanded on either side. All goods and merchandise, whose importation into the United States shall not be wholly prohibited, may freely, for the purposes of the commerce above mentioned, be carried into the same, in the manner aforesaid, by His Majesty's subjects; and such goods and merchandise shall be subject to no higher or other duties than would be payable by citizens of the United States on the importation of the same in American vessels into the Atlantic ports of the said United States; and, in like manner, all goods and merchandise, whose importation into His Majesty's said territories in America shall not be entirely prohibited, may freely, for the purposes of the commerce above mentioned, be carried into the same, in the manner aforesaid, by the citizens of the United States; and such goods and merchandise shall be subject to no higher or other duties than would be payable by His Majesty's subjects on the importation of the same from Europe into the said territories. All goods not prohibited to be exported from the said territories, respectively, may, in like manner, be carried out of the same by the two parties. No duty of importation or exportation shall be levied by either party on peltries or furs which may be brought, in the manner aforesaid, by land or inland navigation, from the said territories of one party into the said territories of the other party.

ART. 5. It shall be free for each of the two contracting parties, respectively, to appoint consuls for the protection of trade, and agents for the protection of seamen, to reside in the dominions and territories of the other party; and the said consuls and agents shall enjoy the liberties and rights which belong to them by reason of their functions. But before any consul or agent aforesaid shall act as such, he shall be, in the usual form, approved and admitted by the party to whom he is sent; and it is hereby declared to be lawful and proper, that, in case of illegal or improper conduct towards the laws or Government, a consul or agent aforesaid may either be punished according to law, if the laws will reach the case, or be dismissed, or even sent back; the offended Government assigning to the other the reasons for the same.

ART. 6. It being the intention of the high contracting parties that the people of their respective dominions shall be placed on the footing of the most favored nation, it is agreed, that in case either party shall hereafter grant any additional advantage in navigation or trade to any other nation, the citizens or subjects of the other party shall fully participate therein—freely, where it is freely granted to such other nation, or yielding the same compensation where the grant is made for some equivalent.

No. 2.

The British Plenipotentiaries to the American Plenipotentiaries.

BOARD OF TRADE, June 16, 1815.

The undersigned have the honor to transmit to the plenipotentiaries of the United States a contre-projet for the arrangement of the commercial intercourse between the two countries. The American plenipotentiaries will observe, that the article respecting the British East Indies is not proposed to be included in the body of the treaty, but in a separate article, and more limited in point of duration than would be suitable to the arrangements of the treaty itself. The undersigned, nevertheless, flatter themselves that the American plenipotentiaries will see in the proposed article for the East India intercourse a proof of the liberal and conciliatory disposition with which the British Government is disposed to act upon the subject.

It will be recollected that at one of the unofficial conferences, and, subsequently, at the first official conference held with the American plenipotentiaries, the undersigned stated, by order of their Government, that if the power of going from the United States to the British dominions in the East Indies by an indirect course were conceded, Great Britain must be considered as entitled to some equivalent for the concession, and that the fur trade was pointed out by the undersigned as capable of furnishing that equivalent.

The American plenipotentiaries having stated that their instructions did not permit them to grant, by stipulation, any commercial intercourse between His Majesty's subjects and the Indians residing within the acknowledged boundaries of the United States, and not having suggested any other means of finding an equivalent, the undersigned would have been fully justified in tendering a contre-projet which wholly omitted the concession in question. But His Majesty's Government, anxious to renew the commercial relations of the two countries, in the true spirit of peace and harmony, has authorized the undersigned to offer a separate article, by which the indirect voyage from the United States to the British East Indies will be permitted, without equivalent, for the space of two years, in the confident hope that during that period the American Government will be enabled to propose such an equivalent as may induce Great Britain to make that permission commensurate with the general duration of the treaty.

The undersigned will be happy to have the honor of seeing the American plenipotentiaries on any day which may suit their convenience, and request them to accept the assurance of their high consideration.

F. ROBINSON,
HENRY GOULBURN,
WILLIAM ADAMS.

Contre-projet of the British Commissioners.

ARTICLE 1. There shall be, between all the territories of His Britannic Majesty in Europe, and the territories of the United States of America, a reciprocal liberty of commerce. The inhabitants of the two countries, respectively, shall have liberty fully and securely to come with their ships and cargoes to all such places, ports, and rivers in the territories aforesaid, to which other foreigners are permitted to come; to enter into the same, and to remain and reside in any parts of the said territories, respectively; also to hire and occupy warehouses for the purposes of their commerce; and, generally, the merchants and traders of each nation, respectively, shall enjoy the most complete protection and security for their commerce, but subject always to the laws and statutes of the two countries, respectively.

ART. 2. No other or higher duties shall be imposed on the importation into the territories of His Britannic Majesty in Europe of any articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of the United States, and no other or higher duties shall be imposed on the importation into the United States of any articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of His Britannic Majesty's territories in Europe, than are or shall be payable on the like articles being the growth, produce, or manufacture of any other foreign country; nor shall any other or higher duties or charges be imposed in either of the two countries on the exportation of any articles to His Britannic Majesty's territories in Europe, or to the United States, respectively, than such as are payable on the exportation of the like articles to any other foreign country; nor shall any prohibition be imposed upon the exportation or importation of any article the growth, produce, or manufacture of His Britannic Majesty's territories in Europe, or of the United States, to or from the said territories of His Britannic Majesty in Europe, or to or from the said United States, which shall not equally extend to all other nations.

No other or higher duties or charges shall be imposed in the ports of any of His Britannic Majesty's territories in Europe on the vessels of the United States, than shall be payable on British vessels; nor in any of the ports of the United States on British vessels, than those payable in the same ports by vessels of the United States.

ART. 3. The navigation of all lakes, rivers, and water communications, the middle of which is or may be the boundary between His Britannic Majesty's territories on the continent of North America, and the United States, shall, with the exceptions hereinafter mentioned, at all times be free to His Majesty's subjects and the citizens of the United States. The inhabitants of His Britannic Majesty's territories in North America, and the citizens and subjects of the United States, may freely carry on trade and commerce by land or inland navigation, as aforesaid, with goods and merchandise the growth, produce, or manufacture of the British territories in Europe or North America, or of the United States, respectively, within the territories of the two parties, respectively, on the said continent, (the countries within the limits of the Hudson's Bay Company only excepted;) and no other or higher duties or tolls, or rates of ferriage, or portage, than what are or shall be payable by natives, respectively, shall be taken or demanded on either side. All goods or merchandise, whose importation into the United States shall not be wholly prohibited, may fully, for the purposes of the commerce above mentioned, be carried into the said United States, in the manner aforesaid, by His Britannic Majesty's subjects; and the said goods and merchandise shall be subject to no higher or other duties than would be payable by citizens of the United States on the importation of the same in American vessels into the Atlantic ports of the United States. And, in like manner, all goods and merchandise the growth, produce, or manufacture of the United States, whose importation into His Majesty's said territories in America shall not be entirely prohibited, may fully, for the purposes of the commerce above mentioned, be carried into the same by land, or by means of such lakes, rivers, and water communications as above mentioned, by the citizens of the United States; and such goods and merchandise shall be subject to no other or higher duty than would be payable by His Majesty's subjects on the importation of the same from Europe into the said territories. No duty shall be levied by either party on peltries or furs which may be brought in the manner aforesaid by land or inland navigation, from the said territories of the other; but tolls, or rates of ferriage, or portage, may be demanded and taken in manner above mentioned on such peltries or furs.

It is hereby declared, that nothing in this article contained, as to the navigation of rivers, lakes, or water communications, shall extend to give a right of navigation upon or within the same in those parts where the middle is not the boundary between His Britannic Majesty's territories and the United States of America.

ART. 4. It shall be free for each of the two contracting parties to appoint consuls for the protection of trade, to reside in the dominions and territories of the other party; but before any consul shall act as such, he shall, in the usual form, be approved and admitted by the Government to which he is sent. And it is hereby declared that, in case of illegal or improper conduct towards the laws or Government of the country to which he is sent, such consul may either be punished according to law, if the laws will reach the case, or be sent back, the offended Government assigning to the other the reasons for the same.

It is hereby declared, that either of the contracting parties may except from the residence of consuls such particular places as such party shall judge proper to be so excepted.

ART. 5. It being the intention of the contracting parties that the inhabitants of His Britannic Majesty's territories in Europe, and the inhabitants of the United States, shall, in respect to commerce between the said territories, be placed on the footing of the most favored nations, it is agreed, that in case either of the contracting parties shall hereafter grant any additional advantages in commerce or navigation to any European nation as to the importation or exportation to or from such other European nation and His Britannic Majesty's territories in Europe, or to or from such European nation and the territories of the United States, the citizens and subjects of the other contracting party shall likewise enjoy the same, freely, where it has been freely granted to such other European nation, and, where conditionally granted, on the same terms and conditions on which such advantage shall have been granted, or on terms and conditions which may be afterwards agreed upon as equivalent thereto by the contracting parties.

FIRST SEPARATE ARTICLE.

His Britannic Majesty agrees that the vessels of the United States shall be admitted and hospitably received at the principal settlements of the British dominions in the East Indies, videlicet, Calcutta, Madras, Bombay, and the Prince of Wales's island; and that the citizens of the said United States may fully carry on trade between the said principal settlements and the said United States, in all articles of which the importation and exportation, respectively, to and from the said territories shall not be entirely prohibited: Provided, only, That it shall not be lawful for them, in any time of war between the British Government and any Power or State whatever, to export from the said territories, without the special permission of the British Government, any military stores, or naval stores, or rice. The citizens of the United States shall pay for their vessels, when admitted, no other or higher duty or charge than shall be payable on the vessels of the most favored European nations; and they shall pay no other or higher duties or charges on the importation or exportation of the cargoes of the said vessels, than shall be payable on the same articles when imported or exported in the vessels of the most favored European nation.

But it is expressly agreed, that the vessels of the United States shall not carry any articles from the said principal settlements to any port or place, except to some port or place in the United States of America, where the same shall be unladen.

It is also understood, that the permission granted by this article is not to extend to allow the vessels of the United States to carry on any of the coasting trade of the said British territories; but the vessels of the United States having, in the first instance, proceeded to one of the said principal settlements of the British dominions in the East Indies, and then going with their original cargoes, or part thereof, from one of the said principal settlements to another, shall not be considered as carrying on the coasting trade.

The vessels of the United States may also touch for refreshment, but not for commerce, in the course of their voyage to or from the British territories in India, at the Cape of Good Hope, the island of St. Helena, or such other places as may be in the possession of Great Britain in the African or Indian seas; it being well understood that, in all that regards this article, the citizens of the United States shall be subject in all respects to the laws and regulations of the British Government from time to time established.

SECOND SEPARATE ARTICLE.

It is hereby agreed and declared, that the first separate article of the present treaty shall be limited in its duration to the period of two years from the date of the exchange of the ratifications of the said treaty.

No. 3.

The American to the British Plenipotentiaries.

HARLEY STREET, June 17, 1815.

The undersigned have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the note of His Britannic Majesty's plenipotentiaries of the 16th instant, enclosing their contre-projet for the arrangement of the commercial intercourse between the two countries.

Anxious to ascertain, with as little delay as possible, whether there be any probability that such an arrangement can now be concluded as shall be satisfactory to both parties, the undersigned will not at this time enter into a discussion of the subject, and, leaving minor points for subsequent consideration, will only propose the following alterations in the contre-projet of His Britannic Majesty's plenipotentiaries, viz:

Art. 2.—1st. To reinstate the clause in the projet of the undersigned which provided that the same duties, drawbacks, and bounties should be paid and allowed in either country, on the importation or exportation of articles the produce, growth, or manufacture of His Britannic Majesty's territories in Europe, or of the United States, whether such importations or exportations should be in British vessels or in vessels of the United States.

2d. To reinstate the clause in the projet of the undersigned which excepted from the provision to equalize tonnage duties British vessels bound to or from British possessions to which vessels of the United States were not permanently admitted; or to introduce a new article, providing that neither the intercourse between the United States and His Britannic Majesty's possessions in the West Indies, nor that by sea between the said States and His Britannic Majesty's possessions in North America, shall be affected by any article in the treaty, but that each party shall remain in the complete possession of its rights, in respect to such an intercourse.

Art. 3.—To reinstate, in substance, the article proposed on that subject by the undersigned, so that the commerce by land or inland navigation, sanctioned by the article, be confined to that which may be carried on between the citizens of the United States and His Britannic Majesty's subjects; and so as not to preclude the citizens of the United States from carrying articles of the growth, produce, or manufacture of the said States down the river St. Lawrence, as far at least at Montreal, and down the waters of Lake Champlain, as far at least as the St. Lawrence; or, if no satisfactory arrangement can at present be formed on this subject, to omit the article altogether.

Art. 5.—To place, generally, each nation on the footing of the most favored nation, without restricting that privilege, as relates to the citizens of the United States, to the commerce with His Britannic Majesty's territories in Europe.

Second separate article to be omitted.

The undersigned will have the honor to wait on His Britannic Majesty's plenipotentiaries on Monday, the 19th instant, at two o'clock, at the Office of Trade, when the undersigned hope they will be able to communicate to them their final determination on the proposed alterations.

The undersigned request His Britannic Majesty's plenipotentiaries to accept the assurances of their distinguished consideration.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS,
HENRY CLAY,
ALBERT GALLATIN.

No. 4.

The British to the American Plenipotentiaries.

BOARD OF TRADE, June 20, 1815.

In compliance with the request of the American plenipotentiaries, the undersigned have the honor to communicate to them, in writing, the substance of the observations which were made on the part of the British plenipotentiaries, in the conference of yesterday, upon the different points referred to in the note of the American plenipotentiaries of the 17th instant.

Upon the first point, relating to a part of the second article of the contre-projet of the undersigned, the British plenipotentiaries stated it to be the intention of their Government to agree not only to a mutual equalization of such duties as may be properly called tonnage duties, but also of all duties upon the importation of goods the growth, produce, or manufacture of the two countries, respectively, whether imported in British or in American ships; they stated, further, their readiness to accede to a similar and mutual equalization of bounties payable upon the above articles. Upon the subject of drawbacks, they represented that the clause, as proposed by the American plenipotentiaries, appeared to give to the vessels of the United States which might be engaged in the general re-exportation of American produce from this country to all other parts of the world an advantage equal to that enjoyed by British ships; and that this privilege went beyond the general principle of an article which was confined to the trade between the two countries, respectively. They expressed a wish to receive from the American plenipotentiaries a more precise explanation of their views upon this point.

Upon the second point referred to in the note of the American plenipotentiaries, the undersigned expressed their readiness to agree to a clause which should contain the latter alternative suggested by the American plenipotentiaries.

Upon the third article, relating to the intercourse between Canada and the United States, the undersigned disclaimed any intention of obtaining, by any interpretation of the words of the article as they had proposed it, a right to an intercourse with the Indians residing within the acknowledged limits of the United States, which the American plenipotentiaries had already stated that their instructions forbade them to concede. And they expressed their readiness to agree to the insertion of such words as would clear up any doubt which might exist upon the subject.

As to the navigation of the river St. Lawrence as far as Montreal, and that of the waters flowing from Lake Champlain to that river, the undersigned stated themselves not to be authorized to stipulate the concession of that indulgence in the way proposed by the American plenipotentiaries. The undersigned likewise stated their objections to extending Article 5 beyond the intercourse between the United States and His Britannic Majesty's dominions in Europe.

In regard to the two separate articles of the contre-projet, the undersigned stated that they had no authority to grant the first, unless accompanied by a limitation in point of time; and when the American plenipotentiaries proposed, as a substitute for that article, one which should give the United States the same privileges as the most favored European nations in their intercourse with the British possessions in that quarter, the undersigned, whilst they admitted that, in some respects, it stood upon different grounds from an article which should grant the indirect voyage to the East Indies, without any equivalent or limitation in point of time, did not feel themselves authorized to hold out any expectation that this new suggestion could be acceded to by Great Britain.

The undersigned request the American plenipotentiaries to accept the assurances of their high consideration.

Second sketch of article for equalizing duties.

The same duties shall be paid on the importation into the ports of any of His Britannic Majesty's territories in Europe of any articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of the United States, and the same drawbacks shall be allowed on the re-exportation thereof, whether such importation shall be in vessels of the United States or in British vessels; and the same duties shall be paid on the importation into the United States of any articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of His Britannic Majesty's territories in Europe, and the same drawbacks shall be allowed on the re-exportation thereof, whether such importation shall be in vessels of the United States or in British vessels. The same duties shall be paid, and the same bounties allowed, on the exportation of any articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of the United States to His Britannic Majesty's territories in Europe, whether such exportation shall be in vessels of the United States or in British vessels; and the same duties shall be paid, and the same bounties allowed, on the exportation of any articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of His Britannic Majesty's territories in Europe to the United States, whether such exportation shall be in vessels of the United States or in British vessels.

The American to the British Plenipotentiaries.

HARLEY STREET, June 21, 1815.

The undersigned have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the note of the British plenipotentiaries dated the 20th instant, communicating the substance of the observations which they had made in the conference of the 19th, upon the different points referred to in the note of the undersigned of the 17th instant.

The views of the undersigned, with respect to the second article, being precisely the same with those stated by the British plenipotentiaries, there will be no difficulty in framing a clause embracing the objects contemplated by both parties, and which shall be free from ambiguity.

The explanation given by the British plenipotentiaries upon that part of the third article which the undersigned apprehended might be liable to a construction, in reference to the Indian trade, not intended by either party, is perfectly satisfactory. But they regret that they cannot accede to the alterations proposed in other respects by the British plenipotentiaries to the article which had been offered by the undersigned, particularly as they affect the privilege of inland navigation by the river St. Lawrence and by the waters flowing from Lake Champlain; nor have they found it practicable to frame any article compatible with the different views entertained by the two parties respecting the intercourse between the United States and Canada. They therefore recur to the proposal made in their note of the 17th instant, to omit that article altogether, that proposal not having been noticed in the note of the British plenipotentiaries of the 20th instant.

They make the same offer as to the fifth article of the contre-projet.

And, thirdly, they hereby renew the proposal made verbally in the conference of the 19th instant, to substitute, for the two separate articles, one placing the United States, in their intercourse with the British possessions in India, on the footing of the most favored European nation.

The undersigned request to be made acquainted with the determination of the British plenipotentiaries on those three propositions.

The undersigned tender again to the British plenipotentiaries assurances of their distinguished consideration.

The British to the American Plenipotentiaries.

BOARD OF TRADE, June 23, 1815.

The undersigned have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the note of the American plenipotentiaries of the 21st instant, and are happy to find that no difficulty exists on either side as to the second article. Upon the subject of the third article, the undersigned regret to learn that the American plenipotentiaries have not found it practicable to frame any article compatible with the different views entertained by the two parties respecting the intercourse between Canada and the United States; and as the undersigned are equally unable to accede to the proposition made on the part of the United States respecting the navigation of waters lying exclusively within the territories of His Britannic Majesty, they accede to the proposal of omitting the article altogether. They have also no objection to the omission of the fifth article.

In regard to the trade with the British East Indies, the undersigned are not authorized to substitute, for the two separate articles which they had proposed, one which shall put the intercourse of the United States in that quarter upon the footing of the most favored European nation, inasmuch as it would have the practical effect of granting, in another shape, that which the undersigned are instructed to withhold, unless accompanied by a greater limitation of time than they would think it expedient to apply to the other arrangements of the treaty. If, however, the American plenipotentiaries adhere to their objection to the substance of the two separate articles, as proposed on the part of Great Britain, the undersigned are ready to omit altogether any article upon the subject of the East Indies.

The undersigned are nevertheless disposed to consider the arrangements of the second article (as agreed upon, or understood,) to be of sufficient importance to the mutual interests of Great Britain and the United States, particularly in the common object of securing a free commercial intercourse between the two countries, to induce them readily to sign a treaty or convention for that single purpose, independent of the other points to which the negotiation has referred.

The undersigned are happy, upon this occasion, to renew to the American plenipotentiaries the assurances of their high consideration.

HARLEY STREET, June 24, 1815.

The undersigned have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the note of the British plenipotentiaries of the 23d instant, expressing their assent to the proposal of omitting the third and fifth articles of the contre-projet. To the proposal of omitting, also, altogether, any article upon the subject of the East Indies, and of signing an arrangement embracing all the provisions contained in the second article, the undersigned do not feel themselves authorized to accede. But they offer to sign a convention embracing that article entire, and the first separate article, the whole of which convention shall be limited to the term of four years from the date of the exchange of the ratifications; or they will agree to a convention for the sole purpose of abolishing all discriminating duties on American and British vessels, and their cargoes, in the intercourse between the United States and his Britannic Majesty's territories in Europe, in the manner contemplated by the second article, and as explained and mutually agreed on in the conferences on that subject, omitting all the other provisions contained in the same article, and which had for object to place the two countries, respectively, on the footing of the most favored nation.

The undersigned request the British plenipotentiaries to accept the assurances of their distinguished consideration.

BOARD OF TRADE, June 26, 1815.

The undersigned have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the note of the American plenipotentiaries of the 24th instant, in which they offer to sign a convention embracing the second article entire, and the first separate article, the whole convention to be limited to the term of four years from the date of the exchange of the ratifications; or to agree to a convention for the sole purpose of abolishing all discriminating duties on American and British vessels, and their cargoes, in the intercourse between the United States and the British territories in Europe, omitting all the other provisions contained in the same article, and which had for object to place the two countries, respectively, on the footing of the most favored nation.

As neither of these proposals were contemplated in the instructions with which the undersigned were originally furnished, and which were framed with a view to a less limited arrangement, they have felt themselves under the necessity of referring the last note of the American plenipotentiaries to the consideration of their Government, and will not fail to communicate the result of that reference as soon as they shall be enabled to do so.

The undersigned are happy to avail themselves of this opportunity of renewing to the American plenipotentiaries the assurances of their high consideration.

BOARD OF TRADE, June 29, 1815.

In reference to the note which the undersigned had the honor to address to the American plenipotentiaries on the 26th instant, they are now instructed to acquaint them that the British Government is ready to agree to a convention for four years, (to be calculated from the date of its signature,) which shall contain the whole of the second article, as proposed by the undersigned, and as explained and mutually agreed upon in their several conferences; and also the first separate article, relating to the East Indies, as proposed on the part of Great Britain, (the latter article also to be in force for four years from the same date.) The undersigned, in making this communication to the American plenipotentiaries, feel it to be their duty to state, in the most explicit manner, that although, in the earnest desire of promoting a good understanding between the two countries, the British Government has, at the present time, forborne to insist on making in the body of the treaty any marked distinction between its concession in regard to the East Indies, and its other concessions, for which a stipulated equivalent is obtained, yet that it still considers itself as granting to the United States a privilege, in regard to the East Indies, for which it is entitled to require an equivalent; and the undersigned must, therefore, be distinctly understood as reserving to His Majesty's Government, in any future negotiations, the clear right either of withholding this privilege altogether, after the expiration of four years, or of renewing the grant of it for such equivalents, or subject to such modifications, as expediency may seem to require at the time of such future negotiations.

The undersigned request to have the honor of seeing the American plenipotentiaries on Friday next, the 30th instant, at two o'clock, at the Board of Trade; and avail themselves of this opportunity of again offering the assurances of their high consideration.

The American to the British Plenipotentiaries.

HARLEY STREET, June 30, 1815.

The undersigned have had the honor to receive the note of the British plenipotentiaries, dated the 29th instant, and stating the terms on which their Government is ready to agree to a convention on the subject of the commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain.

The undersigned have already, in the conferences which they had the honor to hold with the British plenipotentiaries, expressed their opinion that the proposed convention, taken altogether, was founded on principles of reciprocity, was equally advantageous to both parties, and contained in itself a fair equivalent for every presumed concession made by either party; but both Governments will undoubtedly have a clear right, after the expiration of four years, of refusing to renew, or of subjecting to modifications, any of the stipulations now agreed on which may appear to either party injurious, or requiring some further equivalent. The same earnest desire of promoting a good understanding between the two countries, which has been expressed on the part of Great Britain, has induced the undersigned to agree to a convention more limited both as to its objects and duration than they had contemplated, with a hope that, in the mean time, its deficiencies may be supplied, and such other provisions may be adopted, as will conduce to mutual convenience, and tend to strengthen the relations of amity and friendship happily restored between the two countries.

The undersigned will have the honor to meet the British plenipotentiaries this day, and feel pleasure in renewing the assurances of their high consideration.

The Rt. Hon. F. J. ROBINSON, H. GOULBURN, Esq., and Dr. W. ADAMS.

The undersigned, His Britannic Majesty's chargé des affaires in the United States, has the honor to acquaint the American Secretary of State, for the information of the President, that he has received His Royal Highness the Prince Regent's ratification, in the name and on the behalf of His Majesty, of the commercial convention between the two countries, signed at London on the 3d of last July; and that he has been authorized and is ready to proceed to the exchange, whenever the ratification on the part of the United States shall have taken place.

In communicating this intelligence, the undersigned has received the Prince Regent's commands, at the same time, to transmit to the Government of the United States the accompanying declaration, explanatory of the intentions of His Majesty's Government in so far as regards the intercourse of vessels belonging to the United States with the island of St. Helena; the existing circumstances of the world having rendered it necessary that that island should, for the present, be excepted from the ports of refreshment enumerated in the third article of the said convention.

The undersigned avails himself of this opportunity of requesting the American Secretary of State to accept the assurance of his high consideration.

ANTHONY ST. JOHN BAKER.

DECLARATION.

The undersigned, His Britannic Majesty's chargé des affaires in the United States of America, is commanded by His Royal Highness the Prince Regent, acting in the name and on the behalf of His Majesty, to explain and declare, upon the exchange of the ratifications of the convention concluded at London on the 3d of July of the present year, for regulating the commerce and navigation between the two countries, that, in consequence of events which have happened in Europe subsequent to the signature of the convention aforesaid, it has been deemed expedient, and determined, in conjunction with the allied sovereigns, that St. Helena shall be the place allotted for the future residence of General Napoleon Bonaparte, under such regulations as may be necessary for the perfect security of his person; and it has been resolved, for that purpose, that all ships and vessels whatever, as well British ships and vessels as others, excepting only ships belonging to the East India Company, shall be excluded from all communication with or approach to that island.

It has, therefore, become impossible to comply with so much of the third article of the treaty as relates to the liberty of touching for refreshment at the island of St. Helena; and the ratifications of the said treaty will be exchanged under the explicit declaration and understanding that the vessels of the United States cannot be allowed to touch at or hold any communication whatever with the said island, so long as the said island shall continue to be the place of residence of the said Napoleon Bonaparte.

A.

Extract of a minute of a conversation which took place at Lord Castlereagh's, between his lordship and Messrs. Clay and Gallatin, on the 16th of April, 1816.

Lord Castlereagh began by adverting to the unfortunate event which had taken place at Dartmoor, and proposed that, as a statement of the transaction had been received from the American prisoners differing very materially in fact from an inquiry instituted by the port admiral, some means should be devised of procuring information as to the real state of the case; in order either, on the one hand, to satisfy the United States that the lives of their citizens, however unfortunately, had not been wantonly sacrificed, or, on the other, to enable the British Government to punish their civil and military officers, if they should be found to have resorted to measures of extreme severity without necessity, or with too much precipitation. He therefore proposed that one of the American commissioners should proceed to Dartmoor, with one of the gentlemen with whom they had negotiated at Ghent, and, after examining the persons concerned, and such other evidence as might be thought necessary, should make a joint report upon the facts of the case; that as neither Government could have any other wish beyond that of clearing up a transaction which might, if left unexplained, and as it now stood, upon ex parte statements, create much irritation between the two countries, so the British Government had no desire to screen any person whose conduct might have been improper or precipitate.

The American commissioners, agreeing to the principles of Lord Castlereagh's proposition, so far as related to the advantage of having a joint report upon the facts of the case, entertained doubts whether they could, with propriety, take such a duty upon themselves; and suggested that Mr. Beasley, from the situation which he held in this country, appeared to them better qualified for the task. Lord Castlereagh replied, that it was only from a desire of giving to any report which might be made the sanction of the highest authority, that he had suggested the employment of the commissioners themselves; and, deeming it of the most essential importance to satisfy the public in both countries on this subject, he was induced to prefer his original proposition; but that he must, of course, leave it to the American commissioners to decide whether Mr. Beasley was better fitted for this service; and that, upon receiving the result of their consideration of the subject, the Government would appoint some person properly qualified to meet the American gentleman who might be so selected; such person being either one of the late British commissioners at Ghent, or a commissioner of the transport board, according as the American commissioners might decide upon going themselves or sending Mr. Beasley. Lord Castlereagh then entered upon the immediate release of the American prisoners of war detained in this country. After stating the inconvenience of retaining in confinement men who had a right, under a treaty of peace, to be liberated, he requested information as to whether Mr. Beasley was proceeding in the measures which he understood to have been taken for conveying them back to America.

The American commissioners stated that Mr. Beasley had certainly taken up some transports, on his own responsibility, previous to the receipt of instructions from America; but that the American Government considered the restoration of prisoners to imply their reconveyance to their own country by the Power detaining them; and the American commissioners did not know whether Mr. Beasley had either authority or funds for continuing the service which he had, on his own view of the subject, commenced.

Lord Castlereagh stated that he saw no objection to adopting some such measure as that which had been adopted in America, and proposed that such party should defray half the expense of conveying the prisoners from this country to America, leaving the ultimate construction of the treaty for future arrangements. But he remarked, that the article on which the doubt had arisen being founded on principles of perfect reciprocity, it appeared to him scarcely consonant with those principles, that the only expense to be defrayed by the United States should be that of conveying the British prisoners from the United States to Bermuda or Halifax, while Great Britain should have not only to convey to America the American prisoners now in this country, but also to bring home from colonies nearly as distant as the United States all her own prisoners.

Extract of a letter from H. Clay and Albert Gallatin, Esquires, to Mr. Beasley.

LONDON, April 18, 1815.

At the request of Lord Castlereagh, we have had interviews with him and Mr. Goulburn, on the subjects of the transportation of the American prisoners now in this country to the United States, and of the late unfortunate event at the depot at Dartmoor.

On the latter subject, as a statement of the transaction has been received from the American prisoners differing very materially in fact from that which had resulted from an inquiry instituted by the port admiral, it has been thought advisable that some means should be devised of procuring information as to the real state of the case, in order, on the one hand, to show that there had not been any wanton or improper sacrifice of the lives of American citizens, or, on the other, to enable the British Government to punish their civil and military officers, if it should appear that they have resorted to measures of extreme severity, without necessity, or with too much precipitation.

Lord Castlereagh proposed that the inquiry should be a joint one, conducted by a commissioner selected by each Government; and we have thought such an inquiry most likely to produce an impartial and satisfactory result.

We presume that you will have too much occupation on the first subject, and the other incidental duties of your office, to attend to this inquiry in person. On that supposition, we have stated to the British Government that we should recommend to you the selection of Charles King, Esq., as a fit person to conduct it in behalf of the American Government. If Mr. King will undertake the business, he will forthwith proceed to Dartmoor, and, in conjunction with the British commissioner, who may be appointed on the occasion, will examine the persons concerned, and such other evidence as may be thought necessary, and make a joint report upon the facts of the case to J. Q. Adams, Esq., minister plenipotentiary of the United States at this court, and to the British Government.

The mode of executing this service must be left to the discretion of Mr. King and his colleague. If they can agree upon a narration of the facts, after having heard the evidence, it will be better than reporting the whole mass of testimony in detail, which they may, perhaps, find it necessary to do, if they cannot come to such an agreement.

We are, &c.

H. CLAY.
ALBERT GALLATIN.

R. G. BEASLEY, Esq., &c.

Mr. Charles King to Mr. Adams.

SIR: PLYMOUTH, April 26, 1815.

In pursuance of instructions received from Messrs. Clay and Gallatin, I have now the honor to transmit to you the report prepared by Mr. Larpent and myself, on behalf of our respective Governments, in relation to the unfortunate transaction at Dartmoor prison of war, on the 6th of the present month. Considering it of much importance that the report, whatever it might be, should go forth under our joint signatures, I have forborne to press some of the points which it involves as far as otherwise I might have done; and it therefore may not be improper, in this letter, to enter into some little explanation of such parts of the report. Although it does appear that a part of the prisoners were, on that evening, in such a state and under such circumstances as to have justified, in the view which the commander of the depot could not but take of it, the intervention of the military force, and even in a strict sense the first use of fire-arms, yet I cannot but express it as my settled opinion, that, by a conduct a little more temporizing, this dreadful alternative of firing upon the unarmed prisoners might have been avoided. Yet, as this opinion has been the result of subsequent examination, and after having acquired a knowledge of the comparatively harmless state of the prisoners, it may be but fair to consider whether, in such a moment of confusion and alarm as that appears to have been, the officer commanding could have fairly estimated his danger, or have measured out with precision the extent and nature of the force necessary to guard against it. But when the firing became general, as it afterwards appears to have done, and caught with electric rapidity from the square to the platforms, there is no plea nor shadow of excuse for it, except in the personal exasperation of the soldiery; nor for the more deliberate (and, therefore, more unjustifiable) firing which took place into three of the prisons, Nos. 1, 3, and 4, but more particularly into No. 3, after the prisoners had retired into them, and there was no longer any pretence of apprehension as to their escape. Upon this ground, as you, sir, will perceive by the report, Mr. Larpent and myself had no difference in opinion; and I am fully persuaded that my own regret was not greater than his, at perceiving how hopeless would be the attempt to trace to any individuals of the military these outrageous proceedings.

As to whether the order to fire came from Captain Shortland, I yet confess myself unable to form any satisfactory opinion, though, perhaps, the bias of my mind is that he did give such an order. But his anxiety and exertions to stop it, after it had continued some little time, are fully proved; and his general conduct, previous to this occurrence, as far as we could with any propriety enter into such details, appears to have been characterized by great fairness, and even kindness, in the relation which he stood towards the prisoners.

On the subject of any complaints existing against their own Government by the prisoners, it was invariably answered, to several distinct questions put by me on that head, that none whatsoever existed, or had been expressed by them, although they confessed themselves to entertain some animosity against Mr. Beasley, to whom they attribute their detention in this country; with what justice, you, sir, will be better able to judge. They made no complaint whatsoever as to their provisions, and general mode of living and treatment in the prison.

I have transmitted to Mr. Beasley a list of the killed and wounded on this melancholy occasion, with a request that he would forward it to the United States for the information of their friends at home; and I am pleased to have it in my power to say that the wounded are, for the most part, doing well.

I have also enclosed to Mr. Beasley the notes taken by me of the evidence adduced before us, with a request that he would have them fairly copied, as also a copy of the depositions taken before the coroner, and desired him to submit them to you when in order.

I cannot conclude, sir, without expressing my high sense of the impartiality and manly fairness with which this inquiry has been conducted on the part of Mr. Larpent, nor without mentioning that every facility was afforded to us in its prosecution, as well by the military officers commanding here and at the prison, as by the magistrates of the vicinity.

I have the honor to be, sir, with much respect, your most obedient, very humble servant,

CHARLES KING.

To His Excellency J. Q. ADAMS, &c.

Report of Messrs. Larpent and King upon the occurrence at Dartmoor prison.

PLYMOUTH, April 26, 1815.

We, the undersigned commissioners, appointed on behalf of our respective Governments to inquire into and report upon the unfortunate occurrence of the 6th of April instant, at Dartmoor prison, having carefully perused the proceedings of the several courts of inquiry instituted immediately after that event, by the orders of Admiral Sir John T. Duckworth and Major General Brown, respectively, as well as the depositions taken at the coroner's inquest, upon the bodies of the prisoners who lost their lives upon that melancholy occasion; upon which inquest the jury found a verdict of "justifiable homicide," proceeded immediately to the examination, upon oath, in the presence of one or more of the magistrates of the vicinity, of all the witnesses, both American and English, who offered themselves for the purpose, or who could be discovered as likely to afford any material information on the subject, as well those who had been previously examined before the coroner as otherwise, to the number, in the whole, of above eighty. We further proceeded to a minute examination of the prison, for the purpose of clearing up some points which, upon the evidence alone, were scarcely intelligible; obtaining from the prisoners, and from the officers of the depot, all the necessary assistance and explanation; and premising that we have been, from necessity, compelled to draw many of our conclusions from statements and evidence highly contradictory. We do now make, upon the whole of the proceedings, the following REPORT.

During the period which has elapsed since the arrival in this country of the account of the ratification of the treaty of Ghent, an increased degree of restlessness and impatience of confinement appears to have prevailed amongst the American prisoners at Dartmoor, which, though not exhibited in the shape of any violent excesses, has been principally indicated by threats of breaking out, if not soon released. On the 4th of this month, in particular, only two days previous to the event the subject of this inquiry, a large body of the prisoners rushed into the market square, from whence by the regulations of the prison they are excluded, demanding bread instead of biscuit, which had on that day been issued by the officers of the depot. Their demands, however, having been then almost immediately complied with, they returned to their own yards; and the employment of force, on that occasion, became unnecessary.

On the evening of the 6th, about six o'clock, it was clearly proved to us that a breach or hole had been made in one of the prison walls, sufficient for a full-sized man to pass, and that others had been commenced in the course of the day, near the same spot, though never completed; that a number of the prisoners were over the railing, erected to prevent them from communicating with the sentinels on the walls, which was of course forbidden by the regulations of the prison; and that, in the space between the railing and those walls, they were tearing up pieces of turf, and wantonly pelting each other in a noisy and disorderly manner; that a much more considerable number of the prisoners were collected together at that time in one of their yards, near the place where the breach was effected; and that, although such collection of prisoners was not unusual at other times, (the gambling tables being commonly kept in that part of the yard,) yet, when connected with the circumstances of the breach, and the time of the day, which was after the horn (the signal for the prisoners to retire to their respective prisons) had ceased to sound, it became a natural and just ground of alarm to those who had charge of the depot.

It was also in evidence that, in the building formerly the petty officers' prison, but now the guard barrack, which stands in the yard, to which the hole in the wall would serve as a communication, a part of the arms of the guard who were off duty were usually kept in the racks; and though there was no evidence that this was, in any respect, the motive which induced the prisoners to make the opening in the wall, or even that they were ever acquainted with the fact, it naturally became at least a further cause for suspicion and alarm, and an additional reason for precaution.

Upon these grounds, Captain Shortland appears to us to have been justified in giving the order (which about this time he seems to have given) to sound the alarm-bell, the usual signal for collecting the officers of the depot, and putting the military on the alert. However reasonable and justifiable this was as a measure of precaution, the effects produced thereby in the prisons (but which could not have been intended) were most unfortunate, and deeply to be regretted. A considerable number of prisoners in the yards where no disturbance existed before, and who were either already within their respective prisons, or quietly retiring as usual towards them, immediately upon the sound of the bell rushed back from curiosity, as it appears, towards the gates where, by that time, the crowd had assembled; and many who were at the time absent from their yards, were also, from the plan of the prison, compelled, in order to reach their own homes, to pass by the same spot. And thus, that which was merely a measure of precaution, in its operation increased the evil it was intended to prevent.

Almost at the same instant that the alarm-bell rang, (but whether before or subsequent is, upon the evidence, doubtful, though Captain Shortland states it positively as one of his further reasons for causing it to ring,) some one or more of the prisoners broke the iron chain which was the only fastening of No. 1 gate, leading into the market square, by means of an iron bar; and a very considerable number of the prisoners immediately rushed towards that gate, and many of them began to press forward, as fast as the opening would permit, into the square.

There was no direct proof before us of previous concert or preparation on the part of the prisoners, and no evidence of their intention or disposition to effect their escape on this occasion, excepting that which arose by inference from the whole of the above detailed circumstances connected together.

The natural and almost irresistible inference to be drawn, however, from the conduct of the prisoners, by Captain Shortland and the military, was, that an intention on the part of the prisoners to escape was on the point of being carried into execution, and it was at least certain that they were, by force, passing beyond the limits prescribed to them, at a time when they ought to have been quietly going in for the night.

It was also in evidence that the outer gates of the market square were usually opened about this time to let the bread-wagon pass and repass to the store, although, at the period in question, they were in fact closed.

Under these circumstances, and with these impressions necessarily operating upon his mind, and the knowledge that, if the prisoners once penetrated through the square, the power of escape was almost to a certainty afforded to them, if they should be so disposed, Captain Shortland, in the first instance, proceeded down the square, towards the prisoners, having ordered a part of the different guards, to the number of about fifty only at first, (though they were increased afterwards,) to follow him. For some time both he and Doctor Magrath endeavored, by quiet means and persuasion, to induce the prisoners to retire to their own yards, explaining to them the fatal consequences which must ensue if they refused, as the military would, in that case, be necessarily compelled to employ force. The guard was, by this time, formed in the rear of Captain Shortland, about two-thirds of the way down the square: the latter is about one hundred feet broad, and the guards extended nearly all across. Captain Shortland, finding that persuasion was in vain, and that, although some were induced by it to make an effort to retire, others pressed on in considerable numbers, at last ordered about fifteen file of the guard, nearly in front of the gate which had been forced, to charge the prisoners back to their own yards.

The prisoners were in some places so near the military that one of the soldiers states he could not come fairly to the charge, and the military were unwilling to act as against an enemy. Some of the prisoners, also, were unwilling and reluctant to retire, and some pushing and struggling ensued between the parties, arising partly from intention, but mainly from the pressure of those behind preventing those in front from getting back. After some little time, however, this charge appears to have been so far effective, and that with little or no injury to the prisoners, as to have driven them, for the most part, quite down out of the square, with the exception of a small number, who continued their resistance about No. 1 gate.

A great crowd still remained collected after this in the passage between the square and the prisoners' yards, and in the part of these yards in the vicinity of the gates. This assemblage still refused to withdraw, and, according to most of the English witnesses, and some of the American, was making a noise, hallooing, insulting, and provoking, and daring the military to fire; and, according to the evidence of several of the soldiers and some others, was pelting the military with large stones, by which some of them were actually struck. This circumstance is, however, denied by many of the American witnesses; and some of the English, upon having the question put to them, stated that they saw no stones thrown previously to the firing, although their situation at the time was such as to enable them to see most of the other proceedings in the square.

Under these circumstances the firing commenced. With regard to any order having been given to fire, the evidence is very contradictory; several of the Americans swear, very positively, that Captain Shortland gave that order; but the manner in which, from the confusion of the moment, they describe this part of the transaction, is so different in its details, that it is very difficult to reconcile their testimony. Many of the soldiers, and other English witnesses, heard the word given by some one; but no one of them can swear it was by Captain Shortland, or by any one in particular; and some, amongst whom is the officer commanding the guard, think, if Captain Shortland had given such an order, that they must have heard it, which they did not. In addition to this, Captain Shortland denies the fact; and from the situation in which he appears to have been placed at the time, even according to the American witnesses, in front of the soldiers, it may appear somewhat improbable that he should then have given such an order. But, however it may remain a matter of doubt whether the firing first began in the square by order, or was a spontaneous act of the soldiers themselves, it seems clear that it was continued and renewed both there and elsewhere without orders; and that on the platforms, and in several places about the prison, it was certainly commenced without any authority.

The fact of an order having been given at first, provided the firing was, under the existing circumstances, justifiable, does not appear very material in any other point of view than as showing a want of discipline and self-possession in the troops, if they should have fired without orders.

With regard to the above most important consideration of "whether the firing was justifiable or not," we are of opinion, under all the circumstances of the case, from the apprehension which the soldiers might fairly entertain, owing to the number and conduct of the prisoners, that this firing, to a certain extent, was justifiable in a military point of view, in order to intimidate the prisoners, and compel them thereby to desist from all acts of violence, and to retire, as they were ordered, from a situation in which the responsibility of the agent and military could not permit them with safety to remain.

From the fact of the crowd being so close, and the firing, at first, being attended with very little injury, it appears probable that a large proportion of the muskets were, as stated by one or two of the witnesses, levelled over the heads of the prisoners; a circumstance, in some respects, to be lamented, as it induced them to cry out "blank cartridges," and merely irritated and encouraged them to renew their insults to the soldiery, which produced a repetition of the firing in a manner much more destructive.

The firing in the square having continued for some time, by which several of the prisoners sustained injuries, the greater part of them appear to have been running back with the utmost confusion and precipitation to their respective prisons, and the cause for further firing seems, at this period, to have ceased. It appears, accordingly, that Captain Shortland was in the market square exerting himself and giving orders to that effect, and that Lieutenant Fortye had succeeded in stopping the fire of his part of the guard.

Under these circumstances, it is very difficult to find any justification for the further renewal and continuance of the firing, which certainly took place both in the prison yards and elsewhere, though we have some evidence of subsequent provocation given to the military, and resistance to the turnkeys in shutting the prisons, and of stones being thrown out from within the prison doors.

The subsequent firing appears rather to have arisen from the state of individual irritation and exasperation on the part of the soldiers who followed the prisoners into their yards, and from the absence of nearly all the officers, who might have restrained it, as well as from the great difficulty of putting an end to a firing when once commenced under such circumstances. Captain Shortland was, from this time, busily occupied with the turnkeys in the square, receiving and taking care of the wounded. Ensign White remained with his guard at the breach, and Lieutenants Avelyne and Fortye, the only other subalterns known to have been present, continued in the square with the main bodies of their respective guards.

The time of the day, which was the officers' dinner hour, will, in some measure, explain this, as it caused the absence of every officer from the prison whose presence was not indispensable there. And this circumstance, which has been urged as an argument to prove the intention of the prisoners to take this opportunity to escape, tended to increase the confusion, and to prevent those greater exertions being made which might, perhaps, have obviated at least a portion of the mischief which ensued. At the time that the firing was going on in the square a cross fire was also kept up from several of the platforms on the walls round the prison, where the sentries stand, by straggling parties of soldiers, who ran up there for that purpose. As far as this fire was directed to disperse the men assembled round the breach, (for which purpose it was most effectual,) it seems to stand upon the same ground as that in the first instance in the square. But that part which, it is positively sworn, was directed against straggling parties of prisoners running about the yards and endeavoring to enter the few doors which the turnkeys, according to their usual practice, had left open, does seem, as stated, to have been wholly without object or excuse, and to have been a wanton attack upon the lives of defenceless, and, at that time, unoffending individuals.

In the same, or even in more severe terms, we must remark upon what was proved as to the firing into the doorways of the prisons, more particularly into that of No. 3 prison, at a time when the men were in crowds at the entrance.

From the position of the prison and of the door, and from the marks of the balls, which were pointed out to us, as well as from the evidence, it was clear this firing must have proceeded from soldiers a very few feet from the door-way; and though it was certainly sworn that the prisoners were at the time of part of the firing, at least, continuing to insult, and occasionally to throw stones at the soldiers, and that they were standing in the way of and impeding the turnkey who was there for the purpose of closing the door, yet still there was nothing stated which could, in our view, at all justify such excessively harsh and severe treatment of helpless and unarmed prisoners, when all idea of escape was at an end.

Under these impressions, we used every endeavor to ascertain if there was the least prospect of identifying any of the soldiers who had been guilty of the particular outrages here alluded to, or of tracing any particular death at that time to the firing of any particular individual, but without success; and all hopes of bringing the offenders to punishment would seem to be at an end.

In conclusion, we, the undersigned, have only to add, that whilst we lament, as we do most deeply, the unfortunate transaction which has been the subject of this inquiry, we find ourselves totally unable to suggest any steps to be taken as to those parts of it which seem most to call for redress and punishment.

CHARLES KING,
FRANCIS SEYMOUR LARPENT.

Lord Castlereagh to Messrs. Clay and Gallatin.

GENTLEMEN: FOREIGN OFFICE, May 22, 1815.

I lost no time in laying before the Prince Regent the report made by Mr. Larpent and Mr. King, respectively appointed on the part of His Majesty's Government and that of the United States of America, to inquire into the circumstances of the late unfortunate occurrence at Dartmoor prison.

His Royal Highness has commanded me to express, through you, to the Government of America, how deeply he laments the consequences of this unhappy affair.

If any thing can tend to relieve the distress which His Royal Highness feels on this occasion, it is the consideration that the conduct of the soldiers was not actuated by any spirit of animosity towards the prisoners, and that the inactivity of the officers may be attributed rather to the inexperience of militia forces than to any want of zeal or inclination to afford that liberal protection which is ever due to prisoners of war.

But, His Royal Highness has observed, at the same time, with sincere regret, that although the firing of the troops upon the prisoners may have been justified at its commencement, by the turbulent conduct of the latter, yet that as the extent of the calamity must be ascribed to a want of steadiness in the troops, and of exertion in the officers, calling for the most severe animadversion, His Royal Highness has been pleased to direct the commander-in-chief to address to the commanding officer of the Somerset militia his disapprobation of the conduct of the troops, which, it is trusted, will make a due impression on the minds of the officers and men who were engaged in this unfortunate transaction.

As an additional proof of the sentiments which animate the Prince Regent on this occasion, I am further commanded to express His Royal Highness's desire to make a compensation to the widows and families of the sufferers; and I have to request that you, gentlemen, would make this known to your Government, inviting them, at the same time, to co-operate with His Majesty's chargé des affaires in the United States in investigating the respective claims, for the purpose of fulfilling His Royal Highness's benevolent intentions upon this painful occasion.

I request that you will accept the assurance of the distinguished consideration with which I have the honor to be, &c.

CASTLEREAGH.

To HENRY CLAY, Esq., and ALBERT GALLATIN, Esq.

Copy of a letter from Messrs. Clay and Gallatin to Lord Castlereagh.

MY LORD: HANOVER STREET, HANOVER SQUARE, May 24, 1815.

We have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your lordship's official note of the 22d instant.

Having, as we have already informed your lordship, no powers on the subject to which it refers, we will lose no time in transmitting it to our Government. We will also place in the possession of the American minister near His Britannic Majesty's Government (whose arrival here we daily expect) a copy of your lordship's note, together with a statement of what had previously passed respecting the unfortunate event at Dartmoor.

We embrace the opportunity of tendering, &c.

H. CLAY,
ALBERT GALLATIN

The Rt. Hon. VISCOUNT CASTLEREAGH,
Secretary of State for the Foreign Department, &c.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Adams to the Secretary of State, dated

JUNE 23, 1815.

He (Lord Castlereagh) then mentioned the late unfortunate occurrence at Dartmoor prison, and the measures which had been taken, by agreement, between him and Messrs. Clay and Gallatin on that occasion. I said I had received a copy of the report made by Mr. King and Mr. Larpent, after their examination into the transaction, and of the written depositions which had been taken as well on that examination as previously, at the coroner's inquest; that after what had been done, I considered the procedure as so far terminated that I was not aware of any further steps to be taken by me until I should receive the instructions of my Government on the case. From the general impression made on my mind from the evidence that I had perused, I regretted that a regular trial of Captain Shortland had not been ordered, and I thought it probable that such would be the opinion of my Government. He said that undoubtedly there were cases in which a trial was the best remedy to be resorted to, but there were others in which it was the worst; that a trial, the result of which would be an acquittal, would place the whole affair in a more unpleasant situation than it would be without it; that the evidence was extremely contradictory; that it had been found impossible to trace to any individual the most unjustifiable part of the firing; and that Captain Shortland denied having given the order to fire. I admitted that the evidence was contradictory, but said that from the impression of the whole mass of it upon me, I could not doubt either that Captain Shortland gave the order to fire, or that, under the circumstances of the case, it was unnecessary. It was true, the result of a trial might be an acquittal; but as it was the regular remedy for a case of this description, the substitution of any other was susceptible of strong objections, and left the officer apparently justified, when I could not but consider his conduct as altogether unjustifiable.

Mr. Baker, His Britannic Majesty's chargé des affaires, to the Secretary of State.

SIR: PHILADELPHIA, August 3, 1815.

In a communication made by Viscount Castlereagh, His Majesty's principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, to Messrs. Clay and Gallatin, on the 20th of last May, relative to the unfortunate occurrence at Dartmoor prison, his lordship expressed to those gentlemen, by the command of His Royal Highness the Prince Regent, how deeply His Royal Highness lamented the consequences of that unhappy affair, and that if any thing could have alleviated the distress which His Royal Highness felt on that occasion, it was the consideration that the conduct of the soldiers had not been actuated by any spirit of animosity towards the prisoners, and that the inactivity of the officers was to be attributed rather to the inexperience of a militia force than to any want of zeal or inclination to afford that liberal protection which is ever due to prisoners of war. His lordship likewise informed them that, although the firing appeared to have been justified at its commencement, by the turbulent conduct of the prisoners, yet that as the extent of the calamity was to be ascribed to a want of steadiness in the troops and of exertion in the officers, calling for the most severe animadversion, His Royal Highness has been pleased to direct the commander-in-chief to address to the commanding officer of the Somerset militia his disapprobation of the conduct of the troops, so that a due impression might be made on the minds of the officers and men engaged in that unfortunate transaction.

As an additional proof of the sentiments which animated the Prince Regent on this painful occasion, his lordship was also further commanded to express to Messrs. Clay and Gallatin His Royal Highness's desire to make a compensation to the widows and families of the sufferers.

In reiterating these sentiments on the part of His Majesty's Government, for the information of the President of the United States, I have the honor to acquaint you that I have been directed to concert with the American Government the most efficient means of carrying into execution these benevolent intentions of His Royal Highness the Prince Regent, and shall be ready, with a view of expediting the arrangements to be made, to proceed without delay to Washington for the purpose of communicating with you personally on the subject, should it suit your convenience to meet me there. I beg leave, at the same time, to suggest, as a necessary preliminary to any measures which may be adopted, that information should be procured from the different States with respect to the families of the sufferers, and any other circumstances which may facilitate the completion of the arrangements alluded to.

I have the honor to be, &c.

ANTHONY ST. JOHN BAKER.

The Hon. JAMES MONROE, &c.

The Secretary of State to Anthony St. John Baker, Esq., His Britannic Majesty's chargé des affaires.

SIR: DEPARTMENT OF STATE, WASHINGTON, December 11, 1815.

I have had the honor to receive your letter of the 3d of August, communicating a proposition of your Government to make provision for the widows and families of the sufferers in the much-to-be-lamented occurrence at Dartmoor.

It is painful to touch on this unfortunate event, from the deep distress it has caused to the whole American people. This repugnance is increased by the consideration that our Governments, though penetrated with regret, do not agree in sentiment respecting the conduct of the parties engaged in it.

Whilst the President declines accepting the provision contemplated by His Royal Highness the Prince Regent, he nevertheless does full justice to the motives which dictated it.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JAMES MONROE.

ANTHONY ST. JOHN BAKER, Esq., His Britannic Majesty's Chargé des Affaires.

DEVON, to wit:

Informations of witnesses severally taken and acknowledged on the behalf of our sovereign lord the King, touching the death of John Haywood at the prison of war at Dartmoor, in the parish of Lidford, in the county of Devon, the eighth day of April, in the fifty-fifth year of the reign of our sovereign lord King George III., before Joseph Whiteford, gentleman, one of the coroners of his said Majesty for the said county, on an inquisition then and there taken on view of the body of the said John Haywood, then and there lying dead, as follows:

THOMAS EDWARDS, a private soldier in His Majesty's first regiment of Somerset militia, on his oath, saith: That he is stationed with the said regiment at the barracks at Dartmoor, adjoining the prison of war there; that on Thursday last, the sixth day of this present month of April, he was on the guard called the west piquet guard, and at the hour of half-past six in the evening was fixed as sentinel in what is called the barrack yard, which is situated within the walls of the prison, but the yard allotted to the prisoners is separated from the barrack yard by a stone wall; that about the hour of seven in the evening of same day he (this informant) was near his post, when he heard a noise as if some persons on the other side of the wall were attempting to undermine it; whereupon he went to that part of the wall from whence the noise proceeded, and, on looking at the wall, he perceived that the mortar between the stones was moving, at the height of between three and four feet from the ground; whereupon this informant immediately went to the corner of a building which is called the cook house, and alarmed the sentinel nearest to this informant on the wall, and desired him to order the piquet out; that this informant then returned to the spot where he had seen the mortar moving, and by this time there was a hole made through the wall large enough for this informant to put his musket and bayonet through, and, on looking through the hole in the wall, he saw a great number of the prisoners, he believes to the number of three or four hundred, assembled together near the hole in the wall; and he thinks that there were altogether upwards of one thousand assembled nearly around the same place; that this informant spoke to the prisoners through the wall, and ordered them off several times, but many of the prisoners declared that they would not go, and they still continued beating against the wall; and this informant observed that one of the prisoners had an iron bar in his hand, with which he was tearing down the wall, and the prisoners within the prison were at this time hallooing and making a great noise; that the prisoners continued beating against the wall until they had made a hole in it large enough for the largest man in the prison to pass through, when this informant cocked his musket and presented it towards the prisoners, threatening to fire at them unless they desisted; when the prisoners abused this informant, asked him why he did not fire, and said he was afraid to do so, and they still continued tearing down the wall of the prison; that shortly after the piquet guard came to this informant's assistance, and then this informant left that part of the wall and went to his post; that Lieutenant

White of the same regiment commanded the piquet guard, and this informant heard him order the prisoners to go from the wall, but they refused to do so, and still continued tearing the wall down; that some of the men of the piquet guard threatened to fire at the prisoners, but Lieutenant White told them that they should not fire, and remained in the barrack yard with his party, where the hole was; that about half-past seven o'clock, whilst this informant was at his post, he heard the report of several muskets in the direction of the market place, but did not leave his post; and at this time the prisoners were still beating against the wall on the inside at several different places, but after many muskets had been discharged they quitted the wall; that this informant remained at his post until he was relieved at half-past eight o'clock, and during this time no musket was fired in the barrack yard; and after this informant was relieved he did not hear the report of any muskets, and the firing had entirely ceased; and this informant further saith that he was not within the walls of the prison, and did not see any musket discharged, but only heard the report of them.

THOMAS EDWARDS.

Sworn before me, JOSEPH WHITEFORD, Coroner.

Samuel White, a lieutenant in His Majesty's regiment of first Somerset militia, on his oath, saith: That, on Thursday last, the 6th day of the present month, (April,) he (this informant) had the west guard of the prison of war at Dartmoor, and about half-past six o'clock in the evening he was in the guard room, when, in consequence of some information he received, he ordered out the guard, and proceeded with it to the barrack yard, which adjoins that part of the prison distinguished by No. 7, and is separated therefrom by a stone wall; that Charles Edwards, now present, was then a sentinel in the barrack yard, and at his post, and at the distance of about fifteen yards from the post where Edwards was the sentinel; he (this informant) observed a hole in the wall which separated the barrack yard from the prison, large enough for a man of any size to come through; that at this time there were a great number of prisoners within the wall near the hole, and several of them tearing down the wall, and he particularly noticed two of the prisoners with iron bars in their hands, removing the stones from the wall; that this informant spoke to the prisoners repeatedly, and desired them to desist from what they were about, and told them that, unless they did, the whole of the military would be called out, and obliged to commit violence to compel them to desist: but the prisoners still continued tearing down the wall, and repeated volleys of turf and stones were thrown through the opening the prisoners had made in the wall, and over it, at this informant and the guard; and this informant was struck by some of the mortar and stones taken from the wall, and thrown at him by the prisoners, and several of the men complained of having been also struck with the stones thrown; that this informant did not see Captain Shortland, the agent for the prisoners of war, in the barrack yard, after this informant came; that when this informant spoke to the prisoners who were about the wall, they abused this informant and the guard, declared they would not leave the spot, and said "fire, fire;" that the prisoners within the walls of the prison were, throughout, in a state of disturbance, and whilst some of them were tearing down the wall, the rest were huzzaing and making a great noise, and at this time it was about the hour in the evening when the prisoners are usually locked up in their different prisons; that he (this informant) had been in the barrack yard about fifteen minutes when he heard the prisoners huzzaing and making a great noise adjoining the yard where the market is held, which is the principal entrance to the prison, and at the same time he heard the alarm-bell ring, and the drum beat to arms, and immediately after he heard the report of a single musket, which proceeded as in a direction from the prison gates leading into the market place; and this informant then proceeded towards the market place, to ascertain by whose orders the firing had commenced, leaving the piquet guard under the care of the sergeants; and in his way to the market place he heard several other muskets discharged in the same direction as the former, whereupon he immediately returned to his guard, without going to the market place, and still found the prisoners tearing down the wall between the prison and the barrack yard, endeavoring to widen the breach; that the prisoners continued tearing down the wall, when some muskets were fired from the walls by the sentinels towards the place where the breach was; whereupon the number of prisoners near the breach lessened considerably, many running towards their respective prisons, and others towards the principal gate; that some of the prisoners attempted to force their way through the breach, when he (this informant) ordered the guard to charge, and warned the prisoners against the consequences that would follow; that this informant was at this time at the breach in the wall, and part of his body was through, to see what was passing within the walls, and he then observed that the principal rush of the prisoners was towards the main gate, leading to the market place; and just at this moment he (this informant) heard a volley of musketry discharged in the market place, and immediately after the prisoners began to retreat; and shortly after, this informant saw the guard, and the rest of the soldiers who were not on guard, pass on the inside of the prison wall, opposite the breach, and they were drawn up in front of the prison No. 7, and Major Jolliff was persuading the prisoners to go to their prisons, but many of them remained at the prison door, abusing the military; that after a considerable effort on the part of the guard, the prisoners were driven into No. 7 prison, and the door locked; that at the time this informant heard the volley of musketry in the market place, or immediately after, there were several muskets fired from the different platforms where the sentinels were placed, but the firing ceased instantly after the soldiers entered the prison yard; that this informant remained with the guard until half-past eight o'clock at night, when every thing was reported to be quiet, when, by order of the field officer, the guard was returned to the guard room; that there was not a musket discharged in the barrack yard, and he (this informant) saw no person killed or wounded; that when this informant saw the prisoners rush towards the gates, they were in a very riotous, disorderly state, and they appeared to this informant as if determined to force their passage through the gateway; that the soldiers on guard are directed to refrain from any communication with the prisoners, to prevent the prisoners from getting over the iron railing within the walls of the prison, and likewise to prevent the prisoners from tearing down or undermining the walls; that in case the prisoners do not desist from such practices when spoken to, the guard is to be alarmed, but the sentinels are ordered not to fire unless in cases of absolute necessity, or where a prisoner or prisoners is or are in the act of escaping from the prison; that on the 4th day of April instant this informant was also on the guard, and the prisoners were then very disorderly, and refused to obey the commands, insomuch that the guards were turned out, the alarm-bell rung, and the drums beat to arms; and at this time, which was about seven o'clock in the evening, the prisoners had forced the gates of the prison, and had the possession of the whole of the market place, and their demand was then for bread instead of biscuit, which this informant understood had been offered them instead of bread, there being much biscuit in store; but on the 6th day of April instant he did not hear the prisoners assign any cause for their conduct. And this informant further saith, that on the 7th day of April instant he attended Admiral Sir Josias Rowley and Captain Schornberg to the walls of the prison, and heard the admiral speak to the prisoners from the platform at the main gates, opposite the prison No. 7, and requested to know their grievances, and why the breaches had been made in the wall, and the gates forced; when one of the prisoners, whom this informant understood to be one of the committee, said, in reply to the admiral, that there was no cause of complaint, and that the breach made in the wall was to get a ball which had been thrown over the wall by some of the boys; that the prisoner said that the chain at the gates was not sufficiently strong, and the press at the gates was so strong, that the gates were forced open, and one or two hundred rushed out, but that there was no intention to escape; that when this informant saw the prisoners breaking down the wall on the 6th day of April, instant, the persons employed about it were all men, and they were all the time abusing the military; and during the time this informant was in the barrack yard, no person asked for a ball, or said a ball had been thrown over the wall.

SAM. WHITE, Lieut. 1st Somerset reg't. militia.

Sworn before me, JOS. WHITEFORD, Coroner.

JOHN MITCHELL, one of the clerks in the office of Thomas George Shortland, Esq., the agent for prisoners of war at Dartmoor, in the parish of Lidford, in the county of Devon, on his oath, saith: That, on Thursday, the sixth day of April instant, about a quarter before seven in the evening, he (this informant) was in his own room, the duty of the day having been finished, except receiving the evening report, when one of the turnkeys, called Richard Arnold, came to this informant's room, and, in consequence of information which he gave, this informant walked towards the south guard, accompanied by Mr. John Bennett, store clerk at the prison, and observed the officer of the guard on the platform; and this informant went on the platform, and saw a great number of prisoners between the iron railing within the walls of the prison and the wall of the military way, which is a place where the prisoners are not permitted to go, and the prisoners were throwing peat and other light articles; that this informant then went to the guard room, where there was a report that a breach had been made by the prisoners in the hospital wall, where he immediately went, but saw no appearance of breach there. That he then returned to the lodge, and, finding that the west guard were not at their post, he went to the north guard and requested the sergeant to assemble his guard, and they followed this informant to the station of the west guard; that this informant then went to the front of the principal entrance to the prison, and saw Captain Shortland in the front of the prison, and the gate of the prison nearest to the hospital was open, and the prisoners were coming through the gates of the prison, towards the upper gates, in a body, at a quick pace, making a great noise, and using the word "keeno," which this informant has frequently heard the prisoners use when they were bent on any thing; that Captain Shortland advanced towards the prisoners, calling on the guard to follow, form, and be steady, and directed them to keep possession of the market square; that this informant followed Captain Shortland, keeping between him and the military, and this informant heard Captain Shortland desire the prisoners to return quietly to their prisons, for fear of any unpleasant consequences, and he repeatedly urged the prisoners to return to their prison, but they still continued advancing, speaking in a riotous manner, and making a great noise; and at this moment he (this informant) also saw the surgeon, Dr. Magrath, speaking to the prisoners, and he heard him persuade the prisoners to return; that, at this time, he (this informant) observed a large body of prisoners assembled at the other gate, or the opposite side of the market place, and proceeded towards this gate with an intention of observing their conduct minutely, but, on hearing a noise on his left, he turned round and observed the prisoners were much further up the square, more numerous, and part of the guards had charged their bayonets towards the prisoners to force them down, and almost at the same moment he (this informant) heard the report of a musket discharged, and the sound came from where the guard were charged to force the prisoners down, but this informant did not see any person fall; that he (this informant) ran and got in the rear of the military, and almost instantly a discharge of musketry took place from the guards who were forcing the prisoners down, and shortly after he heard various discharges of musketry from different parts of the prison; that he (this informant) did not hear any person give orders to fire; that several muskets were fired in the market square, but what number he cannot say, and, immediately after the firing had ceased, he heard Captain Shortland call for turnkeys to take up the wounded; that this informant made his way through the military, with some of the turnkeys, and the first person he saw was a black man lying on the ground, on his face, apparently dead; and there was another man wounded in the square, and sitting in the sentry box, but this informant did not notice any other; that there was then an outcry from the military for the key of the gate which leads to Nos. 5 and 7 prisons, and this informant went and procured a turnkey, who brought the key and opened the gate, and, after some of the military had passed in, this informant went inside the gate, and there saw a white man lying on the ground, also apparently dead; and at this time this informant heard the report of several single muskets, at different parts of the prison, apparently as if from the walls, and, considering it unsafe, he retired behind the military, and went again to the lodge, where he remained until there was a call for turnkeys to shut up the prison, when he procured the necessary turnkeys and sent them down, and then went towards the military himself, and, at Captain Shortland's request, went to ascertain the number of prisoners who had been sent up, and afterwards, by order of Captain Shortland, went to the surgery ward of the hospital to receive the wounded, and ascertain their number, and, whilst there, he received thirty-four prisoners, who were wounded, and one dead man was also brought to the hospital by mistake; that this informant remained there until he was sent for by Captain Shortland to report the number; that, at the time the first musket was fired, he thinks that there were about five hundred prisoners in the market square, and the foremost of them were behaving in a very riotous and disorderly manner, quite disrespectful to Captain Shortland, and without appearing to pay the least attention to what Captain Shortland or Dr. Magrath were saying, and though requested to retire they continued to advance, and seemed to this informant as if determined to force their way to the upper gates, which were then opened to permit the bread-wagon to go out; that, since the 26th day of March last, there has been much dissatisfaction among the prisoners in the prison towards Mr. Beasley, the American agent, whom the prisoners understood was appointed to send them home; and, on the 4th day of April instant, about seven o'clock in the evening, the prisoners got open the gates leading to the market square, and came up and occupied the square until about ten o'clock, when they retired to their respective prisons; that this informant went to the gates and spoke to some of the prisoners, and also went inside amongst them, and asked what they came up for, when they replied it was because they had had no bread that day; that the transport board had permitted the contractor to issue biscuit, of which he had a store, for his contract, and it was arranged by Captain Shortland that they were to have it only one day in a week, and the prisoners had been offered their rations of biscuit, which was one pound of biscuit instead of one pound and a half of soft bread, but they had refused to accept it throughout the day, but remained quiet till the evening; that, on the 6th day of April instant, soft bread had been issued to the prisoners, as usual, and Captain Shortland had, on the 5th, communicated to the committee for the prisoners that he did not intend to issue any biscuit without further directions from the board; that this informant did not observe any thing thrown by the prisoners at the military on the evening of the 6th, and did not see the prisoners armed with any offensive weapons; that if the prisoners had forced their way to the upper gate of the market square, there would have been no obstacle to their getting out of the prison, as all the gates were open; that about a quarter of an hour previous to this informant seeing the prisoners coming in a body through the gate, the usual horn, the signal for their retiring to their respective prisons, had been blown, and continued to blow nearly the whole of the time.

JOHN MITCHELL.

Sworn before me, JOSEPH WHITEFORD, Coroner.

Richard Arnold, one of the turnkeys of the prison of war at Dartmoor, on his oath, saith: That on the 6th day of April instant he (this informant) was stationed at the lower gate in the market square, adjoining to the wall of the military hospital; that just before seven o'clock in the evening this informant went on the platform in the front of the gates of the prison leading into the market square, when he saw a great number of prisoners between the iron railing and the military wall which separates the military way from the prison, and went and reported the circumstance to Mr. Mitchell, and from thence went to Mr. Holmden, the clerk of the agent at the prison, and then this informant returned towards the lodge, and there met Mr. Holmden with a guard, and he went into the prison with them to turn the prisoners from between the railing and the wall, and this informant went to the lower gate again; that, just as this informant got to the gate, he heard a sentinel call from the barrack yard to a sentinel on the platform near the market square, that the prisoners were breaking a hole through the barrack wall, and desiring him to call the guard; that this informant immediately went to the west guard and called them, and when the guard was turned out Captain Shortland came through the lodge, and went with the guard to the barrack yard, and this informant went there also, after having called the north and south guard to be in readiness if they were wanted; that on coming into the barrack yard he observed a hole in the wall on the south side of the cook room, large enough for a man to creep through, and he saw a great number of prisoners through the hole in the wall, who were abusing the soldiers and the captain; that this informant then returned to the market square, leaving Captain Shortland in the barrack yard, and the horn was then sounding for the prisoners to turn into their respective prisons, when he observed a large body of prisoners collected between the iron railing in the front of the prisons, and they were attempting to force the gates, which were locked and secured by an iron chain, and were very riotous; that this informant went away to call the guard, and met Captain Shortland at the upper gate; that the guard was outside by the guard house, drawn out, and Captain Shortland called to them to follow him, and this informant returned with him, and by this time the prisoners had forced the gate, and many hundreds had assembled in the market square; that Captain Shortland desired the soldiers to draw up, be steady, and keep their ground, and the soldiers formed just across the square; that this informant saw Captain Shortland go up in front of the military, and heard him desire the prisoners to go in, or otherwise he should be obliged to use means which he should be very sorry for; that the prisoners were very riotous, calling out "keeno, keeno," several times, and advanced instead of retiring, when some of the soldiers came to a charge, and this informant made the best of his way to get in their rear, and just after he got in the rear he heard a single musket, and soon after he heard several muskets discharged, but the muskets were at first elevated so high that he does not think a single shot touched either of the prisoners, and he then observed that many of the prisoners had got a great way in the yard, when some of them called out "Fire, you buggers, you have no shot in your pieces or guns;" when the military fired again, and this informant heard a great cry amongst the prisoners, and almost immediately he heard Captain Shortland call for the turnkeys to help the wounded away; that this informant saw one man dead in the gateway of prison No. 7, and saw several men carried towards the hospital wounded, but he does not know any of them; that this informant did not hear any person give orders to fire; that he was near to Captain Shortland when the firing first began, and, if Captain Shortland had given any orders to fire, he thinks that he must have heard them; that between the first discharge and the second the prisoners had retreated from the market square towards the prison, but had made a stand when the second firing commenced; that he did not see the prisoners armed with any offensive weapons, nor did he see them throw any stones at the military; that the same evening, after the prisoners were locked up, he went into the prison yard, and saw several places in the wall where the stones had been taken out, but there was only one hole entirely through the wall.

RICHARD ARNOLD.

Sworn before me, JOS. WHITEFORD, Coroner.

Stephen Hall, one of the turnkeys at the prison of war at Dartmoor, on his oath, saith: "That on the 6th day of April instant, about a quarter before seven o'clock in the evening, he went into the market square, and went to the lower gate, when he saw some of the prisoners come over in a body from the wall which separates the barrack yard from the prison, and they came to the gate next to the hospital, and forced the gate open, and went up towards the market square; that this informant was close by Captain Shortland in the square, and heard the captain desire them to go back, but they said they would not; that there were some soldiers at this time formed in the market square, and when the prisoners refused to retire they came to a charge, and then this informant went to the rear, when he heard a single musket fire; and at this time he had not heard any person give orders to fire, nor did he hear any such orders given afterwards; that after the musket was fired he went towards the lodge, and heard several muskets fired, and shortly after he heard the captain call for the turnkeys to bring up the wounded, when this informant went down and assisted in taking up two wounded men, one of them in the market square and the other in the prison, and he also picked up one man dead in the market square, but he does not know the man; that when this informant saw the prisoners coming across the yard towards the gate, they were behaving in a very riotous manner, and this informant observed that they had some iron bars, and he thinks that three of the men had an iron bar each; that he did not see either of the men attempt to strike with them, and he did not see either of the prisoners throw any thing towards the military; that this informant heard the alarm-bell ring just before he saw the prisoners come across the prison and force the gate; that after they had forced the gate this informant persuaded the prisoners to go back, but they refused to do so; that they made no complaints whatever in this informant's hearing; that on the 7th day of April instant, he was at the lower gate, when he heard some persons who were walking between the railing, and they were talking about a black man that was killed; and this informant heard the prisoners say, if the black man had not been killed he would have killed Captain Shortland, and that he had a knife in his pocket prepared to stab him; that there was no person present with this informant at the time he heard this conversation, and he does not know the prisoners who were talking together.

STEPHEN HALL.

Sworn before me, JOSEPH WHITEFORD, Coroner.

Richard Cephus, an American prisoner of war, on his oath, saith: "That he hath this day seen the bodies of several men lying dead at the dead-house in the hospital at Dartmoor, and amongst them he saw the body of John Haywood, a black man; that John Haywood was in prison No. 4, with this informant, and on Thursday last, about half-past five in the evening, he went to the privy adjoining to prison No. 4, and had not been there above a few minutes when he heard a firing of musketry as from the market square and the ramparts around the prison; that at first there was a single musket which he heard the report of, and immediately after several volleys were fired; that about six o'clock he came out of the privy and then saw John Haywood going down to go out of the prison, and asked him where he was going: he said he was going out to see what the firing was about, and parted from this informant; that this informant went back to the privy, and about ten minutes after he heard that Haywood was dead, but did not see him till this day; that this informant was not out in the prison yard from four o'clock in the afternoon of the 6th day of April instant until the following day about half-past eight in the morning.

RICHARD CEPHUS, his × mark.

Sworn before me, JOSEPH WHITEFORD, Coroner.

GEORGE MAGRATH, surgeon at the hospital at the prison of war at Dartmoor, on his oath, saith: That, on the 6th day of April instant, about ten minutes before seven o'clock in the evening, whilst sitting in his own house, he heard the alarm-bell ring on the outside of the prison, and immediately ran out, and, on arriving at that part of the military way which fronts the market square, he saw a line of soldiers drawn up on the outside of the square fronting the outer gate; that, on looking into the square, he observed a considerable body of the prisoners advancing up the square, and, having understood that the prisoners were breaking out, this informant, with as much haste as he could, advanced towards them; as soon as this informant got amongst them, he began to exhort them to return quietly into the prison, and told them that he feared any attempt of that kind (meaning an attempt to escape) would be attended with serious consequences; that many of the prisoners told this informant that they were kept an unnecessary length of time in prison after they considered themselves as free, or some words to that effect; that this informant observed to them that their detention appeared to be entirely the fault of their own agent, Mr. Beasley; and several of those whom this informant had addressed, appearing to be sensible of the truth of what this informant had advanced, went back and retired towards the gate leading into the prison from the market square; that this informant continued to address himself to others, and, whilst expostulating with them, this informant saw the soldiers march down the square and form in a line fronting the prisoners, about the middle of the square, and, during this time, greater numbers of the prisoners were pressing up through the gate; and whilst this informant was still using language to those whom he addressed, calculated to induce them to return into prison, he heard a voice (but whose it was this informant did not know) ordering the soldiers to charge; that, at this time, Captain Shortland was near to this informant, and he appeared to be employing the same means as he (this informant) was, to induce the prisoners to return to the prison; that, on hearing the word "charge" given, he looked round, (for his back was then to the soldiers, and his face towards the prison,) and found himself on the point of the soldiers' bayonets, who were close to him; that he (this informant) was driven a considerable way, at the point of the bayonet, with the prisoners, when he found it necessary to make some attempt to extricate himself, and succeeded in getting round the left wing, which rested on the wall which separates the market square from the hospital, and, whilst this informant was endeavoring to get round, the firing commenced—at first he heard two or three muskets, but afterwards the discharges became more frequent, and almost amounted to a volley; that, as soon as this informant had extricated himself, being apprehensive that his assistance might be required, in consequence of the firing, he went to make preparation for the purpose; that this informant went to his own house and carried some instruments to the receiving-room of the hospital, where he awaited the arrival of some wounded men, but he did not see any of those who were killed on the spot until this morning; that this informant has this day examined the body of a black man, stated to be called John Haywood, and found that the ball had entered a little posterior to the acremien of the left shoulder; passing obliquely upwards, it made its egress about the middle of the right side of the neck, and, in the judgment of this informant, he died of that wound, which appeared to have been inflicted by a musket ball; that this informant, at the time the order was given to charge, was in warm conversation with the prisoners, and, therefore, cannot take upon himself to say who gave the order, but this informant heard no person give an order to fire; that there was a great deal of confusion among the prisoners, and, therefore, he cannot speak to the general conduct of the prisoners; but those to whom this informant spoke appeared disposed to listen to him, and many receded towards the gate amongst those with whom this informant had been conversing; that the number of the prisoners that were assembled in the market square he cannot say, or even form an estimate, but there was a considerable crowd together, and, during the time this informant was in conversation with the men, they were pressing forward in a body; that, as the whole of this informant's attention was engrossed with a few to whom this informant addressed himself, he cannot take upon himself to give any opinion as to the necessity of coercion; but this informant is of opinion that the prisoners ought not to have been in that situation at so late an hour in the evening; that there was a great clamor of voice, and a general murmur among the prisoners, but this informant did not observe them proceed to any acts of violence before he came away; that, after he came away, and in going to his own house, and from thence to the hospital, he heard the discharge of musketry; and this informant's attention was not attracted to it above two or three minutes, but whether it continued beyond that time he cannot say.

GEORGE MAGRATH.

Sworn before me, JOSEPH WHITEFORD, Coroner.

JOHN ODIORNE, a citizen of the United States of America, on his oath, saith: That he has been at the prison of war at Dartmoor ever since the 29th day of September last: that, on Thursday last, the 6th day of April instant, a little after six o'clock in the evening, he was at the store in market square, standing by the door, and the wagon with the bread for the prisoners was partly unladen, when this informant heard some person talking loud at the gate at the upper end, and went around the wagon to see who it was, and saw Captain Shortland advancing into the yard, and he was giving his orders to the turnkeys at the lodge in a loud voice; and Richard Arnold spoke to him, and told him something about the wall, when Captain Shortland said, "Damn you, why did not you tell me about it before? ring the bell; call the guard out:" that the guard immediately followed Captain Shortland into the yard, when he ordered them to form across the yard, about two-thirds of the way down: that there were not soldiers enough to stretch across the yard, and they formed with their right on the southern wall, leaving some distance between their left and the northern wall: that Captain Shortland used some harsh expressions to the guard, and bade them form on the northern wall, for that was the place where the prisoners were coming; and just as Captain Shortland gave the orders, this informant saw the prisoners force the gate No. 1, which adjoins the hospital wall; and before this time this informant had not seen a single prisoner in the market square, except those who were employed with him: that there could not have been a body of men in the square without the informant's seeing them, as at this time he was on the steps, at the store, which is about ten feet high, and commands a complete view of the square: that, after the prisoners had advanced to the distance of between twenty-five and thirty feet, Captain Shortland then ordered the men to charge upon them, and the soldiers charged upon the prisoners, when they retreated into the yard, leaving one man behind, who appeared to this informant to have fallen down, and a soldier was standing over him with a bayonet, threatening to stab him if he did not get up; and the man on the ground appeared to be drunk, but this informant could not hear what he said: that, after the prisoners had retreated within the prison, this informant saw an officer put his hand to the gate which opened against the hospital wall, as this informant thought to shut the gate; but instead of shutting it he retreated to the soldiers, at a little distance from the gate, when he heard an order given to fire by Captain Shortland, as the informant supposed, for he was looking directly at him: that the order was not instantly complied with as soon as a musket might have been fired; but in a few seconds a musket was fired by a person at the right of Captain Shortland, a few paces in advance of the others, and immediately after two muskets were fired to the left of Captain Shortland, by the hospital wall, and after that there was a general discharge; and immediately after the general discharge a party of soldiers marched into No. 1 yard, through the gate, and fired a volley, and then wheeled about and returned into the square, and after the soldiers had returned into the square and formed into line, the officer ordered them to fire, and immediately the whole line across the square fired into the yard; after which the line broke up and advanced into the yard, and this informant could not see any further, but he heard the report of guns in the yard: that, soon after, this informant saw a prisoner coming out of the yard, bringing a prisoner on his back, and a corporal or sergeant spoke to the man, abused him, called him a coward, and said, "this comes of your keeno:" that this informant spoke to the sergeant or corporal, and abused him for having spoken so to the wounded man; but by the advice of Mr. John Arnold he went into the store, and remained there all night: that, about forty minutes, or forty-five, before he saw Captain Shortland, he was in No. 7 prison yard, and he did not perceive there was any thing the matter; there was a great crowd round the gambling tables, as usual, but he was not near the place where this informant has seen the holes mended in the wall: that he saw a small hole in the wall the day before, about six or seven inches in depth, and, on inquiring what it was done for, some person said it was done to make quoits with: that this informant never heard that the hole was made for boys to go out and fetch their balls. And this informant further saith that he did not see Dr. Magrath in the square addressing the prisoners, nor did he see him either go in or out.

JOHN ODIORNE.

ADDISON HOLMES, a citizen of the United States of America, on his oath, saith: That on Thursday, the 6th day of this present month of April, between the hours of five and six o'clock in the evening, he was at the lower part of the yard of the prison No. 3, and, understanding that a hole had been broken through the wall in the prison No. 7, by the boys, to get at their balls, he was going to see it; and hearing the alarm-bell rung, he went into the market square, having found the gate open, and there were about a dozen prisoners in the square, and a great many more followed after him; he was going up to see what the alarm-bell was rung for, when he saw the troops entering the outer gate of the square, and Captain Shortland was with them: that, as the troops came through the gate, they were paraded across the square; and this informant saw Dr. Magrath at the left of the troops, talking to about a dozen of the prisoners, advising them to go down to the prison quietly; and some of them turned and went towards the gate, but others were talking with him still: that at this time there was a considerable body of prisoners in the rear: that Captain Shortland was in front of the troops, and about the middle of them, speaking to one man, who wanted to say something to him; but it appeared that the captain would have no conversation with him, and pushed him from him twice, when the man turned about and was going down slowly: that the captain then turned round and ordered the troops to charge their bayonets, twice; but they did not do so until they were ordered by one of their own officers, and then the troops charged their bayonets and the prisoners were forced on before them, and Dr. Magrath, being in front, stepped in between two bayonets, and got to the rear: that this informant stepped aside, and got between two sentry boxes, and the troops passed him; and by this time the prisoners were forced to the gate, had got inside the prison, and shut the gate after them; but Captain Shortland, who was in front of the troops, shoved the gate open, and this informant, thinking it was a good opportunity for him to get in, pushed on between two men, and then saw that Captain Shortland had hold of a musket, and immediately that musket was discharged; but whether Captain Shortland pulled the trigger or not this informant does not know; and immediately after there was firing at the left: that Captain Shortland had ordered the troops to fire before he took hold of the musket, but he was not obeyed, and then took hold of the musket, and he believes the soldier had hold of it at the same time: that just after the firing at the left, as he (this informant) was passing between two men, one of whom had discharged his musket, this man was hauling his musket back to stab this informant, and before he drew it past this informant, he (this informant) unshipped the bayonet and threw it on the ground, and then pushed off the bayonet on the left with his arm, and got in round the gate, when the soldiers immediately fired another round, and he saw a man fall: that this informant stopped a few minutes, and the soldiers fired several rounds, and this informant went round the prison No. 1, to the prison No. 3, and the soldiers were firing from the walls up the prison: that this informant got into the prison No. 3, when two rounds were fired into the prison door, which killed one man and wounded another; but who it was that was killed he does not know: that directly after this the prison doors were shut, and he heard no more of it: that he cannot say what was doing in the yard of prison No. 7, as he was not there; but the prisoners in the yard of prison No. 3 were walking the yard quietly, it being just before the time of turning in when he heard the alarm-bell.

JOHN ARNOLD, steward of the prisoners in health at the prison of war at Dartmoor, on his oath, saith: That on Thursday, the 6th day of April instant, about seven o'clock in the evening, he was at the door of the contractor's store in the market square, receiving bread from a wagon into the store, and John Odiorne, an American prisoner, was with him, when suddenly he heard a great noise at the bottom of the square, and some persons were saying that the prisoners were pulling down the barrack wall, and the soldiers were running through the military way, as this informant supposed, to get their arms; and almost immediately after the alarm-bell was rung, and the drums beat to arms, and the horns sounded; that, soon after, this informant saw a great body of prisoners between the railing and the market square, and some prisoners were in the market square; that just about this time, he (this informant) saw Dr. Magrath and Mr. McFarlane, the surgeons, go down the market square, and, just after, Captain Shortland also came into the market square, and the soldiers marched in with their officers; that this informant ordered the wagon away, not thinking it safe to let it remain, as the prisoners were at this time very riotous; and just as this informant had ordered the wagon away, the prisoners burst open the gate next the hospital and rushed in the market square, in a very large body, and at this time the outer gates were all open to permit the wagon to pass; and this informant believed, at the time, that the prisoners, taking advantage of the circumstance, were endeavoring to effect their escape; that the soldiers were formed across the square, and the prisoners had advanced in a body, in a riotous manner, calling out "keeno," close to the soldiers, within musket length, or thereabout, wher the soldiers immediately charged upon the prisoners, but this informant did not hear any order to charge given, and this informant thinks that, from the noise made by the prisoners, it was impossible to hear any word of command; that the soldiers drove the prisoners at the point of their bayonets within the gates of the prison, whereupon the prisoners turned their faces towards the soldiers, still continuing assembled together in a large body, and began to throw stones at the soldiers, and, from the appearance of the size of the stones, he (this informant) has no doubt but that some of them were five or six pounds in weight; that the prisoners threw a great number of stones, and continued doing so for about two minutes, when this informant saw one of the muskets from the soldiers discharged towards the prison yard, and within a minute afterwards he saw the whole party fire their muskets, and it appeared to this informant that the muskets were elevated above the prisoners; that there was a large body of the prisoners assembled in the three yards in front of the gate, and stones were throwing in all directions towards the military, when this informant saw the soldiers fire their muskets towards the prisoners, and, about this time, he saw Dr. Magrath and Mr. McFarlane run up the market square, and soon after he saw a man brought up wounded; that this informant was standing on the steps of the store all the time before alluded to, and could distinctly see what was passing, except when the soldiers were involved in the smoke; that Odiorne and six or seven American prisoners were standing on the steps of the store, and they all saw the prisoners throwing stones at the soldiers; and this informant remarked to them, that, if the prisoners continued to assault the soldiers so, some of them would be shot; that this informant never heard Captain Shortland give any directions to the soldiers to fire, and he was so near to Odiorne that if orders had been given which he might have heard, he (this informant) must have heard also, as he has as quick an ear as most people; and this informant further saith, that the firing was very irregular, and it did not seem like firing in obedience to orders; and this informant further saith, that it appeared to him the soldiers were in danger from the stones thrown at them by the prisoners.

JOHN ARNOLD.

WILLIAM GIFFORD, a private soldier in His Majesty's first regiment of Somerset militia, on his oath, saith: That on Thursday, the 6th day of this present month of April, about half-past six o'clock in the evening he (this informant) was posted as sentinel in the market place, at the gate adjoining the hospital wall; that about half an hour after this informant had been posted, he heard the prisoners huzzaing in the yard of prison No. 7, and soon after the west guard, to which this informant belonged, was called for; that this informant then saw a prisoner come from No. 7 yard, with an iron bar in his hand, and a great number of prisoners were following him, and the prisoner who had the bar broke the lock of the gate, where this informant was sentinel, with it, and the prisoners rushed out as fast as they could come, crying out "keeno;" whereupon the alarm-bell was rung, and part of the north guard came into the market square, and Captain Shortland was with them; that the soldiers formed on the left side, where the crowd of prisoners was forcing up, there not being enough to form across the yard; that Captain Shortland spoke to the prisoners and ordered them back, but they did not go, and at this time they were so close to the military that they could be touched by the bayonet; that Captain Shortland ordered the soldiers to charge, which they did, and forced the prisoners almost to the prison gate, but they would not go into the prison yard, and stood fast at the gate; that the prisoners then began to throw stones at the soldiers, and this informant saw several of the men's caps knocked off with the stones; that the prisoners were very riotous, huzzaing and throwing a great number of stones or bricks at the soldiers, when this informant heard the word "fire" given by some person, but whom he does not know; that this informant immediately heard a discharge of musketry, and saw that the muskets were presented in the air; that the prisoners still continued huzzaing and throwing stones at the military, when the soldiers began to fire towards the prisoners, and this informant afterwards saw two men, like prisoners, lying in the market place apparently dead, one on the right side of the guard and the other on the left; that the soldiers then went into the different prison yards to turn the prisoners in, and this informant heard some firing in the yards; that Major Jolliff had the command of the first Somerset regiment of militia, but he was not present when the first firing commenced; and this informant further saith, that the stones thrown at the soldiers were large enough to have killed some of them, and the stones were thrown so thick that it appeared to this informant the soldiers were in great danger; that this informant did not discharge his musket at all; that this informant was near to Captain Shortland when the prisoners were forced to the prison gate, and he never saw Captain Shortland with a musket in his hand, or attempt to take a musket: if he had, he (this informant) thinks that it was impossible for him not to have seen it; that he never heard Captain Shortland give any orders to fire, and this informant was so near to him that he thinks he must have heard him if he had given any such orders; that whilst the prisoners were huzzaing, many continued calling out "murder the rascal," by which this informant understood they meant Captain Shortland—and this was before any firing took place; and this informant further saith, that he did not hear or see a musket discharged on the evening of the 6th day of April instant before the prisoners began to throw stones.

JAMES GROVES, a private soldier in the first regiment of Somerset militia, on his oath, saith: That he was placed as sentinel in the barrack yard at Dartmoor prison, on the 6th day of April instant, and was relieved by Thomas Edwards at half-past six o'clock in the evening; that about five o'clock in the evening a ball was thrown over the wall close by the old cook room, which is now the armorer's shop, and the armorer was there at the door at the time, and he caught up the ball and threw it over the wall into the prison again; that this informant saw no other ball whilst he was on sentry, and no person whatever called to this informant to throw over any ball; that just at the time the armorer was about to throw the ball over, some person from the prison called out "throw the ball over," but after the ball was thrown over this informant heard no further call; that whilst this informant remained on sentry he did not hear any attack upon the wall, and saw no breach whatever therein.

Sworn before me, JOS. WHITEFORD, Coroner.

DAVID SPENCER WARREN, a citizen of the United States of America, on his oath, saith: That on Thursday last, the 6th day of April instant, in the evening, about half an hour before the usual time of turning in the prisoners, he heard the alarm-bell, and went up to the gate of the yard of the prison No. 1, and when he arrived there he saw a number of prisoners in the market square, and a number of soldiers were in the square, and Captain Shortland was at the head of one party of them, and he was forming a line across the yard, which after he had done, he told them to charge; that the soldiers did charge on the prisoners, who ran back into the prison yard, and Captain Shortland and the soldiers followed them to the gate, and as the prisoners got inside the gate they flung one of them to; that Captain Shortland ordered one of the soldiers to fire, and immediately there was a soldier with his musket turned to the right, and Captain Shortland caught hold of the musket and pointed it towards a man that stood by the gate, and said "God damn you, fire;" that directly after this a fire of musketry became general; that this informant went through No. 1 prison and into No. 3, and was in prison No. 3 when the soldiers fired into the prison No. 3; and there was a man called Smith, a shipmate of this informant, wounded, and he also saw a man fall on the inside of the prison, but whether he was killed or wounded this informant cannot say; that this informant did not see any of the officers with the soldiers when Captain Shortland gave the order to fire; that after the firing began he saw some stones, he believes two or three, thrown by the prisoners over the wall into the square—he saw one of them about as big as his fist; that this informant did not observe whether the muskets were elevated at the first firing, but he did not see any man fall, and therefore he remarked to some of the prisoners that he thought they were blank cartridges; that this informant was not in the yard of No. 7.

DAVID S. WARREN.

James Greenlaw, a citizen of the United States of America, on his oath, saith: That on Thursday, the 6th day of April instant, he was in No. 3 yard, near the door of the prison, when he heard the alarm-bell ring; that he went from thence towards the railing, at the entrance into the market square, and saw some prisoners in the market square, and at the same time he saw the troops coming through the market gate, with Captain Shortland at their head, and saw him form the men in one line extending across the square, and he then ordered them to charge: whereupon the prisoners retreated into the prison yard, when this informant heard Captain Shortland give orders for the soldiers to fire upon the prisoners; and thereupon this informant ran into No. 4 yard, for shelter, and as this informant turned to go back again he saw two black men, whom he did not know, fall; that as soon as this informant thought the firing had ceased, he ran up towards the grating to speak to Captain Shortland, and asked if he would allow him to speak to him, when Captain Shortland said "No, you damned rascal!" whereupon two soldier officers put their swords through the iron railing towards this informant, and one soldier pricked him with his bayonet; that this informant then retreated into No. 3 yard, and he then heard two distinct volleys, and the soldiers shortly after came into No. 3 yard, when he retreated into No. 3 prison, and sat down inside to assist in dressing a wounded man, and a moment after this he heard two distinct volleys fired into the prison, which killed one man and severely wounded another; that this informant did not see any stones thrown from the prison into the square until the firing had commenced, and then he saw two stones thrown over the wall from No. 4 prison; that this informant was not in No. 7 prison yard.

JAMES GREENLAW.

Sworn before me, JOS. WHITEFORD, Coroner.

Thomas Burgess Mott, a citizen of the United States of America, on his oath, saith: That on the 6th day of April instant, this informant was in prison No. 5, when some persons came to him, as being one of the committee for the prisoners, and, in consequence of the information they gave, he procured some assistance, and was going out of the door of the prison to go towards a wall which he understood some men and boys were breaking, to prevent it; and just as he came to the door of the prison he heard a fire of musketry, as from the gateway of the market square, and met a crowd of prisoners retiring to their prisons, apparently in great confusion; when most of the people had passed, he met a man between No. 5 and No. 6 prisons, who was wounded and bleeding very much, and the man leaned on this informant, and he was proceeding towards the gateway to take him to the surgeon, but the fire of musketry and the balls came so thick that he stepped forward a step or two to request permission to take the wounded man away, but he believes he was not heard; that he then turned to the back of No. 5 cook house, out of the way of the fire, where several others were standing, and they had not opened a fire from the ramparts of the lower wall which commanded the lower door of No. 5 prison; but as this informant and the others turned from the place to go into the prison, a fire of musketry was discharged towards the only door which was open of No. 5 prison, and shortly after this informant saw two men in the prison dead, but he does not know their names himself, or where they were killed, and he saw also several others wounded.

THOS. B. MOTT.

Sworn before me, JOS. WHITEFORD, Coroner.

Enoch Burnham, a citizen of the United States, on his oath, saith: That on Thursday, the 6th day of April instant, about half-past six o'clock in the evening, he went to the railing of the market place, and remained there about half an hour, when he saw a crowd of the prisoners making a noise, but the principal part of them were youngsters, full of mischief, and they came, some of them, between the two railings, and he saw seven or eight go into the market square, but there was no great body there; that at this time he saw some soldiers come down the square, and Captain Shortland with them, and the soldiers charged upon the prisoners, who retreated into No. 1 prison yard, without making any resistance; that this informant remained at the gate when the military began to fire, and at this time there was no crowd of prisoners within the gate—there might have been forty or fifty men; that when the firing commenced he retreated into the prison yard, and lay down by the wall, and the prisoners who were about the gate also retreated; that this informant lay by the wall about five or seven minutes, when this informant went up by the barrack wall, towards where there was a hole, and the soldiers then began to fire from the ramparts of the south wall, when he went to No. 7 prison, and got as far as the steps, when a heavy firing again commenced from the wall, and this informant lay down to save his life for about four or five minutes, and then got into the prison, and was going through to go to his own prison, and had got to the steps, when the firing commenced from the platform next to the south corner; whereupon he retreated into No. 7 again, and went into the north end, and saw one prisoner in the yard who appeared to be wounded, and he ran back against the wall and he saw several soldiers raise their muskets and fire at him, and he fell immediately, but this informant does not know who the man was; that this informant saw the wounded man lift up his hands towards the soldiers before they fired; that this informant did not see any stones thrown, but he heard some of the youngsters speak about throwing stones; that he did not hear the word to fire given, and he was near the gratings; when the military first began to fire, they were at some distance from the gratings.

ENOCH BURNHAM.

Sworn before me, JOS. WHITEFORD, Coroner.

Robert Holmden, first clerk to Captain Shortland at the prison of war at Dartmoor, on his oath, saith: That on Thursday, the 6th day of April instant, Richard Arnold, the turnkey, reported to this informant that the prisoners had got over the iron railing, near the south guard; whereupon he (this informant) went to an officer on the ramparts, and from him understood that a guard was going in to turn them out, and, on returning to the entrance gate, he met the guard going down; that there was also a rumor that a hole had been broken in the hospital wall; whereupon he went and reported it to Captain Shortland, who came out of the house, and went with this informant to the entrance gate, when they understood the hole was in the barrack wall, and Captain Shortland, with Sergeant Manning and some soldiers, went to the barrack yard, and found that a hole large enough for a person to creep through had been made; that Captain Shortland cautioned some prisoners who were looking through the aperture in the wall, and recommended them to retire, but they remained there; and a guard was left at the breach, and Captain Shortland and this informant returned to the entrance gate, and had not been there long when it was reported to Captain Shortland that the prisoners had forced one of the lower iron gates: whereupon Captain Shortland ordered the alarm-bell to be rung; and as soon as the guards could be collected, he went with them into the market square; and at this time he (this informant saw) a great number of prisoners coming up the north side of the yard in a riotous and disorderly state; that after a short time had elapsed, he (this informan) heard one shot fired, which was followed by several others; that he did not go down amongst the prisoners, or see what took place there.

ROBERT HOLMDEN.

Sworn before me, JOSEPH WHITEFORD, Coroner.

HOMER HULL, a citizen of the United States of America, on his oath, saith: That he is in the prison No. 3; that on the 6th day of April instant, he (this informant) was walking in the lower part of the prison yard No. 7, about six o'clock in the evening, when, in consequence of a report he heard in the prison, he observed some drunken men breaking down the wall which separates the barrack yard from No. 7 yard; and one of the soldiers called from the wall at the corner of the barrack yard, and said, "Go in, men; they are going to charge upon you." That this informant went away towards the prison No. 3, and had to go out of No. 7 yard, near the market square, when he saw some drunken men, about half a dozen in number, at the gate leading into the market square, attempting to force it—one of them had a small iron bolt in his hand, and they succeeded in getting the gate open; that the man who forced the gate v ent a few yards into the square before any followed him, and then some others went in; that just at the time the gate was forced open, he saw some soldiers come into the market square at the upper gate, and Captain Shortland was with them; and at this time this informant thinks there were about sixty men in the square; that the soldiers marched about two-thirds of the way down, when Captain Shortland gave the soldiers orders to charge, and the soldiers accordingly charged, when the prisoners retreated into the prisons, and one of them shut to the gates; and the soldiers marched down a little further, when Captain Shortland ordered them to fire; that this informant went to his own prison, and tried to get in, but the crowd was so great that he could not succeed; that he tried at other prisons, but could not get in, and *there succeeded; that the alarm-bell had not rung when the soldier first ordered them to go into their prisons; that this informant heard the alarm-bell ring just after the man ordered them to go into their prisons; that he did not see any stones thrown before the musketry began to be discharged, but afterwards he saw a stone thrown from the prison yard towards the square.

HOMER HULL.

Sworn before me, JOSEPH WHITEFORD, Coroner.

ROBERT MCFARLANE, assistant surgeon at the prison of war at Dartmoor, on his oath, saith: That on Thursday, the 6th day of this present month of April, about seven o'clock in the evening, or rather afterwards, he was at the outer gate of the prison, when he heard the alarm-bell ring, and immediately went to the lodge, and seeing the guard drawn up in line in front of the guard house, he observed Captain Shortland walking by himself from the barrack yard towards the guard; that this informant turned round and looked down the market yard, and saw a multitude of prisoners proceeding up the square; whereupon he went down with Dr. Magrath, who came just at this moment, and began to reason with a number of prisoners there on the unnecessary steps they were taking; that some of them seemed to pay attention to what this informant said, and turned aside towards the prison, but others said they were not prisoners of war, and that they were determined to be out—one of whom had a stick behind his back, in his hand; that this informant saw Captain Shortland reasoning with a number of them to go back into the prisons, but they used very abusive language towards him, and this was in front of the guard; that this informant had taken two by the shoulders, and was insisting upon their going back; and, on looking back, the guard had charged, and this informant with great difficulty got himself extricated from between the bayonets; that by the time this informant got to the rear of the guard a single musket was fired, and immediately after several others; that this informant heard no order given to fire; that Captain Shortland was at the south end of the guard, and this informant thinks if he had given orders to fire he must have heard it; that at the time the first musket was fired, nearly one-third of the market square was filled with the prisoners, making a great noise in a very riotous and disorderly manner, and stones were throwing by the prisoners from all quarters, and one large stone fell about a yard from this informant; that immediately after the firing commenced, and this informant had got to the rear, he went away to the hospital; that from the number and size of the stones which were thrown, if he (this informant) had been obliged to remain on the spot where the soldiers were, he should have apprehended great danger to his person.

ROB. MCFARLANE.

Sworn before me, JOS. WHITEFORD, Coroner.

JOHN TOZER, one of the turnkeys at the prison, on his oath, saith: That, on Thursday, the 6th day of April instant, about seven o'clock in the evening, the turnkeys were called into the market square, and he found that it was to take up some dead and wounded prisoners; that he went to the lower market gate, and just inside the gate he took up a black man dead, and assisted in carrying him to the bathing place in the hospital; that the man appeared to be about thirty; but this informant should not know him again.

JOHN TOZER.

Sworn before me, JOS. WHITEFORD, Coroner.

JOSEPH MANNING, sergeant in the first Somerset regiment of militia, on his oath, saith: That on Thursday, the 6th day of this present month of April, about seven o'clock in the evening, he was in the military way when he saw Captain Shortland, and reported to him that the prisoners had made a hole in the wall leading to the barracks, and he went with this informant, an officer, and some other persons, to see it; that this informant kept before Captain Shortland, and went away to the breach first, and saw the prisoners pulling the wall, and he desired them to desist, but they gave him abusive language, and he then took a musket and threatened to fire at them if they would not leave off, and they then drew back a little; that Lieutenant Evelyn then interfered, and put his head in the breach, telling them if they did not desist the consequences would be serious; Captain Shortland then inquired for Major Jolliff, and, by Captain Shortland's directions, this informant went to call Major Jolliff, and met him between the south guard and the barracks, when he ordered the troops to be formed, and put himself at the head of the grenadiers, and before Major Jolliff had gone ten yards from the south guard gate the firing commenced; that this informant, by Major Jolliff's orders, remained behind, to assist in forming the regiment; that it was impossible for Major Jolliff to give orders to fire, as he was not near the spot where the firing first began.

JOS. MANNING, Sergeant 1st Somerset regiment.

Sworn before me, JOS. WHITEFORD, Coroner.

Examinations at the Guildhall of Plymouth, on Friday, the 21st April, 1815.

Present, John Hawker, Esq., one of the magistrates of the county of Devon.

JOHN RUST, one of the committee of the American prisoners at Dartmoor, being sworn, says: The report made of the occurrence of the 6th instant, signed by me, was from the evidence of other persons. About six o'clock in the evening I came from the place where I was taking supper, and persuaded the prisoners to leave the breach; they did go away towards the square previous to the commencement of the firing. At the time I went to the breach the horn had not sounded; it sounded but a few minutes before the firing. I heard the alarm-bell ring before the firing took place; the firing continued at intervals about fifteen minutes. After the firing commenced, I went round the southeast part of prison No 7, and went in at the southeast door. I saw nothing of the firing in the market square.

JOHN T. TROWBRIDGE, one of the committee, being sworn, says: I made no part of the report from my own knowledge, but I was one of them employed in taking depositions. I was walking about the southeast part of No. 7, near the breach in the wall, which, when I saw it, was about large enough for my body to pass through; about thirty persons were round it; I did not know what it was made for; understood it was to get a ball. I remained in the prison yard, seeing the soldiers collect on the platforms. I saw nothing of what was passing in the square. I understood that the soldiers desired the prisoners to go in before the firing took place; the prisoners were not riotous. I heard the alarm-bell ring and the drum beat to arms before the firing; I heard no tumult in the market square before it began; I should have heard it, had there been any, from the place I was in. I do not believe there were many prisoners in the square; it was the alarm-bell which collected the prisoners, at least it made them go out of prisons Nos. 5 and 7. The firing lasted, in a straggling manner, from fifteen to twenty minutes; there were three or four volleys from the market square. I heard no order to fire after the firing from the square; there was firing from the platforms on the wall, from which it continued while the prisoners were endeavoring to get into their prisons; there was firing at No. 5 while they were entering.

JAMES BOGGS, one of the committee, being sworn, says: I made no part of the report from my own knowledge' I went into the northeast door of No. 3 before the firing. I understood that there was a man killed in that prison' but I do not state it from my own knowledge.

AMOS WHEELER, sergeant of the north guard, being sworn, says: I was with the guard on the evening of the 6th; another sergeant was with me; assembled the guard by order, I believe, of Captain Shortland's clerk; had orders to march to the west guard house. On arriving, was ordered by the clerk to order arms; remained about ten minutes, and was then ordered by Captain Shortland to march to the market square; the officer of the guard was not then with it; our force was thirty-eight, besides two corporals; about five or six of another guard went into the square about the same time; the west guard was employed at the breach; there were not many prisoners in the market square when our guard entered. The alarm-bell had rung before we marched. When we entered, the prisoners were endeavoring to burst the gates below; cannot say whether the alarm-bell preceded the bursting of the gates; when they had succeeded in bursting them, there was a great rush towards the soldiers; their number kept increasing, until the space between the iron railings was quite full. They threw stones at the soldiers before there was any firing; they were not armed with any thing that I saw; they appeared in the square nearly at the same time as my guard; they made the greatest push towards our left flank, where the guard was weakest; I was on the left flank; the prisoners were desired to go back, but they did not; they pressed on, and made a greater resistance against us. Then Captain Shortland ordered the soldiers to bring their muskets down to the charge, but, not advancing upon the prisoners, it appeared to have no effect upon them. I believe Captain Shortland was in front of the guard at this time, desiring the prisoners to go back. I saw none of the prisoners wresting the arms from the soldiers; I saw none of them attempt to seize the arms. The guard pressed to the left, to keep from being turned, by which I was thrown in the rear. Many more soldiers came from different parts before the firing commenced; I heard no order to fire, nor do I know how it began; did not hear any of the prisoners challenging the soldiers to fire; at this time there might be about two hundred prisoners in the square; they were much more numerous than the guard. I did not see the officer of the guard at this time. The firing was in an independent manner, three or four muskets being discharged at a time. After the firing commenced, the prisoners began to retire towards their prisons. I did not hear any cheering among them, or see them rally after the fire; think I must have heard it, had there been any cheering. I do not think that the prisoners could have been made to retire without firing; the soldiers might, by killing them with the bayonet, have dispersed them. I did not go into the prison yard. I did not hear of any firing of my guard after the prisoners had retreated.

JOHN SAUNDERS, private in the first regiment of Somerset militia, one of the north guard, being sworn, says: I was with the first party of soldiers that marched into the market square; at that time the gate was broken open; the prisoners were coming through in a crowd as fast as they possibly could; the alarm-bell rung at the time we reached the west guard house; the officer of the guard was with us, I believe; I believe it was he who ordered us into the square. The west guard was marched in nearly about the same time; fifteen file were told off on the left, whom Captain Shortland, after some time of discourse with the prisoners to make them retire, ordered to charge; with some difficulty we got the prisoners back to the gates; some of them were retiring through the gates. I do not know that any injury was done to them until after they were inside the gates; had, till this, heard no firing. The square was nearly clear of prisoners before the firing; they did not return into the square, but threw some stones through the rails. I heard the word "fire" given, but do not know by whom. There were no prisoners in the market square when the first shots were fired. The prisoners had the command of the gates, so as to open them when they thought proper. I fired my musket. The prisoners closed the gates after them, which we opened, and we received orders from the commanding officer to charge the men to their prisons. No muskets were fired in compelling them to their prisons. Just before the firing, the prisoners were throwing stones, and insulting the soldiers, calling out to them to fire. Saw no prisoners attempting to wrest the arms from the soldiers. Several shots were fired into prison No. 3; they were fired into the doorway; they were fired by two or three soldiers. I heard no order given for this fire, and had heard none to cease firing; there was much disturbance among the prisoners going in, and a stone was thrown out, which I saw myself. The turnkey was then near the soldiers, close to the door, and was endeavoring to shut it; the prisoners were unwilling to go in, and the turnkey could not close it; they stood at the door, challenging the soldiers, and offering to fight them if they would lay down their pieces; this was before the firing into the door; it was locked up immediately after the fire; do not think I could say rightly who the soldiers were that fired into the prison.

WILLIAM SMITH, private of the first Somerset militia, being sworn, says: I was on the north guard on the evening of the 6th of April. I marched into the market square with the guard. As we were going into the square, the prisoners were coming through the gates in a violent manner; the alarm-bell rang before we entered the square, while we were at the west guard house. I was one of the fifteen file ordered to charge; the prisoners fell back when we came down to the charge, but, after a little while, advanced again. The prisoners fell back to the gates, and had partly gone through before the firing began; I heard no order to fire; do not know the soldier who fired the first musket; was not near him; the prisoners had not come back upon our left when the firing began, and after the charge, but they were throwing stones, (one of which fell about a yard from me,) and were abusing the soldiers, daring them to come on. The firing was in an independent manner, one after another, till nearly all the guard had fired, and then they loaded again; no order was given to fire; do not know of any soldier having fired into any of the prisons; do not know how long the firing lasted. After the prisoners had returned into their yards, we went into them, to see if there were any stragglers about. When I went into the yard, did not hear any firing from sentinels on the walls.

JOHN TUTT, private, being sworn, says: I was on the north guard the night of the disturbance; the alarm-bell rang when I was at the west guard house, before I entered the market square; about forty or fifty prisoners had burst into the square, through the gate next the hospital, when we marched in. I was one of the fifteen file ordered to charge; cannot say exactly who ordered us to charge, but think it was Captain Shortland's voice. The prisoners were so close to me that I had not room to come down to the charge, and drove them back to get room. We advanced upon them at the charge. While charging, a stone, of seven or eight pounds weight, knocked off my cap; I stooped to pick it up; was not knocked down, but somewhat stunned, and the plate of my cap was bruised; the firing began directly; the prisoners resisted greatly while we were charging; they resisted up to the time we fired. I think there were about one hundred prisoners in the square when the firing began; after they were driven back, there was much firing into the prisons; saw one soldier firing into prison No. 1; the prisoners were throwing out stones at the time; they were all nearly in when the firing into No. 1 took place, but some were still pushing in at the doorway; the turnkey was endeavoring to get near the door, but was not in front, in consequence of the stones thrown out; I heard no order for the firing in the square; it commenced while I was picking up my cap; saw no more than one shot fired into No. 1.

WILLIAM ROWLES, private, one of the north guard, being sworn, says: I was one of the fifteen file told off in order to charge. Captain Shortland gave the order to charge. I could come down to the charge, and did so; and those near me advanced at the charge upon the prisoners, who would not retire at first, even when the point of the bayonet touched their clothes. We advanced on them about eight or ten yards down towards the gate. A great many of them retired through the gate before there was any firing; they aggravated the soldiers by insulting and abusive language, and dared them to fire. I heard an order to fire, but do not know from whom. When the firing began, the prisoners were rushing again through the gate, into the square, and throwing stones over the platform. I suppose there were twenty times more prisoners in the market square than soldiers before the firing. I entered the prison yard, saw a soldier level his musket into prison No. 3, who was then about five or six yards from the door; many prisoners stood at the door in a resolute manner, and would not let the turnkey shut it; the doorway was as full as it could hold; they threw out great stones, as big as my head. I heard no order to the soldier to fire into No. 3; saw no officer there at this time. I was telling the prisoners to go into the prison, when one of them endeavored to wrest the bayonet from my musket, but I drew it back in time to save it; this was before the firing into the doorway. I believe that there was no more than one shot fired into No. 3; after it was fired, the prisoners went back, and allowed the turnkey to shut the door.

JOHN HAMLET, private, one of the north guard, being sworn, says: I was the right hand man of the fifteen file told off to charge; I heard the order given to charge by Captain Shortland; I immediately came down to the charge, having room enough; we advanced a small distance; we could not advance far, owing to the prisoners being so near; they did not retire very fast; cannot exactly say how many prisoners there were in the square when we began to charge, but suppose there might be a hundred; we used all possible means to make them retire, but some were so obstinate that they advanced even to the points of the bayonets; others, however, retreated; they were very abusive, and throwing stones; many dared us to fire. I was struck with a stone in advancing, on my right knee, which nearly knocked me down, and I very narrowly escaped another blow on my head. I received the blow after the firing commenced; our charge with the bayonet made some few of them retire through the gates; the greater part, indeed, retired through the gates, and remained on the other side throwing stones. Before the firing, and after the charge, some returned back through the gates, and advanced; some advanced even after the first fire; they shouted and cheered while advancing, which was intended to animate others to persevere like themselves; numbers of the first muskets fired were elevated in the air, some were elevated to the centre. I did not see any one fall on the first fire; the firing was not in volleys. I followed into the prison yards; did not see any firing into the prisons; after the firing had been kept up for some considerable time, the prisoners retreated. I heard an order to fire given before any firing took place, but do not know by whom. I do not think the prisoners could have been driven back without firing, unless great slaughter had been made of them by the bayonet. I cannot positively assert whether there was any firing on our right besides that by ourselves.

JOHN WILLIAMS, sergeant, being sworn, says: I was on the south guard the night of the disturbance; our guard entered the market square after the north guard, and formed to its right; our number was about forty; it consisted of fifty-one, but had several sentries out. The firing had not commenced when we formed upon the north guard; it began about ten minutes or a quarter of an hour after we had formed; we were formed just about the time the north guard charged; when we formed, there were about one hundred prisoners in the square. I think they were more numerous than the soldiers; the line of soldiers almost occupied the breadth of the square, but there were not enough to form it completely across; there was an opening between our guard and the north; the prisoners did not fall back for some considerable time after the charge; they were throwing stones through and over the rails, and abusing the soldiers, when the firing began; I heard no order to fire; our officers never ordered us to fire; our guard, seeing the state the prisoners were in, and the north guard fire, began firing of their own accord, but not in volleys, and then the reports made prevented us hearing what was going on; the north guard fired first; at the first fire the prisoners ran back through the gateway, but afterwards many returned again to the gate, but did not advance through on us; heard cheering, and did not know whether they would not come out on us. I did not go into the prison yard, nor did any of our guard; our officer kept us in line till the prisoners were all locked up. I do not suppose the prisoners would have gone back without firing, because they did not appear to retire even when the bayonets were quite close to them. I heard firing for some minutes after the prisoners had retired through the gate.

John Twyfort Jolliff, major commanding, being sworn, handed in a statement, of which the following is a copy:

April 7, 1815.

Yesterday evening, between the hours of six and seven o'clock, soon after the officers' dinner, the mess waiter came into the mess room, and said that the American prisoners had broken out of the prison, and were attempting their escape. I immediately ordered the troops composing the garrison to fall in at the alarm-post. Whilst the troops were forming I heard several shots fired, upon which I immediately took the grenadiers, and proceeded to the west guard, supposing that the prisoners were actually coming down the military way (as it is called) in great bodies. Upon my arrival at the west guard, several of the troops were formed in the market place, and had fired some shots. I immediately called out to them to cease firing; and finding that the prisoners still refused to go into their prisons, I took a party of grenadiers, and went into two of the prison yards, and told the prisoners to go into their prisons, which they very reluctantly did. Several stones were thrown at the military, and two at myself, one of which came very near me. The military fired a few shots at the prisoners in the yard, in consequence of their throwing stones and refusing to go into the prison, but the firing was without my orders, and I conceive took place owing to the military being so exasperated. As soon as the prisoners were all gone into their different prisons, and properly secured, I returned to the barracks, having ordered the guards to be reinforced, and the troops to be ready to fall in at a moment's notice. It appears that they had selected the hour of the officers' dinner to begin their operations, supposing we should not be ready.

J. T. JOLLIFF,
Major 1st Somerset militia.

Understanding that evidence has been produced to prove that a bugle sounded the signal to fire, I beg leave to observe, that I was first apprized of this circumstance after my return from Dartmoor. I never gave, as commanding officer, any order, directly or indirectly, to that effect, nor did I hear previously any report that such a circumstance had taken place.

J. T. JOLLIFF,
Major 1st Somerset militia.

He further says: There was no general order that when the soldiers on sentry heard one of them fire, they should consider it an order to fire also; but I suppose they might so consider it. One man fired into one of the prisons, which arose, as I believe, from exasperation, on being struck by a stone thrown by the prisoners. I did not see any one put his musket into the door to fire. Several shots were fired in the prison yards, but entirely without any command.

George Pitt, sergeant, being sworn, says: I was with Major Jolliff among the grenadiers in the prison yard, and he used all the means in his power to prevent the firing. I heard him crying out to the men to cease firing.

Henry Burgoyne, private, being sworn, says: I was on the platform at the bottom of the market square. A prisoner came with an iron bar, who, upon hearing a shout from the prisoners at the breach, when a piece fell out of the wall, which I heard, broke the gate open immediately, by striking off the lock, and the prisoners rushed through; and when we left the platform they pressed very much upon us; they were as thick as they could be; the alarm-bell was ringing about this time; the yard where the break was, was as full of prisoners as it could be. I belonged to the west guard. I did not see any prisoners wresting the arms from the guard. I could not see the breach on account of a projection of the wall, but heard the bar at work; they were quite thick down to the prison, waiting, I suppose, till the breach was made; the horn had sounded as usual for them to go in, but, instead of going in as they usually did very quietly, they came out; they pressed on us so much that we were forced to fall back; after we came down to the charge they would not retire, and, being unwilling to stab, we were forced to give back. I heard an order to fire, but do not know who gave it. I did not observe how the first muskets were levelled.

Edward Jackson, private of the Derby militia, being sworn, says: I was on the platform 18 and 19, between prisons Nos. 5 and 6. I think there had been two volleys in the market square before the men on this platform fired; myself and another sentry were posted on the platform; we had not fired before some soldiers came up on the platform; I never fired; it was the men who came up; I cannot say whether the sentry fired; they fired into the yard up towards the gate; there were a great many prisoners at the upper part of the yard; I did not see any firing into the prisons. There were one or two officers on the platform; no order was given to fire on my platform; to the best of my recollection, I think I heard a command "to commence firing from the right." The prisoners were all in a great body, near the gates at the top of the yard, when the firing commenced, and, after the firing, they retreated to their prisons. When I was placed sentinel, several prisoners were inside the palisades clodding one another; some soldiers charged them out of it; there were about two rounds of firing from my platform; there were about twenty soldiers on it, but cannot say exactly; it was full of them; I could not see the breach; I saw no tumult in the yard before the firing in the square, except the clodding; I cannot say I heard the alarm-bell ring.

Adjourned till to-morrow.

Examinations at Dartmoor prison of war, on Saturday, the 22d April, 1815.

Present, Paul Treby Treby, Esq., one of the magistrates for the county of Devon.

Thomas Burgess Mott, one of the committee of American prisoners, sworn: (A letter had been handed in by Captain Shortland, signed in this witness's name, and addressed to Captain Shortland, requesting his release, and stating that "although he had been called on by the respectable part of the prisoners to inquire into the cause of the late unfortunate affair, neither his deposition nor conduct appeared to show that he would wish to lay the blame to Captain Shortland, but on the contrary, for which he had since been insulted by those men that were and had been the occasion of the late unfortunate affair.") There never has been, to my knowledge, any concerted plan among the American prisoners at this prison to break out. I have never been insulted by any of the men supposed to be ringleaders in the late affair, but, on the contrary, the prisoners think I was doing every thing in my power for their benefit. The letter handed in by Captain Shortland was written for me by another prisoner, to get me clear in any way; it was not signed by me; I told him I would give him a pound if he got me released; it was written without design to injure any body, and merely to get me clear, as my turn of release was not near; I never read the letter; I was one of the committee who made the report to Mr. Beasley; some part of it was from my own knowledge, and some part of it from the testimony of others. I saw a crowd where the hole was, but did not think it was occasioned by any thing but gambling, till I was called upon by the prisoners to go and make them desist from the hole. When I was in the yard of Nos. 5 and 7, and when the firing into it from the platform took place, there was no tumult; there were then but few persons in it; I was not in the market square; I think the making of the hole was merely through mischief, but not at all to get out, for I do not think twenty would have wanted to go out if the gates had been open; I do not know particularly of any subject of complaint shortly before the affair; I do not know of any one who complained before Admiral Rowley of the American Government; I was present the whole time; I do not know of any particular uneasiness among the prisoners at present, or any cause of complaint of their treatment; they are a little impatient to be sent home; there have been frequent little vexatious interruptions to the market, &c. on slight grounds; I did not see any one shot, though some fell close by me; I did not hear the horn sound before the firing.

Walter Colton, one of the committee, being sworn, says: None of the report was made from my own knowledge, but entirely from examinations. I am confident there was no disposition on the part of the prisoners to break out; had there been, I should certainly have known it, because I was in the constant habit of going through the prisons, having much business with the prisoners as one of their committee. It is impossible but it must have been known had there been any. Had the gates been thrown open, not more than a hundred would have gone out: those that chose could have got away on the 4th. The first I heard of the disturbance was the firing; I was then in No. 3; did not hear the horn; it is not generally heard inside; there was great irritation against Captain Shortland before the disturbance; this was owing to acts of barbarity on his part. I speak from my own knowledge. Instead of doing things to make them comfortable, he did quite the contrary. He has kept two prisons, the best and most comfortable, shut, when it was in his power to have opened them; the prisoners remonstrated against this, but it produced no effect, while they were turned into prisons open at top, and floating with water two or three inches deep; this was No. 2. There was a plan formed in No. 6, one of the best and most commodious prisons, two several times, to dig out, which was both times discovered by Captain Shortland, and on the second occasion the prisoners were turned into No. 2; they were, however, only kept there two nights, and then returned to No. 6; I call this an act of barbarity. Captain Shortland never returned any answer to our application to go into the empty prisons; I knew of no statements of complaint against the American Government, previous to the late affair; there have been often complaints of neglect against Mr. Beasley, but not against the American Government. Another act of Captain Shortland's was: about the time of the attempt to dig out, there were some bars broken in one of the prisons, in consequence of which, and the digging out, I suppose, one-third of our provisions was stopped for ten days. I know not what it was for, unless for this and the digging out. Captain Shortland has frequently stopped our provisions in the same way, without giving any reason. There has been no particular uneasiness among the prisoners to get out, since the account of the ratification of the treaty, and I know of no acts of violence among them in consequence; they were only anxious to be sent home, and expressed their opinions about it.

William Hobart, one of the committee, being sworn, says: Some part of the report was made from my own knowledge, but not much; I was in the lower part of the yard Nos. 1 and 3 when the alarm-bell rang; I had not heard the horn sound to go in when the alarm-bell rang; I expect I should have heard it; it can generally be heard all over the yard; when I heard the bell I walked up to the railing next the market square to see what occasioned the alarm; when I got within a few yards of the railing, saw the soldiers coming into the market square. I think there must have been four or five hundred soldiers in the square before the firing began; there were many there, and others marching in and forming; I heard no orders to fire; the prisoners were coming up, as I was, to see what was the matter; I returned immediately to my own prison. There were two volleys fired into a prison, into No. 3; most of the prisoners were then in; the prisoners were retreating after the first volley; I had been in about five minutes before the firing; was on the second floor; did not see the soldiers who fired, but heard the report; and when I came down, saw marks of balls within; there were no stones thrown from the second floor; should have known it, as I was walking with some others. There were several lines of soldiers drawn across the square; a few prisoners were at the bottom of it then, but they were not so numerous as the soldiers; I am fully confident there was no intention to break out. I heard no shouting or threats against Captain Shortland when the firing commenced. The prisoners did not cheer in the yard I was in, nor in the market square, while I was present. Captain Shortland has behaved in a very tyrannical manner towards the prisoners; he stopped the market for ten days for a very trivial occurrence, and part of the provisions for the same length of time; do not think there was any intention among the prisoners to revenge themselves on Captain Shortland; there has been some irritation against Mr. Beasley latterly, because they thought he was somewhat dilatory in preparing cartels, but there was none whatever against the American Government; there was a report that vessels of war would come from America to take prisoners, but even when first started it did not gain much credit; the upper stories of Nos. 2 and 4 have been unfit for the men to live in, very open, and sometimes afloat with rain.

William B. Orne, one of the committee, being sworn, says: I saw a little of the affair stated in the report, but the principal part was from the examination of others. I was walking between No. 7 and the barrack wall; did not observe that many prisoners were there; they are always so numerous in the yard, that one might not observe whether there was a crowd or not; I heard no bar breaking the wall; went into my own yard, Nos. 1 and 3; the prisoners were almost all in. I heard the alarm-bell, upon which I walked up to the railings, and saw the soldiers firing on the prisoners; could not tell the number of the soldiers, but the yard appeared to be full; it appeared to me, from the number of muskets I heard, that the whole regiment must have fired several volleys. I went behind the cook house, and heard the balls flying in all directions; the prisoners ran up to the railings from curiosity; was not near enough to hear an order to fire; after firing a few volleys, they opened the gates, and charged the prisoners in the yard, and, after they were in their prisons, they fired in; I heard that shots were fired into No. 3—into the door; saw no stones thrown out of No. 3; saw only one stone thrown into the square; the firing appeared to me to last fifteen or twenty minutes. I heard a noise among the prisoners, but no particular shouting or cheering; saw the greater part of the prisoners run; after the first fire, every man secured himself as well as he could; there appeared prison No. 3; they were fired into the doorway; they were fired by two or three soldiers. I heard no order given for this fire, and had heard none to cease firing; there was much disturbance among the prisoners going in, and a stone was thrown out, which I saw myself. The turnkey was then near the soldiers, close to the door, and was endeavoring to shut it; the prisoners were unwilling to go in, and the turnkey could not close it; they stood at the door, challenging the soldiers, and offering to fight them if they would lay down their pieces; this was before the firing into the door; it was locked up immediately after the fire; do not think I could say rightly who the soldiers were that fired into the prison.

WILLIAM SMITH, private of the first Somerset militia, being sworn, says: I was on the north guard on the evening of the 6th of April. I marched into the market square with the guard. As we were going into the square, the prisoners were coming through the gates in a violent manner; the alarm-bell rang before we entered the square, while we were at the west guard house. I was one of the fifteen file ordered to charge; the prisoners fell back when we came down to the charge, but, after a little while, advanced again. The prisoners fell back to the gates, and had partly gone through before the firing began; I heard no order to fire; do not know the soldier who fired the first musket; was not near him; the prisoners had not come back upon our left when the firing began, and after the charge, but they were throwing stones, (one of which fell about a yard from me,) and were abusing the soldiers, daring them to come on. The firing was in an independent manner, one after another, till nearly all the guard had fired, and then they loaded again; no order was given to fire; do not know of any soldier having fired into any of the prisons; do not know how long the firing lasted. After the prisoners had returned into their yards, we went into them, to see if there were any straggiers about. When I went into the yard, did not hear any firing from sentinels on the walls.

JOHN TUTT, private, being sworn, says: I was on the north guard the night of the disturbance; the alarm-bell rang when I was at the west guard house, before I entered the market square; about forty or fifty prisoners had burst into the square, through the gate next the hospital, when we marched in. I was one of the fifteen file ordered to charge; cannot say exactly who ordered us to charge, but think it was Captain Shortland's voice. The prisoners were so close to me that I had not room to come down to the charge, and drove them back to get room. We advanced upon them at the charge. While charging, a stone, of seven or eight pounds weight, knocked off my cap; I stooped to pick it up; was not knocked down, but somewhat stunned, and the plate of my cap was bruised; the firing began directly; the prisoners resisted greatly while we were charging; they resisted up to the time we fired. I think there were about one hundred prisoners in the square when the firing began; after they were driven back, there was much firing into the prisons; saw one soldier firing into prison No. 1; the prisoners were throwing out stones at the time; they were all nearly in when the firing into No. 1 took place, but some were still pushing in at the doorway; the turnkey was endeavoring to get near the door, but was not in front, in consequence of the stones thrown out; I heard no order for the firing in the square; it commenced while I was picking up my cap; saw no more than one shot fired into No. 1.

WILLIAM ROWLES, private, one of the north guard, being sworn, says: I was one of the fifteen file told off in order to charge. Captain Shortland gave the order to charge. I could come down to the charge, and did so; and those near me advanced at the charge upon the prisoners, who would not retire at first, even when the point of the bayonet touched their clothes. We advanced on them about eight or ten yards down towards the gate. A great many of them retired through the gate before there was any firing; they aggravated the soldiers by insulting and abusive language, and dared them to fire. I heard an order to fire, but do not know from whom. When the firing began, the prisoners were rushing again through the gate, into the square, and throwing stones over the platform. I suppose there were twenty times more prisoners in the market square than soldiers before the firing. I entered the prison yard, saw a soldier level his musket into prison No. 3, who was then about five or six yards from the door; many prisoners stood at the door in a resolute manner, and would not let the turnkey shut it; the doorway was as full as it could hold; they threw out great stones, as big as my head. I heard no order to the soldier to fire into No. 3; saw no officer there at this time. I was telling the prisoners to go into the prison, when one of them endeavored to wrest the bayonet from my musket, but I drew it back in time to save it; this was before the firing into the doorway. I believe that there was no more than one shot fired into No. 3; after it was fired, the prisoners went back, and allowed the turnkey to shut the door.

JOHN HAMLET, private, one of the north guard, being sworn, says: I was the right hand man of the fifteen file told off to charge; I heard the order given to charge by Captain Shortland; I immediately came down to the charge, having room enough; we advanced a small distance; we could not advance far, owing to the prisoners being so near; they did not retire very fast; cannot exactly say how many prisoners there were in the square when we began to charge, but suppose there might be a hundred; we used all possible means to make them retire, but some were so obstinate that they advanced even to the points of the bayonets; others, however, retreated; they were very abusive, and throwing stones; many dared us to fire. I was struck with a stone in advancing, on my right knee, which nearly knocked me down, and I very narrowly escaped another blow on my head. I received the blow after the firing commenced; our charge with the bayonet made some few of them retire through the gates; the greater part, indeed, retired through the gates, and remained on the other side throwing stones. Before the firing, and after the charge, some returned back through the gates, and advanced; some advanced even after the first fire; they shouted and cheered while advancing, which was intended to animate others to persevere like themselves; numbers of the first muskets fired were elevated in the air, some were elevated to the centre. I did not see any one fall on the first fire; the firing was not in volleys. I followed into the prison yards; did not see any firing into the prisons; after the firing had been kept up for some considerable time, the prisoners retreated. I heard an order to fire given before any firing took place, but do not know by whom. I do not think the prisoners could have been driven back without firing, unless great slaughter had been made of them by the bayonet. I cannot positively assert whether there was any firing on our right besides that by ourselves.

JOHN WILLIAMS, sergeant, being sworn, says: I was on the south guard the night of the disturbance; our guard entered the market square after the north guard, and formed to its right; our number was about forty; it consisted of fifty-one, but had several sentries out. The firing had not commenced when we formed upon the north guard; it began about ten minutes or a quarter of an hour after we had formed; we were formed just about the time the north guard charged; when we formed, there were about one hundred prisoners in the square. I think they were more numerous than the soldiers; the line of soldiers almost occupied the breadth of the square, but there were not enough to form it completely across; there was an opening between our guard and the north; the prisoners did not fall back for some considerable time after the charge; they were throwing stones through and over the rails, and abusing the soldiers, when the firing began; I heard no order to fire; our officers never ordered us to fire; our guard, seeing the state the prisoners were in, and the north guard fire, began firing of their own accord, but not in volleys, and then the reports made prevented us hearing what was going on; the north guard fired first; at the first fire the prisoners ran back through the gateway, but afterwards many returned again to the gate, but did not advance through on us; heard cheering, and did not know whether they would not come out on us. I did not go into the prison yard, nor did any of our guard; our officer kept us in line till the prisoners were all locked up. I do not suppose the prisoners would have gone back without firing, because they did not appear to retire even when the bayonets were quite close to them. I heard firing for some minutes after the prisoners had retired through the gate.

John Twyfort Jolliff, major commanding, being sworn, handed in a statement, of which the following is a copy:

April 7, 1815.

Yesterday evening, between the hours of six and seven o'clock, soon after the officers' dinner, the mess waiter came into the mess room, and said that the American prisoners had broken out of the prison, and were attempting their escape. I immediately ordered the troops composing the garrison to fall in at the alarm-post. Whilst the troops were forming I heard several shots fired, upon which I immediately took the grenadiers, and proceeded to the west guard, supposing that the prisoners were actually coming down the military way (as it is called) in great bodies. Upon my arrival at the west guard, several of the troops were formed in the market place, and had fired some shots. I immediately called out to them to cease firing; and finding that the prisoners still refused to go into their prisons, I took a party of grenadiers, and went into two of the prison yards, and told the prisoners to go into their prisons, which they very reluctantly did. Several stones were thrown at the military, and two at myself, one of which came very near me. The military fired a few shots at the prisoners in the yard, in consequence of their throwing stones and refusing to go into the prison, but the firing was without my orders, and I conceive took place owing to the military being so exasperated. As soon as the prisoners were all gone into their different prisons, and properly secured, I returned to the barracks, having ordered the guards to be reinforced, and the troops to be ready to fall in at a moment's notice. It appears that they had selected the hour of the officers' dinner to begin their operations, supposing we should not be ready.

J. T. JOLLIFF,
Major 1st Somerset militia.

Understanding that evidence has been produced to prove that a bugle sounded the signal to fire, I beg leave to observe, that I was first apprized of this circumstance after my return from Dartmoor. I never gave, as commanding officer, any order, directly or indirectly, to that effect, nor did I hear previously any report that such a circumstance had taken place.

J. T. JOLLIFF,
Major 1st Somerset militia.

He further says: There was no general order that when the soldiers on sentry heard one of them fire, they should consider it an order to fire also; but I suppose they might so consider it. One man fired into one of the prisons, which arose, as I believe, from exasperation, on being struck by a stone thrown by the prisoners. I did not see any one put his musket into the door to fire. Several shots were fired in the prison yards, but entirely without any command.

George Pitt, sergeant, being sworn, says: I was with Major Jolliff among the grenadiers in the prison yard, and he used all the means in his power to prevent the firing. I heard him crying out to the men to cease firing.

Henry Burgoyne, private, being sworn, says: I was on the platform at the bottom of the market square. I heard an order to fire, but do not know who gave it. I did not observe how the first muskets were levelled.

Edward Jackson, private of the Derby militia, being sworn, says: I was on the platform 18 and 19, between prisons Nos. 5 and 6. I think there had been two volleys in the market square before the men on this platform fired; myself and another sentry were posted on the platform; we had not fired before some soldiers came up on the platform; I never fired; it was the men who came up; I cannot say whether the sentry fired; they fired into the yard up towards the gate; there were a great many prisoners at the upper part of the yard; I did not see any firing into the prisons. I heard a noise among the prisoners, but no particular shouting or cheering; saw the greater part of the prisoners run; after the first fire, every man secured himself as well as he could; there appeared no interval in the firing; it continued all the while, until the soldiers opened the gates and went into the yard. I knew of no intention whatever among the prisoners to break out; we were then daily expecting cartels.

Niel Mc Kinnon, prisoner, being sworn, says: I was in the yard No. 7 before the alarm-bell rang; I saw some men making a breach in the wall; at first there were only three or four, but afterwards they increased to about twenty or twenty-five, standing round; I can ascribe this conduct to nothing but mere wantonness; can ascribe it to no other motive; I staid till the hole was made, and they began to throw things at the sentry; I saw the sentry put his bayonet through as a warning; he desired them several times to go away; I belong to another prison; I came to the gate; I heard the alarm-bell ring before I came; I saw a turnkey looking in the direction of the breach, and, expecting that the military would be called out, I went to gate No. 4; I remained there a considerable time, until the troops were drawn up in line; they then charged; I could see into the market square; I saw the prisoners between the railings, and the soldiers in front of No. 4 gate; my attention was engrossed by what was before me, and I did not observe how many there were to my right at No. 1 gate; I heard an order given to charge and fire, but do not know by whom; at this time the prisoners were daring the military, but not expecting they really would hurt them; cannot say I saw any stones thrown. I saw the first fire, but did not observe the elevation of the muskets. The prisoners retreated after the first fire, but I heard them shouting and rallying, cheering each other, and I think I heard them again dare the soldiers to fire. I heard several say they thought they were blank cartridges; I gave it as my opinion. I went down towards my prison, and was told on the way that Haywood was killed. I went to see, and saw a black man lying within the inner gate of No. 4. I then went up to the gate to speak to Captain Shortland; the turnkey let me through, and I told Captain Shortland that a man was killed, and begged him to make the firing cease, and not to be wasting the lives of the prisoners; he told me to go to my prison. I spoke to the officer apparently commanding the guard to the same purport, who said there should be a truce if the prisoners would go to their prisons. Captain Shortland knew me personally. I was going to No. 1 gate, and saw several persons at the door of the receiving house, with two or three wounded men; one of these persons was drunk, and abused the soldiers, who did not appear to attend to him so much as they might had he been sober. I went down to No. 4 yard; while going down the yard, a volley was fired into it by the soldiers in the market square; there were many prisoners then in the yard. I did not see more than one line of military in the square; it was two deep, and extended almost across. Was going up the yard, when I met a party of military with an officer, driving along four or five prisoners. I went up to the officer, who I understood afterwards was Major Jolliff, and remonstrated with him on the harsh treatment the prisoners were receiving. He put his fist in my face, and swore "by God they would not be trifled with any longer by us," (the prisoners.) I was then driven with the rest into No. 4, the sergeant having his halbert close to one of the prisoners, and the soldiers their bayonets charged. I entered the prison with my face to the soldiers, until I was so far that I thought I was safe, when I turned my back, and, at that moment, a musket was fired close to me, which wounded a little boy, who screamed and dropped down; he died the next day. There were no stones thrown out when the shot was fired, nor any insulting language used towards the soldiers; the prisoners were crowding round the door, not being able to get in fast enough, but there was no tumult among them; heard no order to fire the shot; I heard the report near me; the doors were then locked up. I have not the least belief that there was any concert or intention among the prisoners to break out. I did not know the arms were kept in the barrack yard, nor do I believe it was generally known among the prisoners. I think the breach and the breaking of the gate were only acts of wantonness, like throwing turf at each other. There was a good understanding between the prisoners and the soldiers, particularly the Derby militia; they used to be of assistance to them when the markets were stopped; the Somerset regiment was not up to so much as the Derby. I think the sentries were removed from the yard to prevent communication with the prisoners, not through any fear of them. If there had been any concert, they would have made some preparations; but there did not appear any among them, as the gambling tables were not removed from where they usually were. I have since seen some who broke the wall, who have expressed sorrow for what they had done, from the consequences resulting from it, but declared they had no intention to escape.

Francis Joseph and Henry Allen, the two remaining of the committee, knew nothing of their own knowledge, and were therefore not examined.

John G. Gatchell, prisoner, being sworn, says: I belong to No. 7 prison. On the 6th of April, between six and seven in the afternoon, while walking in that yard, I heard a report that some boys were making a hole in the wall. Being in the yard abreast of the market square, I saw Captain Shortland coming down the market square at the head of a party of soldiers; they were formed in a line, and began to fire immediately. I did not see any prisoners then in the square; a few were between me and the railings. I could have seen any who might have been in the square. I saw no charge of the bayonet. I heard an order to fire, but do not know by whom; at the first volley one man fell about four yards from me. I went to him, and asked what was the matter; he said he was wounded in the breast, but I did not believe it, thinking it impossible, till I felt it. I called assistance, and was trying to get him to the receiving house, when Captain Shortland entered No. 7 gate with two soldiers, and said something which induced the two others to run away and leave the wounded man with me; upon which, Captain Shortland, seeing I did not run, said, "Kill the damned rascal;" the soldiers charged on me, and a bayonet pierced my clothes and skin, going in about a quarter of an inch. I was then forced to leave the wounded man and run, when a soldier followed me; and Captain Shortland, urging him on, repeated several times "Kill the damned rascal." While running on I was pricked three times, and should have been killed, but, stepping aside, the bayonet ran under my arm; and the soldier, with the force of the thrust, fell on his knees, by which means I escaped into the prison. There are four doors to No. 7 prison; all but one were shut, which one was exposed to the fire; all the prisoners were crowding to one door; the door left open was the one which was usually so; but the doors were shut, I think, sooner than usual, and the prisoners were trying to get in at the shut doors; the prisoners being pursued by the soldiers, all crowded to one door, one over the other, and, being unable to get in fast enough, were wounded by the bayonets of the soldiers pressing behind. While getting in No. 7, I saw Captain Shortland running down the yard towards No. 5 with the soldiers, and heard him order them to fire; am quite sure I heard him order them to fire; he was facing me at the time; was running towards No. 5, and ordering them to fire as they ran, which they did; cannot positively say he had arms in his hands when coming down the yard. I did not see that the soldiers hesitated to fire when ordered; they did fire. Never had any personal altercation or difficulty with Captain Shortland; never spoke to him, nor been spoken to by him. Do not think there was any intention to break out. The firing in the yard was after that in the market square; two soldiers came in the gate abreast of Captain Shortland, but many followed him—thirty or forty, perhaps. After the soldiers were in the yard, those on the ramparts did not fire. There were about forty or fifty shots fired by those in the yard. While the prisoners were running to No. 7, they were cut off by a cross-fire from the ramparts; (he pointed to the place where he was wounded in the back,) was told by others my wound was a quarter of an inch deep; it swelled up considerably, and was very sore, as was the case with all three wounds; was never under any of the surgeons or surgeons' mates.

ANDREW DAVIS, prisoner, being sworn, says: I belong to No. 3 prison; I was at the bottom of No. 3 yard on the evening of the 6th, just before, counting in time the horn had sounded; on the first report of muskets, the prisoners said they were blank cartridges. I went up to No. 1 gate; when I got there, five or six men were bringing a man who appeared to be badly wounded into the market square; they had brought him inside the inner gate next the square; I heard Captain Shortland order them to let go the wounded man; one of them remonstrated against it, and Captain Shortland struck him with his fist; the man then went outside of the gate into the passage between the two gates, and said to Captain Shortland, "You'll recollect you have struck me twice, and I'll have satisfaction for it." Captain Shortland told him to go into the prison, or he would order the men to fire on him; I then went down to No. 1 prison, and saw no more. The soldiers were drawn up in the square when the wounded man was there, and Captain Shortland in front of them. It was about ten minutes or a quarter of an hour after the firing began that the above transaction took place. One or two volleys were fired after that.

JOHN ODIORNE, prisoner, being sworn: (His evidence before the coroner being read to him, said he had no correction to make in it, other than it was possible that there might have been some few prisoners in the square, but there were no numbers of them, previously to the drawing up of the soldiers in the square.) I stood on the steps at the cook house in the market square; I could see the whole of what was passing in the square; the gate was burst about the same moment the soldiers were firing obliquely to the left, after they were drawn up in line; the prisoners rushed in immediately, but not violently; I heard an order to fire, which was from Captain Shortland, as near as I can judge of any man who had his back to me; it was in Captain Shortland's voice; he was about one hundred feet from me; I am as positive as I can be under such circumstances that the order came from him; Captain Shortland appeared to be in a great passion when entering the square; he looked very red, and spoke loud; am confident there was no disposition to break out. There was very little interval of time between the marching of the soldiers into the square and the sounding of the horn for turning in; the horn was first; the alarm-bell rang nearly at the same time that the soldiers entered the square; the prisoners generally conceived that there was a tardiness in Mr. Beasley's fitting out ships, and there was discontent among them against him, but no complaint against the American or British Governments.

GERARD SMITH, prisoner, being sworn, says: I was in the market square with Captain Odiorne, who requested me to stay, after the horn was sounded, till the wagon was unloaded; I told him my prison would be shut, as the horn had sounded, and I should be shut out, and I thought I had better go; I did stay several minutes longer; seeing the prisoners nearly all in, I said I must go; I saw Arnold coming up the square, and saw also Captain Shortland by himself close to the wagon; the captain asked Arnold whether the prisoners were all in; Arnold said, "Sir, they have got two holes in the wall;" captain said, "Damn you, why did you not let me know that before? go and ring the bell." I turned from Odiorne, bade him good night, and went down to the gates, which were all closed, and I was obliged to get over the railing; when I got over, I saw no tumult among the prisoners; one man told me that some boys had taken some stones out of the wall, and wondered what it could be for; "I do not know," said I, "but I suppose it is through mischief."

ROBERT JOHNSON, prisoner, being sworn, says: I know Gatchell; I was at the gate No. 7 when Captain Shortland spoke to him; I ran directly up to the gate from No. 5; at the first firing a wounded man lay about five or six yards from the gate, on the prison side; Gatchell and two or three others came up to take him, as I suppose, to the receiving house; when he got into the passage, between the railings, Captain Shortland came in with two or three soldiers, and told them to go back, or he would kill them; the soldiers followed; in rushing in, Captain Shortland stumbled over the wounded man; Gatchell did not go away immediately; Captain Shortland ordered the soldiers to charge on him; one did charge on him, and another on me; I then made my escape into the prison; I am quite sure Captain Shortland ordered the soldiers to charge; this was after the firing in the market square. At the first fire I was in my berth; had no idea that there would be any disturbance, or that the military were firing with ball. I heard no abusive language from Captain Shortland.

JAMES N. BUSHFIELD, prisoner, being sworn, says: I was present all the time the breach was being made, but was not one of those who did make it; I had no idea it was for the purpose of making their escape, but supposed it was through mere mischief; there were about twenty or twenty-five prisoners round it; they began in the morning; I was there when the sentinel told them to go away, or he would fire; they set up a laugh, and drew back after he put his bayonet through the hole, forming a circle of fifteen or twenty-five feet from the wall; at that time there were not more than twenty-five or thirty people, but afterwards they ran from all quarters to see the hole, hearing the others at it laughing; they knew nothing of it before; I went towards the gate when I heard the first fire, which I supposed was with blank cartridges, until I heard the balls whistle; do not suppose a man in the yard knew there was arms in the barrack yard.

Adjourned until to-morrow, 8 o'clock.

DARTMOOR, Sunday, April 23, 1815.

Met, pursuant to adjournment, at 8 o'clock.

Present, Paul Treby Treby, Esq., one of the magistrates for the county of Devon.

WILLIAM CLEMENTS, prisoner, being sworn, says: I was most of the evening at prison No. 1, and towards the close of the evening was going to my own prison, No. 7; I saw about twenty or thirty prisoners gathered round the wall of No. 7, and considered they were gambling; going up to it, saw dirt about a breach in the wall, and then several took up stones and threw them at it, in order to force it through. I went down the yard, and came up again, at which time they were still throwing against the breach; they made a hole; I then saw Captain Shortland come up to it with some soldiers on the other side; he spoke through the hole, asking what they did it for; a number answered they had nothing to do with it, and some said they dug it for amusement; Captain Shortland said, if they did not disperse, he would be obliged to fire upon them; he then went away; they then dispersed, and some who were digging went into their prisons; I heard no insulting language to Captain Shortland; the hole was then large enough for a man to get through; saw none attempt to get through; I considered the digging of the hole was merely through mischief; a number of small places had been dug in the wall in the course of the day; a great many prisoners were in the yard No. 7—more, perhaps, than usual, it being so fine an evening; I went towards my own prison, and found all the doors but one shut; I heard a great noise at the top of the yard, and went towards the gates; heard many cry out "keeno;" keeno is said among the prisoners when any thing falls, even in the prison; many cry it out when they do not know what is the matter; I suppose there were about forty or fifty soldiers then in the market square, drawn up on one side; the prisoners were going through at No. 1 gate; the soldiers came down to the charge, and then drew back; the prisoners were not so numerous as the soldiers; I suppose there might be thirty prisoners in the square; they made no opposition; some of them appeared to be in liquor; the prisoners are not permitted to be in the market square; the gates were locked; when the prisoners were driven through the gate, the soldiers fired; they fired into No. 1 gate; I heard no order to fire; was not in a situation to hear it; the soldiers fired right into the gates; did not observe how the muskets were levelled the first fire; I considered they fired with blank cartridges at first; this was into No. 1 gate, and there were only a few shots, but afterwards a volley; I saw a man fall at No. 7 gate, when I, with others, attempted to remove him, when another volley was fired in; put him behind the wall; he said he was wounded in the breast; we put our hands there, but felt nothing; he soon died, and then we found the ball had entered his head. At the time of the first fire, I heard no abuse from the prisoners, nor saw any stones thrown during the whole time; there was some turf inside the square, which I thought had been brought in by the people who had the liberty of the square; after the first fire, the prisoners did not rally or cheer, but were eager to get into their prisons; I cannot say why so many of the prisoners were out at the time; I did not hear the alarm-bell; a number of prisoners knew nothing of it till they heard the reports of the muskets; saw an officer with the soldiers; the officer was the first man who entered No. 7 yard; it was not Captain Shortland; I saw Captain Shortland in the yard, but whether it was he or the other officer who first came in I do not know; I saw an officer have hold of a prisoner by the collar, and strike him with a sword once or twice; he made no attempt to stab him; I then went into No. 7, and saw nothing more. There was no particular uneasiness among the prisoners at not being released, only talking about it, and saying they thought it hard; but they were as obedient to the orders and regulations of the prison as before the account of the ratification.

John Hubbard, prisoner, being sworn, says: I was carrying a wounded man to the hospital; Captain Shortland came up to me, (I was then about half way up the market square;) he ordered me to drop the man; I told him I should not, for he was a dead man, and I wanted to take him to the hospital; he gave me a crack on the neck with his fist, and ordered the soldiers to charge on us; I then went back directly, as the soldiers were running towards me, and ran in; they did not follow us any distance; they halted as soon as we ran; when I got in I called to Captain Shortland, and told him, "You will recollect, sir, you struck me, if you are brought to account for this;" he said "he would strike my damned heart if he had me there;" I am sure of this; I did not threaten him that I would have satisfaction of him. I do not know any of the men who were with me, helping to take the dead man; there were about four or five; the soldiers at this time were drawn up across the square; there had been much firing before this; I saw the soldiers fire into No. 3, after the prisoners were in; I was standing close to the door; I belong to that prison, and mess close to the door; there were eighteen or twenty soldiers at the door, but do not know whether they all fired; I saw the muskets levelled; seven or eight shots struck the stairs, and some went to the other side of the prison; at this time there were five or six prisoners going in at the door; one got wounded on the step; I did not see any stones thrown out, but heard afterwards there was one thrown out.

Homer Hull. (His evidence before the coroner being read to him, he said it was correct.)
I am sure I heard Captain Shortland give orders to fire; I was then about thirty or forty feet from him, near gate No. 4, under the platform; he was then facing me; the first fire was a volley; there were no straggling guns preceded the volley; they fired immediately after they got the word; there was no hesitation. I do not think there were more than three or four prisoners in the market square in front of the soldiers at the time of the first fire; they had retreated through the gate, and shut it after them.

James Reeves, prisoner, being sworn, says: I belonged to prison No. 1. I was rather groggy that evening. I saw a mulatto man, who was groggy, break the chain which fastened the gate No. 1, with a bar like a crowbar; the bar was flat and thick, something like a chisel, about two feet long; the alarm-bell was ringing at the time he was breaking the chain, before the gate was broken open. I suppose there were as many as fifty persons around the gate; the pressure they made parted the gate sooner. As soon as the gate was open, a great many rushed through into the square; there were about twelve or thirteen; there were a great many between the two railings; they were all hallooing and making a noise. I went out into the square; I was tipsy, or I suppose I should not have done it. I saw the soldiers coming down; they charged upon us immediately, and I then went back directly. I was pricked. I lost my hat, and went to pick it up, when I was pricked again. I went back with my face to them; some turned their backs; but I stood a little more upon going back than I should have done had I been sober. I received two pricks in the breast, and two in the arm. We shut the gate as soon as we could. Captain Shortland was abreast of the gate No. 1, in front of the soldiers. I am pretty sure he was in front of them. I heard him sing out "fire" twice; heard him order both to charge and fire; can swear I heard him order to fire twice; think Captain Shortland was in front of the soldiers; cannot say how he escaped being shot more than myself. I heard no shouting among the prisoners after the firing. After we were inside No. 1 prison, I watched an opportunity, being mad at being pricked, and flung a stone myself out at the soldiers; the soldiers had fired into the prison before I did so. I saw no stones thrown, nor heard any abuse after the charge and before the firing; but, after the firing, the prisoners ran into the yard, and sung out "fire, and be damned," and dared them. I cried out "fire, and be damned," which I did because I was mad at being pricked for nothing, as I thought. Mr. Magrath, the surgeon, spoke to us, and desired us to go back; he said, if any blame was to be attributed to any body that we were not sent home, it was not owing to Captain Shortland or the English Government, but to Mr. Beasley. Some did go back in consequence, and if I had been sober I should probably have done so too. This was before any soldiers were in the square.

William Mitchell, prisoner, being sworn, says: I belonged to No. 1; was walking in the yard, as were a great many more, it being very fine; did not know any thing particular was going on. I saw Nichols, the turnkey, running down, and a great many prisoners with him singing out "keeno;" they ran out of curiosity, to see what was the matter; I did not know what was the matter. About this time I heard first a single musket, and afterwards a volley, and then more. I asked what was the matter, and was told some boys had made a hole in the wall of No. 7 yard. I said, "What do they fire here for?" I went and helped to shut the inner gate of No. 1, and said we had no business with soldiers there. There were not above thirty prisoners there at that time. The soldiers came in. I saw two officers, and spoke to one, and asked him why he fired upon people who made no resistance? He told me he had been through the hole in the wall himself. Captain Shortland told the prisoners to go to their prisons. The soldiers came in, charged them to their prisons, and wounded several. I did not hear the horn or the alarm-bell. The prisoners do not usually go in when the horn first sounds, till the turnkeys come down and tell them to turn in; they first go and lock three doors, and afterwards the fourth and last.

George Challacumb, being sworn, says: I am a carter, belonging to the prison establishment. I went to Plymouth on the 6th of April with a letter; I overtook a man named Roberts on the road, who had been released from prison that morning; he told me his name was Roberts. I entered into conversation with him; he said he was glad he was released, for he thought that in a few days an attempt would be made to break out of prison. I asked him how it would be done; he said there was talk among the ringleaders that it should be at the time the bread wagons went in, when the iron gates were open; and he feared the consequences would be very great: he said that Slater and Jack Crandall were ringleaders of the whole. I did not mention this at Plymouth. It was ten o'clock at night when I returned, and then the affair at the prison had happened. Next morning I told the chief clerk, Mr. Holmden, what I had heard, and advised him not to keep both gates open at once. (There are on the books two such names as Slater and Crandall.)

Lot Davis, prisoner, of No. 5 prison, being sworn, says: I was walking about half way between the hole and the gate. The cook house of No. 6 was, I thought, the only safe place from the firing; I tried to get into No. 5, but could not, and remained in the cook house until next morning. I heard scattering guns firing after the prisoners were all running away, as if fired at single persons crossing the yard.

Samuel Best, turnkey, being sworn, says: On opening the door from the railing towards the receiving house, on the morning of the 5th April, about half-past seven o'clock, a prisoner said to me, "Well, turnkey, how did you like the keeno yesterday?" I told him I did not know any thing of it, having been away; but, from what I heard, they had acted very improperly; he said, "Damn you, in a quarter of an hour we can have all the bloody walls down." I turned round, and the conversation ended. No other prisoners joined in these expressions; several were round, waiting to go into the receiving house. On the 6th instant, in the evening, when all was quiet after the affray, Mr. Mercer, who assisted in the dispensary, said he hoped the prisoners would not attempt any thing again; I replied, it would be quite madness, as they were unarmed, and hoped they would be reconciled. He said it might be different if they were to make another attempt, as they would not be taken by surprise again; and intimated, as I understood, that they had upwards of three hundred pistols and five hundred files, which I understood were sharp and fastened on pieces of wood, and enough gunpowder to blow up the walls. I heard the next day a prisoner say, on the other side of the wall, if they could have got one hundred muskets they would have been better pleased, or would have done better, or something to that effect.

David Spencer Warren, prisoner, being sworn. (His evidence before the coroner was read to him, and he said it was all true, and that he had nothing to correct.)

I was within seven or eight feet of Captain Shortland when I heard him give orders to fire; I was inside my own prison yard, and Captain Shortland was close to the gate; that was the first firing I heard; there had been none before. Soldiers had broken up their line when Captain Shortland led them into the prison yard. Captain Shortland was at the head of them, in front of them all, when I heard him tell the men to fire. They did not fire the first time he said "fire;" it was about a minute afterwards before they fired. He said "fire" three times; the last time he caught hold of a musket, and turned it towards a man standing opposite him, saying, "God damn you, fire." I cannot swear that that musket was fired. The firing commenced at first by one musket, then two, and afterwards a general fire. I am sure the firing did not begin by a volley. I am sure what I state is true. There had been no firing before I saw Captain Shortland take hold of the musket; I had heard none. I saw no prisoners have hold of this musket at the time. Captain Shortland, when he told them to fire, was in front; one soldier beside him. They might have fired at his side, or over him, without hurting him.

Richard Walker, private in the Derby militia, being sworn, says: I was one of the south guard on the evening of the 6th; I was in the market square when the firing began, on the right of the north guard; when it began, there was not a prisoner in the square; when the soldiers charged, there were a great many in; cannot say how many. They went back to their own yard directly; was formed nearly on a line with the north guard. After the charge the prisoners returned to the gate, and tried to force it; they made a great noise, and used very abusive language; they did not come back into the market square. I heard no order to fire; first one musket was fired; it was by a sentry posted at the bottom of the square, in consequence of the prisoners abusing him. I saw this; I cannot say I saw the prisoners take hold of his musket. I saw them throw no stones before, but after it was fired they did; one hit me on the arm. I might not have seen it had the prisoners caught hold of his musket. It might be two minutes before there was firing again. As soon as the prisoners threw stones, there was more firing. They fired several together, but not in a volley. Do not recollect I heard any order to fire. Heard several call out "fire," and supposed it might be the prisoners who were calling out. I heard the word "fire" repeated, but do not know by whom. I was close enough to hear the prisoners call out. Saw Captain Shortland come down, break through the guard, and heard him order them to cease firing; this was very soon after the firing began. He called out to the prisoners, "For God's sake, men, go in, go in." The soldiers did the same. Captain Shortland came down the square from behind the line, broke through the guard, and ordered them to cease firing. I did not know where he was before the firing.

William Ward, private in the Derby militia, being sworn, says: I was not in the market square when the firing began; I came up just after. Captain Shortland, after it had continued some time, came up, and ordered the soldiers to cease firing; they immediately ceased. He said to the prisoners, "For God's sake, all of you go in;" the whole of the soldiers said the same. The prisoners ran up to the gates after that with a stronger force than before, making a great noise, but not insulting the soldiers. Saw no stones thrown. When Captain Shortland gave orders to cease firing, they did so immediately; afterwards the prisoners came up in large bodies; there was more firing; I did not see any prisoners come into the square after that. I do not know who ordered the firing afterwards; I heard Captain Shortland order the soldiers to cease firing; he ran from behind the line to the front, and held up both his hands, saying, "For God's sake, cease firing."

William Norris, turnkey, being sworn, says: I was not in the market square before the firing ceased. I came into the front yard, and was told by a turnkey in the lodge that the prisoners had made a breach. I ran to it, and some soldiers came to relieve the sentry at the hole. The prisoners were abusing him, and daring him to fire, saying his orders were not to fire. I saw Captain Shortland at the breach; he said the prisoners must have some bad intention. He came round by the military way to the front of the gate, and ordered me to ring the alarm bell, which I did; he was then in front of the upper gate, between it and the lodge; this was previous to any knowledge of the bursting the gate. When I had rung the alarm-bell, I went to the military way; one musket was fired first, and afterwards there was a general fire; after which, Captain Shortland and some officers called for the turnkeys; I ran through the line; he told me to take a wounded man to the hospital, which I and two others did. I returned to the market square; he ordered me to take another; he was dead. I took him to the burying house. The wounded man was brought out of No. 1; the dead man I found in the square. I was afterwards employed in carrying away the wounded.

John Rodd, turnkey, being sworn, says: I blew the horn for locking up, on the evening of the 6th; blow it always for about one quarter of an hour; I did so that evening; I went down afterwards to lock up No. 4 prison; while at the doors of it, I heard the alarm bell-ring; as soon as the prisoners hear the horn, they generally begin to go in; they did so that night; they were going into No. 4 quite fast; they rushed out again, up to the gates, to see what was the matter; they ran up the yard; I cried out that night, as I went down the yard, "Turn in, turn in; the alarm-bell is rung to assemble all the department." I came back into the market square, and when I got there, there was a firing, and a cry for the turnkeys; I came, and assisted to carry the wounded men to the hospital.

Daniel Nicholls, turnkey, being sworn, says: I was in prison yard No. 1, to lock the doors; the horn had done sounding before; before I came to the first door to lock up, the alarm-bell rang; the prisoners were going in just as usual; but, when the alarm-bell rang, they called out to know what was the matter, and thronged so much to the door that I could not shut it; I proceeded towards the gate, but, before I reached it, the firing commenced; I was about half-way up the yard when it began; hearing a ball whizzing by me, I returned to the end of the prison, and waited some time, till, seeing the lamplighter get over the wall by his ladder, I thought it a good opportunity for me to get over also, and did so; I came round to the market square; Captain Shortland was calling for turnkeys, and I went to assist in carrying the wounded to the hospital; the firing had ceased in the market square when I reached it; I heard much firing afterwards in the prison yards; when I came to lock up the second time, the prisoners threw a stone at me from No. 1, and the sentry then fired in at the door; I do not know who the sentry was; they shoved the door to, and would then open it again, and throw out stones, before I could fasten it; I cannot say whether the door was open when the sentry fired.

David Pitmore, turnkey, being sworn, says: The first I heard of the affair was a call for the guard; I went to the lodge, when Captain Shortland ordered the alarm-bell to be rung; I staid at the top of the yard till I heard a call for the turnkeys, and I then assisted in carrying away the wounded men; was at the lodge before the alarm-bell rang; I saw the soldiers charging the prisoners back; they drove them out under the platform; saw the first firing; several prisoners rushed into the square before the charge; I do not think there were any in the square before the alarm-bell rang; afterwards a gate was open, and they were coming through.

John French, turnkey of prison No. 3, being sworn, says: I was going to lock up as usual on the evening of the 6th, after the horn had sounded; I was in the yard; the prisoners were going in very quietly; had locked one door, and then heard the alarm-bell; the prisoners asked what was the matter; I said I did not know; I continued locking up, and locked three doors; this went on till the firing began; I stood at the end of the prison, and then got over the wall by the lamplighter's ladder; I did not see the prisoners come out of No. 3 after the firing began; came round to the market square; the firing was then over there; after assisting to carry the wounded to the hospital, I went to lock up No. 3; the soldiers fired in the door of that prison; I told the prisoners to go in; they were in the doorway, and I touched them slightly with my hand, telling them to go in and let me shut the door, or the soldiers would fire; one of the soldiers touched one with his bayonet, and advised them the same, or they should fire; one man told him he might fire and be damned; immediately an order was given to fire by somebody behind—whether by an officer or non-commissioned officer, I do not know, and several muskets were fired into the open door, (I cannot say how many,) upon which I saw some prisoners drop; do not know who ordered to fire; sentries said to them, "If you do not go in we must fire on you;" they said "Fire, and be damned;" I believe only one said so; there were many soldiers about the door; cannot say whether the soldiers could have driven them back by their bayonets, without firing, so as to have enabled me to shut the door; the soldiers were about eight feet from the door when they fired; I was in front, and got back as quick as I could, and bent down as they fired.

James Carley, turnkey, being sworn, says: I came to the front of the iron gate in the military walk; saw Captain Shortland coming from the barracks with soldiers; he made a halt at the blacksmith's shop; I saw prisoners rushing towards the gate No. 1, between the two railings; they sang out "keeno;" I ordered out the bread-wagon, then in the market square; I opened the gate for the purpose; as soon as the wagon was out I heard a bar knock against No. 1 gate; I called out to Captain Shortland that the prisoners were breaking out; he went down with the military with both his hands in his breeches pockets; the prisoners were rushing out, but I could not see how many there were, the military being between them and me. I staid till I heard a cry for the turnkeys; went down to assist in carrying the wounded; I saw a charge, but do not know whether it made the prisoners go back.

Samuel Morgan, turnkey of No. 7, being sworn, says: After the horn had sounded I was in Nos. 5 and 7 yards, going to lock up. No door was locked when the alarm-bell rang. When I first went into the yard there was a great crowd of prisoners round a hole in the wall; as I passed by they sang out "keeno," and they and others in the yard ran towards the railings, near the market square; about this time there were nearly seven or eight hundred prisoners in the yard; many belonged to other yards; I took no notice. When I got to the cook house the bell rang; they asked me what was the matter; I said I did not know; I passed on, and when I had shut one door I heard a firing; the prisoners seemed to retreat then. I got over the railings into the military way by the lamplighter's ladder. There were then three doors of the prison open. I saw no stones thrown by the prisoners, being at the lower part of the yard, where there was no tumult. I came round to the market square when the firing was over; only a few muskets were fired afterwards; but did not see any while I was in the military walk. I saw the sentries fire from the ramparts. I then helped to carry away the wounded, seeing others do so. After locking up prison No. 7, which I did without difficulty, I went to No. 1, to shut up, and, when putting one of the doors to, stones were thrown out; I was struck by one on the breast, and by one on the chin; I was pulling the inside door to; no muskets were fired into it then.

William Wakelin, turnkey of No. 5, being sworn, says: I had locked three doors of No. 5, when I heard a great noise, and the word "keeno" several times. On entering the prison yard there was a great body of prisoners between prison No. 7 and the barrack wall, round where the hole was; there were not more than usual round the railing. As usual, some prisoners were going in, and some kept coming out: there was nothing unusual in their manner at the bottom of the yard. I was coming up towards where the noise was, when a bullet hissed by close to me. I then ran towards the ramparts to get out of the way. I got over the wall by the lamplighter's ladder; then I came round to the market square, where I saw the soldiers drawn up in ranks. I went down, and heard Captain Shortland call out for the turnkeys. I assisted to carry the wounded. The prisoners brought a wounded man from No. 1, and insisted on carrying him up themselves; Captain Shortland ordered them to go back, but, as they refused, he put out his hand, and pushed one of them, without using violence; they would not go, and the soldiers were obliged to charge on them; one man pulled open his clothes, and challenged them to fire; Captain Shortland pushed him, but it was not with violence. This man was very turbulent; his name is James Reeves. Afterwards I went to lock up No. 5; then all was quiet, and the prisoners were all away from the door.

Richard Arnold, turnkey, being sworn: (His evidence before the coroner was read to him, and he said it was all perfectly correct.) Captain Shortland, at the time of the first fire, was in front of the line of soldiers, and it was almost impossible for him, had they fired a volley, to escape death himself. He was persuading the prisoners to go back when I told Captain Shortland they were making a hole in the wall; he told me to call the guard, but did not use any oath, nor did he blame me for not telling him of it before.

John Arnold, steward at the contractor's store for the prisoners in health, being sworn. (His evidence before the coroner was read to him, and he said it was correct, and that he had nothing material to add to it.)

Stephen Hall, turnkey, being sworn: (His evidence before the coroner was read to him, and he said it was correct.) One of the iron bars mentioned therein was bent; the bars appeared to him to be some of those from the railings.

John Tozer, being sworn. (His evidence before the coroner was read to him, and he said it was correct, and that he had nothing to add to it.)

Henry Wroe, plumber and glazier at the prison establishment, being sworn, says: I saw the sentry at the breach charge down his musket, and several stones thrown at him, while he kept telling the prisoners he must fire. I was then on the south guard platform. I went to the platform, at the foot of the market square, and saw about six or seven hundred prisoners at the hole; and presently they sung out "keeno," and ran towards the railings; they rushed in under the platform. Seeing this, I left the platform, and was going up to the market square; before I was half-way up I heard them knocking the chain of No. 1 gate, which soon burst open, and a great number (I cannot say how many, but suppose about five or six hundred) rushed into the square. I did not see Captain Shortland or the soldiers come into the square. The prisoners had broken the lock before they came in; it was done before I left the square; the alarm-bell rang after I left it. Being called again, he said: he does remember to have told Captain Shortland that the gate was burst; Captain Shortland was then in the military walk, near the turnkeys' lodge, standing alone, without the guard; he did not hear him give any order in consequence. It might be a minute or so before Captain Shortland went into the square.

John Mitchell, clerk to Captain Shortland, being sworn: (His evidence before the coroner was read to him, and he said that it was correct, and he had only to add as follows:)

While I was on the platform observing the prisoners throwing peat at each other, as I stated in the deposition, between the wall and the iron railings, I observed a great body of prisoners round the place where the breach was, but they were so numerous that I could not see what was doing. When I went with the turnkeys to remove the wounded, I observed Captain Shortland exerting himself as much as a man could do for them, and in having them conveyed to the hospital; he desired me to procure turnkeys to remove a wounded man who was sitting in a sentry box, and desired me to exert myself as much as possible in having the wounded removed; the cry of the military for the keys of Nos. 5 and 7 was from those who had not been active, and appeared to me to proceed from anxiety to secure the prisoners, not from any vindictiveness; this party did not fire while I was in the yard with them; they called for the keys for the purpose of shutting up the prisoners.

Robert Holmden, first clerk to Captain Shortland, being sworn: (His evidence before the coroner was read to him, and he said it was correct.) I saw a great body of prisoners at the breach; the prisoners had broken the gate of No. 1, next the market square, before the alarm-bell rang; I was with Captain Shortland when the report of it was made to him; it was made by Henry Rowe; whereupon Captain Shortland, who was a great deal agitated, said, "Where are the guards? where shall we get help?" and I advised ringing the alarm-bell, which was done.

Robert McFarlane, assistant surgeon, being sworn. (His evidence before the coroner being read to him, he said it was all correct.)

John Bennett, store clerk, being sworn, says: I was at the breach; the prisoners were using very abusive language. I saw no stones thrown. I proceeded down the military walk; I was very near Captain Shortland, near the blacksmith's shop in the military way; several people reported to Captain Shortland that the prisoners were forcing the gate, and he then ordered the alarm-bell to be rung; he went into the square with the guard; I heard Captain Shortland tell the prisoners in the market square to go back to their different prisons, and say how sorry he should be to use force; he remonstrated with them; this seemed to have no other effect than to produce the most infamous language from them; some minutes after a musket went off, and soon after many others; I was then so near Captain Shortland that I am sure I should have heard it had he given orders to fire, but I did not, nor did I hear an order from any body. I did not see the charge. I heard Captain Shortland order the soldiers to advance. Captain Shortland said, in my hearing: "My good fellows, go to your different prisons, or the military must do their duty." I suppose the prisoners in the square must have exceeded some hundreds when Captain Shortland went in with the guards.

George Magrath, surgeon of the hospital, being sworn: (His evidence before the coroner was read to him, and he said he had nothing to add to it, but felt it his duty to say:)

As some imputation of inebriety has been made against Captain Shortland, I think it justice to say, that, having observed him on the evening of the 6th, no man could be more free from it; and from my acquaintance with him, and with his general habits in his family, I do not think any man can be more abstemious. I should consider it equally incumbent on me, as imputations of barbarity have been made against him, to say, that, whenever I had occasion, as often happened, to make representations to him of any arrangement calculated for the health and comfort of the prisoners, he has always adopted it with great alacrity, and shown every disposition to do every thing for their welfare.

George Holland, bugler of the Derby militia, being sworn, says: I recollect sounding the bugle on the evening of the 6th, in consequence of the prisoners breaking the wall; several officers of the Somerset passing backwards and forwards in the military way said the prisoners were breaking down the wall, and were breaking out of the gates, and were getting out, and every person would be killed, and told me on that account to sound a fire on the bugle, which I did; before this, a considerable time, there had been firing, and I am sure not four men would have known any thing about the sounds of the bugle if they were asked now.

Adjourned until to-morrow at 8 o'clock.

DARTMOOR PRISON OF WAR, MONDAY, April 24, 1815.

Met, pursuant to adjournment, at 8 o'clock: Present, Paul Treby Treby, Esq.

JOHN COLLARD, sergeant in the first Somerset militia, being sworn, says: I was on the north guard, commanded, on the evening of the 6th, by Lieutenant Avelyn. Some one belonging to the department came and told me to call out my guard, saying, "Fall in your guard as soon as possible, and march it up to the west yard," and that that guard was going to the barrack yard where the breach was. I fell in the guard, and marched them up opposite the west guard, where I halted them; was not there long before Captain Shortland came up; he ordered me to take the guard to the market square and form it across; had seen nothing before this of what had passed. On entering the market square I heard a chain rattle at gate No. 1, on the left hand side. I formed the guard across the square; the guard was at the west guard house before the alarm-bell rang; it rang a little at first, stopped, and then I heard Captain Shortland order it to be rung again. This was before we went into the square; it was not rung again till we were going in. I observed two or three prisoners come out of gate No. 1, from the prison yard, just as I entered the market-gate; a greater number had entered before the guard formed; whilst it was forming I ordered the two sentries in front of the railings at the bottom, and the two on the platform above, to leave their posts and join the guard; they were all that were at those situations. As soon as they heard me thus order, the prisoners began to cry out "keeno," and rushed into the square in as great numbers as they possibly could, through the gate which had been broken. By the time I had formed my guard they came up in great numbers, close to us, on our left flank; the guard gave way on the left, where it was weakest, and where the prisoners made the greatest efforts to pass; the soldiers were then at the shoulder, when the guard gave way. Captain Shortland ordered it to charge; he told off about fifteen file himself, whom he ordered to charge; repeated it two or three times before they did; they endeavored to drive them back, but did not charge the same as they would an enemy; if they had they must have killed scores of them, as every bayonet would have told; they tried to drive them back without committing murder; the right of the guard did not charge; we drove them back about half the ground they had gained in the square. I was in the rear of the charging party; only the fifteen file told off charged in this way at first; the prisoners then began to throw stones at us in great numbers from within the railings and from the market square; there were some scores still in the market square; they were hurraing at the same time. An order was then given to fire on them; I heard the word given to fire by some one; I think the word given was in my rear; we were in great confusion; I was then in the rear of the soldiers; the prisoners were crying out "fire;" I could not then see Captain Shortland; I did not look out for him; I had something else to think of when the order to fire was given; two or three men fired; immediately they obeyed the order; one musket was discharged first, and one or two very soon after. When these were discharged I did not see any man killed, or any one hurt among the prisoners; I think the soldiers fired over their heads; then some prisoner or prisoners said, "You buggers, why do you not fire? you have nothing but blank cartridges." Afterwards the firing became general, and the prisoners were driven into the yard. I heard no word of command for the second firing; the firing was not in a volley, but in small numbers at a time. There was no general return of the prisoners from the yard after the firing had taken place; they could not stand the firing; they could not come without being murdered, the whole of them; they did not rally after the firing became general. I do not know how long the firing continued; but after it had gone on some time the prisoners dispersed into their yards; then Captain Shortland ordered the firing to cease. I am sure he did. He put up his hands, and said "cease firing," giving it as a word of command; it then ceased generally in the market place. As soon as possible a party of soldiers was ordered into the prison yards to turn the prisoners into their different prisons. I know nothing of what happened afterwards in the prison yard, as I remained in the square with the rest of the guard. I afterwards heard some firing in the yard, but paid no attention to it. I think the firing must have ceased from the ramparts soon after, otherwise some of our soldiers in the yard must have been shot. The general tenor of the prisoners' conduct was riotous. Many of our men were much hurt by the stones thrown, but not so as to be disabled from doing duty. I am satisfied, in my own mind, that, without the firing, the prisoners could not have been driven back. Had we charged on them like an enemy, we must have killed a great number; every bayonet must have killed one or more prisoners, they being so thick. The number of soldiers in the square, at the first firing, was about fifty-four, exclusive of sergeants; our guard was about thirty-eight, and there were about fourteen of the west guard. I cannot say how many came in afterwards. The whole regiment assembled as soon as possible after the alarm; no officer gave orders to cease firing before Captain Shortland; had there been such an order, it would have been obeyed.

STEPHEN LAPTHORN, private in the first Somerset militia, being sworn, says: I was on the north guard on the evening of the 6th; went into the market square with it; when I first went in I saw two or three prisoners in the square near No. 1 gate; about one hundred and fifty came in afterwards, while we were forming; they pressed up very near the military; some of the military were ordered to charge, which was done; some prisoners went back in consequence, but others were coming through the gate upon us. Before the firing began they had never been entirely driven out of the square. I heard an order given to fire, but do not know who gave it; it came from the right, in front; I was on the left. I did not see Captain Shortland at this time; I cannot say whose voice it was; am not sure whether it was from the prisoners or the military. The firing began immediately from about the centre; it did not begin by one musket, but by several together. When the firing began, I was at the charge; two prisoners seized my bayonet, and tried to twist it off; I do not know who they were. I told them to let go; they said they would not, adding, "fire, and be damned." I got myself in danger, and was obliged to fire to get my musket released; I did so; but there were upwards of twenty fired before mine; saw a great quantity of stones thrown before my firing; while we were at the charge the prisoners threw them till the last; one man stooped to pick up his cap, which, I believe, had been knocked off by a stone; this was before any firing. I do not think the prisoners would have been driven back without firing; as they continued pressing on, Captain Shortland was persuading them to retire, but they would not, saying they were not prisoners of war. I heard Major Jolliff give orders to cease firing before they were driven into the prison yard, and before the firing ceased in the market square. I think he did so as soon as he came down; he was not there at first. Stones were thrown, and the firing continued in consequence after this order. I also heard several voices say "cease firing," but cannot say whether they came from the military or from the prisoners.

WILLIAM GIFFORD, private in the first Somerset militia, being sworn: (His evidence before the coroner was read to him, and he said it was all correct.)

I heard Captain Shortland say "cease firing," about a few minutes after it began; he put his hand up by way of signal, and said so; I do not know who gave the word to fire; I did not see where Captain Shortland was when the order was given to fire; I think he had just gone towards the left, and the word appeared to me to come from the right, therefore I think it could not have been he who gave it; I did not hear first one musket discharged; the firing at first must have been in the air, otherwise there must have been more prisoners hurt. Captain Shortland was running up and down when the word was given to fire; I heard no order given by any body else than Captain Shortland to cease firing; I do not know that it would have ceased had orders been given; the prisoners were throwing stones and bricks continually; the firing ceased for a few minutes, after Captain Shortland had ordered it to cease; the conduct of the prisoners was such that it made us afraid, from the stones thrown; and I do not think they could have been driven back without the firing. Had orders been given by any body else to cease firing, it might not have been heard, from the noise.

JOHN SOATHERN, private in the Derby militia, being sworn, says: I was one of the south guard on the evening of the 6th; was one of those formed across the square on the right of the north guard; I saw the prisoners charged down nearly to the railings; our guard charged down to the railings after the north guard. We went close to the railings; my bayonet touched them; when we got there, the prisoners began throwing stones; we stepped back a few paces, being so near the railings; one stone struck me on the right side; it almost knocked me down; I should have fallen had not a man kept me up; just then the firing commenced; after some time of firing Captain Shortland came in front, and said, holding his hands up, "For God's sake, men, cease firing—cease firing." He went near to the railings; I and several others called to him, "Come back, it is almost dusk;" he said "You know me, men; do cease firing;" but several muskets were discharged after this. Captain Shortland was not near me when it commenced; I did not see him; the order to fire was given at the left, and it passed through the ranks one after another, saying, "fire, fire," but there was so much noise and shouting by the prisoners, that it is impossible for me to say who gave the word; I believe I was the sixth or seventh file from the right; I remained in the market square; I do not know what passed in the prison yard; I heard no officer before Captain Shortland say "cease firing;" but a few seconds afterwards some officers did. I did not see any prisoners in the market square when the firing began, but they were behind the railings under the platform, throwing stones; I could not see about gate No. 1, there being sentry boxes between.

LIEUTENANT AVELYN, of the first Somerset militia, being sworn, says: I commanded the north guard on the evening of the 6th; I came into the market square with Captain Shortland; the prisoners had burst No. 1 gate, and were rushing through in a great crowd when we went in, so that I thought the whole of them were coming out; Captain Shortland went forward to speak to them. I heard him saying "My good fellows, do go back;" I did hear him say that, but the prisoners were making so much noise that I could not distinguish much of what he said; he also called to me not to suffer the prisoners to come too near my guard; they were then pressing forward in a very threatening manner; the guard was formed across the square, about the middle; my guard was then about thirty-eight men, and there were some others; the prisoners were so pressing on my guard, that many on the left fell back several paces, in order that they might not come too near them; they were then not close up to the wall, but I made them form close up afterwards; the left of my guard charged, and I was with them, driving the prisoners back; they did not charge by my order, nor did I hear Captain Shortland order it; I considered myself under Captain Shortland's orders; had I been alone, I certainly would have charged the prisoners long before, or rather have fired, conceiving it to be necessary from the threatening manner of the prisoners, and the great body of them which was coming up, and could soon have surrounded my guard. They were not quite driven out of the square by the charge; it was during this charge that I heard the first musket fired; I could not see where it was fired from, not being near enough, and being so much engaged in driving the prisoners back; it was, I think, to my right; at the first there was a single shot, and almost instantly after several others were fired; I heard no distinct order to fire; many of the prisoners were crying out to fire, and defying the soldiers; I was very near Captain Shortland at the time, and think I should have heard him had he given the order; I heard no distinct order at first, or at any time, to fire; Captain Shortland was then near gate No. 1, to the left, in front of the soldiers, and it would have been madness in him to have given the order in that situation. I was in front when the firing commenced, and retired into the rear for my own safety; the prisoners retreated on the firing taking place; I gave orders to cease firing after some time; my guard then ceased, and I went to the front of the men; I did not hear any body else give orders to cease firing before myself, neither Major Jolliff nor Captain Shortland; the noise was so great that I could not hear; I am certain, had any one man by chance fired, the irritation of the soldiers, from the stones thrown at them previously, was then so great that almost the whole of them would have followed; the prisoners did not appear to care for the bayonet, and I do not think, from the state they were in, they could have been driven back without firing. The charge was not made with violence, as against an enemy; the prisoners were struggling with the soldiers; many defied them; but others said they could not go back, as the press was so great; I remained in the market square; did not go into the prison yard; I kept my guard with me; one prisoner, after the firing was over, came up, opened his clothes, and dared the soldiers to fire; I do not think the prisoners generally were intoxicated, but resolute. I do not think any man could have behaved like Captain Shortland who was intoxicated, and I think he behaved with courage and humanity.

ENSIGN SAMUEL WHITE, of the first Somerset militia, being sworn: (His evidence before the coroner was read to him, and he said he had nothing to add or alter.) I do not know of any order to the soldiers on the ramparts to fire, but suppose they took it up from the others; I suppose there might have been about half a dozen of my guard in the market square; there was no firing through the breach.

LIEUTENANT FORTYE, of the first Somerset militia, being sworn, says: I had the command of the south guard on the evening of the 6th; I went into the square with my guard after the north was in, and formed on their right; they were already formed and in the act of firing when I arrived; that guard was then about fifteen or twenty feet from the iron railings; there were no prisoners in the square between my guard and the railings; could not see to the left, on account of the north guard; my guard took up the firing from others without any orders, immediately after they had formed in support of the north guard; as soon as we formed I ordered the firing to cease; as soon as it could possibly be restrained, I stopped it; it ceased almost immediately; I saw nobody else endeavor to stop the firing before; as soon as the prisoners had retired to their yards, my guard ordered their arms, remained where they were, and I remained with them; I cannot, therefore, speak to any thing that took place afterwards.

JAMES GREENLAW, late second officer of the Prince de Neufchatel, American prisoner, being sworn: (His evidence before the coroner was read to him, and he said it was all correct.) I was between the two railings under the platform when I heard Captain Shortland give the order to fire; I saw him then at the head of the troops, about the centre of the yard, close in front of them; when I heard the word to fire, I retreated into yard No. 4; had just got inside the gate when it began; it began immediately by a volley, not by a single musket; I am sure it began by a volley; I do not know how Captain Shortland escaped; I suppose he knew how to take care of himself, and that his own men would not fire on him; he appeared to me to be standing close to the soldiers; I saw no stones thrown before the firing began; I do not know that I could have seen them; the prisoners were trying to get into No.

3 quietly, when the soldiers fired into it; I did not see any resistance among them. (This prisoner has a midshipman's warrant in the United States navy, and a furlough.)

JOHN SLATER, citizen of the United States, being sworn, says: I do not know an American prisoner named Roberts; I have been confined here above six months; I know of no concert among the prisoners to break out by force, only attempts of individuals to escape at different times; I was at the gate No. 7; I was passing between Nos. 6 and 7 with two more men, when a party of five soldiers, I think, crossed at the further end of the prison from us; one man named Washington fell, but whether from the firing of this party, or from the ramparts, I do not know; he fell against me and knocked me down; I got up and ran away to my own prison, No. 5; there were only three prisoners on the spot where he was shot; the shot went through his temple.

ENOCH BURNHAM, citizen of the United States, being sworn. (His evidence before the coroner was read to him, and he said it was all correct, and that he had nothing to add to it.)

ALEXANDER MARSHALL, citizen of the United States, being sworn, says: I belong to prison No. 1; there were not more than fifty prisoners in the square when the soldiers charged; they charged as upon an enemy; they began firing, and I ran to No. 1 gate to get to my prison, but was nearly ten minutes before I could, on account of the press of the prisoners; there were about four hundred soldiers in the market square.

CORNELIUS ROWE, citizen of the United States, being sworn, says: I belong to No. 1 prison; I went to the breach; those about it told me it was made to get back a ball; they afterwards ran towards the gate No. 7, saying it was to shut it against the military; I saw the military come down the square, and heard Captain Shortland order them to charge; at which time there were about forty or fifty prisoners in the square; I made towards my prison, and just as I got into the yard there was a firing, and the prisoners were rushing as fast as possible to their own prisons; they shut the gate behind them; there were about one hundred and fifty soldiers in the square.

WILLIAM DEWETTER, citizen of the United States, being sworn, says: I ran towards the gate to see what was the matter; on arriving, I saw the soldiers charge; I turned round, and just as I got inside the inner gate shots were fired; one grazed the side of my head, which made me giddy, and turned me round two or three times; I saw a prisoner named Mann fall; went to him and took him up; the balls flew about so thick that if there was one I suppose there were one thousand.

THOMAS TINDALE, citizen of the United States, being sworn, says: I was under the platform; saw the soldiers coming down the market square, and heard Captain Shortland give orders to fire; he was then about the centre, and in front of the soldiers; he had on a blue coat, but without epaulettes; he had a drawn sword in his hand; he gave orders twice to fire; I was not ten steps from him when I heard him; I heard every word he said; I saw him plainly; the firing commenced by one musket first, then two, and afterwards a whole volley; the firing began when Captain Shortland gave the word the second time; I heard Captain Shortland tell the soldiers to fire low; he was then still in front of the soldiers; I believe he was standing before the muzzles of the foremost muskets; the soldiers were formed two deep; when the balls began to fly thick, I escaped into No. 3, and saw no more of what passed afterwards; when I heard the order to fire, I was about the middle of gate No. 4; the soldiers charged up to the railings, and then fell back four or five paces, when Captain Shortland gave the order to fire.

JOHN C. ROWLES, citizen of the United States, being sworn, says: I saw forty or fifty prisoners in the market square when the soldiers were drawn up.

THOMAS GEORGE SHORTLAND, captain royal navy, commanding at the depot, being sworn, says: On the evening of the 6th, a little before seven o'clock, Mr. Holmden, first clerk, came to my house and informed me there was a disposition of the prisoners to be riotous, as they had got between the railings and wall of No. 7 yard, and there were a number of people collected in No. 7 yard; in consequence, I walked down to the upper gates; on coming there, I was informed the prison barrack wall had been breached. I went to that yard and saw a large hole, and the military guarding it under an officer whom I since knew to be Lieutenant Avelyn; on getting to the breach I observed the prisoners using an iron bar to enlarge it. I remonstrated, and told them it was the prison barrack yard, and that it would be dangerous for them to attempt to force it; the prisoners shouted, and threw stones through the breach, and still continued at times to enlarge it. I then heard some one say "They are breaching the wall above the cook house in the prison barrack yard," and nearly at the same time there was a call out that they were forcing the lower gates, while I was still in the lower barrack yard. I immediately left the yard, and Lieutenant Avelyn followed me, leaving the breach with a party and a sergeant; when I arrived at the blacksmith's shop, I saw a rush of prisoners between the iron rails under the platform; the gate was at this time forced, and the prisoners were without the gates, in the market square, where they were not allowed to be; seeing this, and having in my mind the breach in the barrack wall, and the reported breach above the cook house; bearing this in mind, with the reported threats that had been constantly told me that the prisoners would liberate themselves on or before the 10th April, I ordered the alarm-bell to be rung: at this time part of the west guard, which is called the piquet, had gone round to turn the prisoners out of the railway in No. 7 yard, and another part of the same piquet was in the prison barrack yard; so that the force was reduced to the north guard only. Lieutenant Avelyn formed that guard and marched down into the market square. I preceded them, and about half-way down the guard formed in a line, keeping their left close to the hospital wall. At this time I should suppose there were from four to five hundred prisoners in the market square. I was perfectly unarmed, and went down to remonstrate with them, using all the persuasions in my power to make them return to their prisons, stating that the military guard was formed above them, and it was dangerous to attempt to use force. I was, at this time, about six paces in front of the guard; the prisoners kept still pressing up, and pressing me on the military; they appeared to want to get round the left of the military, keeping close to the hospital wall. At this time I looked back, and said, "For God's sake, soldiers, keep your ground;" bearing in mind that there was not a single soldier above these to prevent escape through the outer gates; almost immediately, about twelve or fifteen soldiers charged down towards No. 1, towards the hospital gates, about five or six paces, and they returned into line again. I was still at this time in front, and had gone forward again, urging the prisoners, who had retreated, when a discharge of musketry took place; while I was in that position, being to the right of the centre of the guard, and not near the hospital wall, a musket ball grazed my temple in that discharge, when I retreated into line with the soldiers; the prisoners retreated and advanced again, and about this time Major Jolliff came down. There was a call of "wounded men" from the prisoners, upon which I called to the turnkeys to assist in passing the wounded through the line of military, as they would not allow the prisoners to pass with them. While this was doing, there was another discharge both to my right and left. Those near me did not fire at this time, as, whenever I could, I had requested them to desist; the turnkeys came down, (this was after the second discharge,) and I was busily employed with Mr. Mitchell in directing the removal of the wounded up to the hospital. I can say nothing more of discharges of muskets in the market square. I only observed two discharges there. I heard some from the prison yards and from the ramparts. I was in the market square the whole time till the firing ceased, when Major Jolliff came down to the market square. I gave, myself, no further thoughts to the military, my whole mind being occupied in directing assistance to the wounded. I repeatedly said to the prisoners, "For God's sake, go to your prisons," previously to the firing, and between the discharges; for, being between the soldiers and them, I was warned by some of the former to keep clear of their fire, otherwise I should be shot. After the firing had ceased, and I got the receiving house door open to receive the wounded, I went into the north prison yard to see the prisoners shut up; the turnkey (Nicholls) of No. 1 had got them all in, but the door was not secured, but which was soon effected by the military without firing. All the troops were marched out before I saw any thing more: I was in my undress uniform, and was perfectly unarmed. I never did give an order to fire; and in support of this I can say, I stated in my official letter to General Brown, that Major Jolliff gave the orders to fire, conceiving he had done so, from seeing the major appear at that moment. Indeed, in a former conversation with General Brown, in the presence of Major Gladding, being asked whether if an attempt were made to resist the authority of the depot I should order the military to fire, I told General Brown, as well as the major, that I did not think myself authorized to command the military to fire, because it was their duty to do it when they thought it necessary. I do not recollect a suspension of the ringing of the bell and then commencing again; it was a continual ringing. I ordered it in consequence of seeing that the prisoners had broken through the breach in the wall and the other reported breach. I did not hear any order to fire; it must be understood that I was with the prisoners, who were making a great noise, hurraing and rioting at the time.

The two best prisons (as the prisoners call them) are the two smallest, and I do not conceive them to be the best, as the others are the most roomy, and have been put in a state of repair since the release of the French prisoners; those two (which are Nos. 2 and 6) have not. Being smaller, we keep one of them for a receiving prison for any draughts of prisoners who may come in of a sudden wet and fatigued; the other, when Doctor Baird, inspector of hospitals, was down, he requested might be reserved for particular cases of contagion, as a sort of quarantine receiving house for newly arrived prisoners, to prevent contagion spreading; the prisoners have been distributed nearly according to the directions of Doctor Baird, (he having power to alter the distribution on his visits.) The provisions of all the prisoners were stopped, by the transport board's direction, for undermining the prisons. I remonstrated with them that the innocent would suffer with the guilty; but they replied that it must be so, as in all general transactions of the kind. I was not out of the market square until all the firing had ceased; I was not in No. 7 yard until an hour after the whole was over. Gatchell's statement, about my running down that yard, is not true. I recollect a man coming up the market square with a wounded man, and after being told to go away he would not, and I gave him a push; he said that I must recollect I had struck him, but I made him no answer. Taking into consideration the apparent temper and resolution of the prisoners, and my remonstrances having no effect, I do not think they could have been driven back without firing; without the firing, I think they might have forced the guard, which they were in the attempt to do; if that guard had been forced, the depot would have been lost. On all occasions when the market was stopped, or any measure of the kind was taken, it was reported to the transport board, along with the reasons for it, and they sometimes directed the stoppage to be continued. I am in the habit of reporting it after it is done. (Captain Shortland read the copy of a letter to the transport board, dated 14th February, 1815: it states, that, in consequence of the escape of Simon Hayes, who had been directed by the board to be kept in close confinement in the Cachot, and his taking refuge among the prisoners, and the disorderly conduct of the prisoners in not allowing the lamplighters to do their duty, he had stopped the market; and he read their answer, dated 16th February, approving of the measure in consequence of the reasons he stated.) The market has not been stopped more than twice. The first time was on the 24th October, 1814, on account of the prisoners not permitting themselves to be counted out of their prisons in the morning, which was necessary to ascertain if there was any escape. In a letter of the 27th, the board approved of the measure. In consequence of this, and the riotous conduct of the prisoners, Captain Shortland stated several arrangements he had made since he came to the depot for the welfare of the prisoners; among others, the following: On one occasion, when orders had been sent to remove the stoves from the prison, on account of the health of the prisoners, he wrote a very strong letter to the board, urging that they might be retained, as they were very instrumental to the comfort of the prisoners. All the letters from prisoners to himself he opened and answered, and he keeps a clerk for the mere purpose of keeping accounts of moneys received for the prisoners.

He dates the commencement of the antipathy of the prisoners to him from the time when he got the transport board to prosecute some men for tattooing others; and states, that till that he was on good terms with them, going down at all times among them, as he used among the French prisoners.

Deposition of John C. Clement.

I sailed from New York the 9th January, 1813, on board the brig Star, Captain Reed, for Bordeaux, and was captured on the 9th February following, in the Bay of Biscay, by His Britannic Majesty's ship Superb, (74,) Honorable Sir Charles Paget, commander. Went into Basque Roads, where, with other prisoners, I was put on board the Warspite, (74,) Captain Sir Henry Blackwood; proceeded in her to Plymouth, (England,) and on 19th March was sent on board the Hector, prison ship. On the 2d April two hundred and fifty of us, American seamen, were marched to Dartmoor prison, where we were stowed in among nine or ten thousand French prisoners, who were in a filthy, dirty condition. During our confinement, Shortland, the keeper, repeatedly stopped our markets for several days at a time, without any provocation, or giving any reasons for this conduct, and our provisions were repeatedly short, not having our full allowance issued us. Shortland attempted several times to give us bad bread and provisions, and was guilty of many acts tending to irritate us, and render our situation very uncomfortable. On the 5th of April last, particularly, he gave orders to the contractors to serve us bad bread, which the prisoners would not receive, and, at the usual hour of closing the prisons, the turnkeys came to shut us in for the night; but we proceeded in a body to the market square, where an officer of the guard, on our representations to him, (Shortland then being absent to Plymouth,) advised us to return to our prisons, and he would have the bread sent us; which was done, and we retired to rest about twelve at night.

On the 6th of April, (the following day,) at 6 P. M., while a number of American prisoners were playing ball in yard No. 7, where a small hole, the size of a large pane of glass, sufficiently large to admit a boy or small man to pass through, had been made by some person or persons for the purpose of obtaining the ball when it flew over the wall into a large yard enclosed by high walls, (wherein the soldiers were stationed in the barracks:) at 6 P. M., as before mentioned, Captain Shortland, the keeper, entered the gate of No. 1, with 250 or 300 soldiers, armed with muskets and bayonets, the alarm-bell ringing at the same time, when he (Shortland) ordered one of the soldiers to fire at the prisoners in yard No. 1: the soldier not willingly obeying, he snatched a musket from one of them, and shot a prisoner. The soldiers then commenced firing on the prisoners, who were then sallying out of their prisons to learn the cause of the firing; the soldiers continuing at the same time to re-load and fire on them. Four or five soldiers proceeded at this time also to the extremity of the yard in pursuit of the flying prisoners, and, as they cried for quarters, they replied, "No quarter shall be given you, you damned Yankee rascals," or similar words, and instantly shot the flying prisoners. Shortland and the soldiers then proceeded to prison No. 3, (No. 2 being empty and closed,) where they fired through the windows and doors on the prisoners inside, and shot through the heart one man while in the act of drinking a can of beer, and wounded another as he was endeavoring to escape up stairs: they then proceeded to yard No. 4, where the second lieutenant, snatching a musket out of a soldier's hand, shot a boy; soldiers firing at the same time into the prison, through the doors and windows. After having received a reinforcement of soldiers, they proceeded to yard No. 7, where they commenced an indiscriminate fire on the prisoners, while they were flying to escape into their prisons.

On this day there were seven prisoners killed on the spot, and thirty-eight wounded, three of whom died two days after.

On the 7th of April a coroner's inquest was held, composed of American prisoners, (the officers of the prison being present, all save Captain Shortland,) when a verdict of "wilful murder" was brought in. On the 8th a coroner's inquest was held, composed of a number of neighboring farmers, who returned a verdict of "justifiable homicide." On the 9th, Admiral Rowley and a British post captain arrived at the prison from Plymouth, by direction of the transport board, to inquire of the prisoners into the transaction. During our confinement the American agent (Beasley) did not give us, say from 2d April, 1813, to March, 1814, the 6*s*. 8*d*. sterling per month, as well as the suit of clothes allowed us annually by our Government, which money and clothes the prisoners have never received; and when I, with two hundred and fifty others, was released from prison, there were likewise a shirt, pair of shoes, and 6*s*. 8*d*. due us, which we never received. The prisoners had applied to Beasley repeatedly for what was due them, but received no satisfaction.

He never visited the prisons but once during the two years and upwards I was there. The two hundred and fifty prisoners (and, among them, myself) were released from prison on the 20th of April last, and proceeded to Plymouth, and were put on board the cartel Maria Christiana, and arrived at New York on 5th June, 1815. I did not know, nor did I hear of a plot or scheme to escape out of prison, as alleged by Shortland, in justification of his attack on us on the 6th April; on the contrary, it is my firm belief, if the gates had been thrown open to us at this time, none of us would have sallied forth to escape, because, being most of us destitute of money, (the agent having withheld our pay;) numbers of us miserably clothed, and without shoes, (also withheld from us;) numbers having walked, when released from prison, barefoot to Plymouth; through fear also of being arrested and closely confined, or, what was more probable, impressed into the British service, at a time when there was a very hot impressment going on in England; because having also heard, some weeks previous, of peace having taken place between Great Britain and America, which would release us from prison.

I know of no cause or reason that can justify the unprovoked attack upon us by Shortland and the soldiery, but do verily believe that the thing was wantonly, wickedly, and maliciously premeditated by Shortland and his officers, to spill the blood and destroy a number of unarmed, defenceless American seamen.

Every thing I have stated, I do, to the best of my recollection, believe to be, without the least exaggeration, strictly true.

C.

Extracts of a letter from the Commissary General of Prisoners to Reuben G. Beasley, Esq., American Agent for Prisoners in England, dated

March 6, 1815.

I have received your letters of November 17th, December 21st and 31st last, by the British sloop of war Favorite. I could write you nothing definitive by the return of that vessel, in relation to the arrangements to be made in England for the restoration of our prisoners held there, as I could not, until after the time her despatches left the seat of Government of the United States, come to an understanding with Mr. Baker, chargé des affaires for His Britannic Majesty, as to the terms and manner of restoring the prisoners on both sides under the treaty.

I now enclose you a correspondence begun on the 22d February, and concluded on the 28th, on that subject; by this you will perceive the construction which is given here in relation to this point, and that Mr. Baker has declined in any way to commit his Government; and that, in order to produce as little expense and delay as possible to either Government in the operation, I have given him the election of several propositions, (after he declined to proceed on the principle which I had presumed to exist, and which in his letter of the 23d February he appears to admit:) that each party should restore to the country from which taken the prisoners held by it; and that the proposition he has accepted embraced the transportation of all the prisoners, British and American, at English or American stations in this quarter, at the expense, in the first instance, of this Government; the accounts to be adjusted hereafter, according to justice and the terms of the treaty between the two Governments. Preparations are now actually going on for the immediate removal and transportation of all the British prisoners we now hold in this country; in numbers probably about 3,590, military and maritime.

The question, you will remark, as to the restoration of American prisoners in England, is left open. You are requested, immediately on the reception of this letter, to communicate the correspondence with Mr. Baker to the proper authority of the British Government, to show what is doing here in relation to the delivery and receipt of prisoners of both countries, and to state that the liberal proposition, of taking upon ourselves the transportation both of British and American prisoners, and to make the requisite advances for this purpose, was offered in that spirit of amity which it was deemed, on the happy return of peace between the two nations, to belong to the case; to insure the most speedy relief to the unfortunate men held in durance by either; and to lessen the expense as much as possible to both Governments; and with an express reservation of the construction of the treaty, as given here without commitment of the principle contended for by us, that is, that each party should pay the expense of the transportation and delivery of the prisoners held by it; that the operation will be performed in the most economical manner practicable; and accurate lists of prisoners and accounts kept for the final adjustment of an account between the two Governments. And you will require of the British Government to transport and deliver all the American prisoners now in England, or elsewhere, not embraced in the arrangement with Mr. Baker, in the most speedy and convenient manner. If this be consented to, (as I trust it will,) you will ask to be permitted to make the same kind of interference which has been afforded here to the British agents, as by the enclosed copy of a letter to Mr. Barton (delegated by Mr. Baker) of the 6th instant.

You will request that the same rations be allowed to our prisoners which are supplied on board ships to the British prisoners about to be transported from this country, and that a sufficiency of sound stores be laid in to supply them for ninety days; and you will apply for permission to place on board each transport an agent on whom you can rely, who shall have power to inspect the stores and accommodations, and see that the prisoners are regularly and properly supplied. Persons proper for these agencies may, no doubt, be found among the American masters and mates, now prisoners in England, to whom it will be right to make some reasonable compensation for their trouble—say 30 or 40 dollars per month; and you will instruct each in writing, and direct them to make report, on their arrival, to this office. You will require, also, that the British Government put a surgeon on board each vessel, supplied with a proper quantity of medicine and medical stores, as has been done here.

In the embarcation and distribution, as to the ports of delivery here, you will have examined carefully all the lists; endeavor, as much as possible, so to assort the prisoners as that each may be placed, as far as is conveniently practicable, nearest his home, or, more properly speaking, to the port from which he sailed; and, for this purpose, you will designate for the destination of the transports four of our principal ports along the coast; that is to say, Boston, New York, Norfolk, and Charleston. I have named those near the ocean as being most easy of access, and least liable, on that account, to objection. To prevent complaint, it will be proper, with as few exceptions as possible, to send those prisoners first who have been longest in captivity. There is no other rule that carries so much justice with it; and it is naturally to be expected that, after such long and severe confinement, the anxiety of our unfortunate citizens, so held, to be released, will be very great; and preferences out of turn will be viewed with great jealousy and discontent.

It remains to point out to you what is to be done, should the British Government, under all the circumstances stated, refuse to restore to us our prisoners in England at its expense. After making all proper efforts on this point, and with as little delay as possible, should you fail, there will be nothing left (having first protested in a respectful but firm manner against such refusal, should it happen, and giving notice that an accurate account will be kept of all expenditures made by us, in this part of the transaction, for future adjustment under the terms of the treaty) but to take the most speedy and effectual measures of transporting them, at the expense of this Government, in the first instance at least, to the United States.

I have been particular in my instructions in this letter in endeavoring to anticipate alternatives, and to put you fully in possession of my ideas on all the points that occur to me at present, in order that you may be prepared to proceed, immediately on its reception, in some one course, without a moment's delay. The operation you will have to perform, whatever course be taken, is one of much consequence in every view; important to the Government, in affording the most speedy relief possible to our countrymen placed in the hands of its late enemy by the fate of war; highly interesting to these unfortunate men, whose anxiety to return to their country and friends must increase with the knowledge of the end of the war, and the expectation that nothing but forms and want of opportunity now retard their departure; and of great consideration to the commercial interest of the United States, to have restored to it so many valuable seamen with as little delay as possible.

Your zeal and activity are, therefore, fully counted on, to do all that may depend on you to conduct this business to the best advantage, in all its bearings, and with the requisite economy.

I particularly recommend that you do not permit the interchange of sentiments, in negotiation with the British Government, as to the mode and expense of transportation, to be spun out.. It will be expected that it will be prompt in deciding on the course it may determine to take in that matter. You will be readily able to show the necessity of an immediate decision.

From the Commissary General of Prisoners to George Barton, Esq.

OFFICE OF COMMISSARY GENERAL OF PRISONERS,

WASHINGTON, March 6, 1815.

SIR:

Having been referred to you by Anthony St. John Baker, Esq., chargé des affaires of His Britannic Majesty in the United States, in relation to the steps necessary to be taken to carry into execution the restoration of the prisoners of war, American and British, held in the United States, Canada, Nova Scotia, and the West Indies, according to the understanding which has taken place between him and myself, (of the nature of which you are apprized,) I have the honor to inform you that orders, some days ago, have been given for the immediate march of all the British prisoners captured on the land or the lakes to the frontiers of Canada, to be delivered at or near Odletown, and for the immediate embarcation, in commodious vessels, of all the maritime prisoners held at New York, Providence, Rhode Island, Salem, and at any port east of Salem, (comprising all the prisoners, indeed, held at or east of New York,) for Halifax. These will be transported in the public cartel ships Perseverance and Analostan, and an additional private transport ordered to be taken up at Salem. All the prisoners held at New York or Providence will be sent from Providence in the Perseverance or Analostan, whichever is first ready; and those at Salem, or east of it, or at any intermediate port, will be sent in the other public ship, and in the private ship from Salem. The British prisoners at Philadelphia have been ordered this day to be removed to New York, where they will be embarked in the frigate John Adams, armed en flute, for Bermuda. Those who were held in the waters of the Chesapeake have been ordered to be delivered on board the British public ships now in those waters, by an understanding had with the senior officer, (Captain Clavell, of the frigate Orlando,) and, it is presumed, have been by this time received by him. All those in North or South Carolina, or Georgia, will be, as soon as practicable, embarked from Wilmington, Charleston, and Savannah, for Bermuda, in public ships or private transports. As soon as the vessels are designated, which will be in a few days, you will be informed. Orders have been sent to the marshal of Orleans to collect and deliver, forthwith, all the British prisoners in that State, and the adjoining Territories, to the British officer commanding in those waters; and it is presumed they will reach him time enough to dispose of them before your public ships withdraw from that quarter. All these arrangements have been made, or are now in train, as I believe, according to the detail settled in different conversations between you and myself. If there is any thing in what I have stated different from your understanding of it, I shall be glad, as far as is in my power, to conform to it.

I have given particular orders that the British prisoners be not put in such numbers on board the vessels transporting them as to crowd them improperly, and am willing, if you think proper, that this shall be regulated by a certain number of men per ton. I have directed that sound and wholesome provisions, and plenty of water, be laid in for them, and served out on the passage in rations, as by the enclosed table; that a surgeon be allotted to each ship, provided with a proper quantity of medical and hospital stores; and I have directed the agents of this office, at the ports from which the prisoners are to be embarked, to make provision on board each ship for the accommodation of an agent, to be put on board by you, if you think proper to do so, to superintend the treatment and accommodation of the prisoners, and to inspect the quantity and quality of the provisions issued to them on the passage; and the masters of the respective ships will be instructed to respect such agents on your part in the performance of the duties assigned them.

In conformity with the request made in your letter of the 25th February, I have directed the marshal of North Carolina, and all the other marshals of the different States having charge of British prisoners, to release all the British prisoners, officers in their districts, respectively, whether of public or private service, who may not choose to wait the sailing of the cartels, and to permit them to leave the country at their option and expense.

I have ordered that all the British maritime prisoners be held and subsisted, as heretofore, at the several depots, until they are regularly embarked. If it be your wish, however, that any portion of these, other than those you have already designated for that purpose, should be discharged in the United States, it shall be done.

I have the honor to be, &c.

GEO. BARTON, Esq. J. MASON.

OFFICE OF COMMISSARY GENERAL OF PRISONERS.

J. MASON.

From R. G. Beasley to the Commissary General of Prisoners.

SIR: LONDON, April 13, 1815.

I had the honor to receive yesterday your letters of the 15th January, 6th, (two,) and 8th of March. I shall avail myself of the earliest occasion to notice their contents. In the mean time, I have to inform you that I have communicated to the transport board the correspondence between yourself and Mr. Baker on the subject of the restoration of prisoners, and have called on them to undertake the transportation to the United States of our prisoners in this country. Prior, however, to the receipt of your letter on this subject, I had engaged in this port nine ships for the conveyance of our prisoners, several of which have sailed for Plymouth to take them on board. I, in the first instance, endeavored to engage vessels at Portsmouth and Plymouth; but the turn of affairs in France having induced this Government to take up transports for the conveyance of troops, I could obtain none in those ports.

It is with extreme regret I have to state, that on the 6th instant the guard of the depot at Dartmoor, by order of the agent, fired on the American prisoners, killed five, and wounded thirty-four. I transmit, herewith, two reports of this unfortunate affair, (one from the transport board, and one from the admiralty office, through the foreign office.)

By the latter you will perceive that the prisoners are accused of having attempted to liberate themselves by force, and are stated to have been urged to this by the impression they were under that their own Government had neglected to provide means for their early conveyance home.

As the prisoners have been constantly informed of the exertions made by me for their release, and as on this occasion I had written twice to let them know the number of vessels taken up for their conveyance home, and the time they might be expected at Plymouth, it is difficult to believe, under such circumstances, that this is really the cause of this melancholy occurrence. I shall therefore inquire most minutely into all the circumstances attending it, and shall communicate the result to you, as also the names of those who have been killed and wounded.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

The Hon. JOHN MASON, &c. R. G. BEASLEY.

From Alexander McLeay to R. G. Beasley.

SIR: TRANSPORT OFFICE, April 10, 1815.

I am directed by the commissioners for the transport service, &c. to acquaint you, that, by a letter this day received from Captain Shortland, the agent for prisoners of war at Dartmoor prison, it appears that on the 6th instant the American prisoners confined at that depot made a breach in the prison wall, and attempted to liberate themselves, by making a violent attack on the guard; and that it became indispensably necessary, in order to quell the revolt, for the guard to fire upon them; in consequence of which five of the prisoners were killed and thirty-three were wounded.

I am further directed to observe, that it is much to be lamented that the extreme impatience of these unfortunate men to be discharged, at a time that measures were in a train for their liberation, should have produced such melancholy consequences.

I am, sir, your most obedient humble servant,

R. G. BEASLEY, Esq. ALEX. McLEAY, Secretary.

From J. P. Morier to R. G. Beasley.

SIR: FOREIGN OFFICE, April 11, 1815.

I lose no time in transmitting to you the copy of a letter which I have received from Mr. Croker, of the admiralty, giving a circumstantial account of the alarming riot which broke out on the 6th instant amongst the American prisoners of war confined at Dartmoor, and of the measures which it became necessary to pursue for the purpose of restoring order; and I am directed by Lord Castlereagh to request that you will take an early opportunity of forwarding this statement of the unfortunate event to your Government.

I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient humble servant,

R. G. BEASLEY, Esq. J. P. MORIER.

From J. W. Croker to J. P. Morier.

SIR: ADMIRALTY OFFICE, April 10, 1815.

My lords commissioners of the admiralty think it right to acquaint Lord Castlereagh that, on the evening of the 6th instant, a very alarming riot broke out among the American prisoners of war confined at Dartmoor. The rioters, it appears, endeavored to overpower the guard, to force the prison, and had actually seized the arms of some of the soldiers, and made a breach in the walls of the depot, when the guard found itself obliged to have recourse to their fire-arms, and five of the rioters were killed and thirty-three wounded; after which the tumult subsided, and the depot was placed in a state of tranquillity and security.

Admiral Sir J. T. Duckworth, commander-in-chief at Plymouth, having received information of this unfortunate event, lost no time in directing Rear-admiral Sir Josias Rowley, Bart. and K. B., and Captain Schornberg, the two senior officers at that port, to proceed to Dartmoor, and to inquire into the circumstances. Those officers accordingly repaired to the depot, where they found, on examination of the officers of the depot, and all the American prisoners who were called before them, that the circumstances of the riot were as before stated, and that no excuse could be assigned for the conduct of the prisoners but their impatience to be released; and the Americans unanimously declared that their complaint of delay was not against the British Government, but against their own, which ought to have sent means for their early conveyance home; and, in replies to distinct questions to that effect, they declared they had no ground of complaint whatsoever.

Their lordships think it right to add, that, on the 15th of last month, they directed the transport board to take measures for carrying the article of the treaty for the release of American prisoners into effect; and again, on the 30th ultimo, I was directed to write to know what steps had been taken under these directions; and the transport board answered, in their letter of the next day, that they had communicated with Mr. Beasley, the American agent, on the subject, who had acquainted them that he had already provided some transports, and was employed in procuring others, for the conveyance of the prisoners to America.

It will be for Lord Castlereagh to judge whether it may not be proper to make a communication on this subject to the American Government.

I am, &c.

J. P. MORIER, Esq. J. W. CROKER.

From R. G. Beasley to the Commissary General of Prisoners.

SIR: LONDON, April 15, 1815.

I enclose a copy of the report of the committee of our prisoners on the lamentable transaction of the 6th instant, which I communicated to you on the 13th, with a statement from the admiralty office on that subject.

I have transmitted a copy of the report of the committee to Lord Castlereagh, as also affidavits of three prisoners, who were in the prison at the time, and have since arrived in town.

As soon as I can obtain a list of the names of the unfortunate sufferers, it shall be transmitted to you.

I have the honor to be, &c.

The Hon. JOHN MASON, &c. R. G. BEASLEY.

From the committee appointed to investigate the circumstances attending the massacre at Dartmoor.

We, the undersigned, being each severally sworn on the Holy Evangelists of Almighty God, for the investigation of the circumstances attending the late massacre, and having heard the depositions of a great number of witnesses, from our own personal knowledge and from the depositions given in as aforesaid, report as follows:

That on the 6th of April, about six o'clock in the evening, when the prisoners were all quiet in their respective yards, (it being about the usual time for turning in for the night,) and the greater part of the prisoners being then in the prisons, the alarm-bell was rung. Many of the prisoners ran up to the market square to learn the occasion of the alarm. There were then drawn up in the square several hundred soldiers, with Captain Shortland (the agent) at their head; it was likewise observed, at the same time, that additional numbers of soldiers were posting themselves round the walls of the prison yard. One of them observed to the prisoners that they had better go into the prisons, for they would be charged upon directly. This, of course, occasioned considerable alarm among them; in this moment of uncertainty they were running in different directions, inquiring of each other what was the cause of the alarm—some towards their respective prisons, and some towards the market square; when about one hundred were collected in the market square, Captain Shortland ordered the soldiers to charge upon them, which orders the soldiers were reluctant in obeying, as the prisoners were using no violence; but, on the orders being repeated, they made a charge, and the prisoners retreated out of the square into their respective prison yards, and shut the gates after them. Captain Shortland himself opened the gates, and ordered the soldiers to fire in among the prisoners, who were all retreating in different directions towards their respective prisons. It appears there was some hesitation in the minds of the officers whether or not it was proper to fire upon the prisoners in that situation; on which Shortland seized a musket out of the hands of a soldier, which he fired. Immediately after the firing became general, and many of the prisoners were either killed or wounded; the remainder were endeavoring to get into the prisons, when, going towards the lower doors, the soldiers on the walls commenced firing on them from that quarter, which killed some, and wounded others; after much difficulty, (all the doors being closed in the interim but one in each prison,) the survivors succeeded in gaining the prisons. Immediately after which, parties of soldiers came to the doors of Nos. 3 and 4 prisons, and fired several volleys into them through the windows and doors, which killed one man in each prison, and wounded severely several others.

It likewise appears that the preceding butchery was followed up with a disposition of peculiar inveteracy and barbarity. One man, who had been severely wounded in No. 7 yard, and, being unable to make his way to the prison, was come up with by the soldiers, whom he implored for mercy, but in vain; five of the hardened wretches immediately levelled their pieces at him, and shot him dead! The soldiers who were posted on the walls manifested equal cruelty, by keeping up a constant fire on every prisoner they could see in the yard endeavoring to get into the prisons, when the numbers were very few, and when not the least shadow of resistance could be made or expected. Several of them had got into No. 6 prison cook house, which was pointed out by the soldiers on the walls to those who were marching in from the square; they immediately went up and fired into the same, which wounded several. One of the prisoners ran out, with the intention of gaining his prison, but was killed before he reached the door.

On an impartial consideration of all the circumstances of the case, we are induced to believe it was a premeditated scheme in the mind of Captain Shortland, for reasons which we will now proceed to give. As an elucidation of its origin, we will recur back to an event which happened some days previous. Captain Shortland was at the time absent at Plymouth, but, before going, he ordered the contractor or his clerk to serve out one pound of indifferent hard bread, instead of one pound and a half of soft bread, their usual allowance. This the prisoners refused to receive. They waited all day, in expectation of their usual allowance being served out; but at sunset, finding this would not be the case, they burst open the lower gates, and went up to the store, demanding to have their bread. The officers of the garrison, on being alarmed, and informed of the reasons of this proceeding, observed that it was no more than right the prisoners should have their usual allowance, and strongly reprobated the conduct of Captain Shortland in withholding it from them. They were accordingly served with their bread, and quietly returned to their prisons. This circumstance, with the censures that were thrown on his conduct, reached the ears of Shortland on his return home, and he must then have determined on the diabolical plan of seizing the first slight pretext to turn in the military to butcher the prisoners for the gratification of his malice and revenge. It unfortunately happened that in the afternoon of the 6th of April some boys, who were playing ball in No. 7 yard, knocked their ball over into the barrack yard, and, on the sentry in that yard refusing to throw it back to them, they picked a hole through the wall to get in after it. This afforded Shortland his wished-for pretext, and he took his measures accordingly. He had all the garrison drawn up in the military walk, additional numbers posted on the walls, and every thing ready prepared, before the alarm-bell was rung. This he naturally concluded would draw the attention of a great number of prisoners towards the gate, to learn the cause of the alarm; while the turnkeys were despatched into the yards to lock all the doors but one of each prison, to prevent the prisoners retreating out of the way before he had sufficiently wreaked his vengeance.

What adds peculiar weight to the belief of its being a premeditated massacre, are:

Firstly, The sanguinary disposition manifested on every occasion by Shortland; he having, prior to this time, ordered the soldiers to fire into the prisons, through the windows, upon unarmed prisoners asleep in their hammocks, on account of a light having been seen in the prisons; which barbarous act was repeated several nights successively; that murder was not committed, was owing to an overruling Providence alone, for the balls were picked up in the prisons, where they passed through the hammocks of men then asleep in them: he having ordered the soldiers to fire upon the prisoners in the yard of No. 7 prison, because they would not deliver up to him a man who had made his escape from the Cachot, which order the commanding officer of the soldiers refused to obey: and, generally, he having seized on every slight pretext to injure the prisoners, by his stopping the marketing for ten days repeatedly, and once a third part of their provisions for the same length of time.

Secondly, He having been heard to say, when the boys had picked the hole in the wall, and some time before the alarm-bell rung, and while all the prisoners were quiet in their respective yards, as usual, "I'll fix the damned rascals directly."

Thirdly, His having all the soldiers on their posts, and the garrison fully prepared, before the alarm-bell was rung. It could not, of course, then be done to assemble the soldiers, but to alarm the prisoners and create confusion among them.

Fourthly, The soldiers on the wall, previous to the alarm-bell being rung, informing the prisoners that they would be charged upon directly.

Fifthly, The turnkeys going into the yard and closing all the doors but one in each prison, whilst the attention of the prisoners was attracted by the alarm-bell. This was done about fifteen minutes sooner than usual, and without informing the prisoners it was time to shut up. It was ever the invariable practice of the turnkeys, (from which they never deviated before that night,) when coming into the yards to shut up, to halloo to the prisoners so loud as to be heard all over the yards, "turn in, turn in;" while on that night it was done so secretly, that not one man in a hundred knew they were shut; and in particular their shutting the door of No. 7, which the prisoners usually go in and out at, (and which was formerly always the last one closed,) and leaving one open in the other end of the prison, which was exposed to a cross-fire from the soldiers on the walls, and which the prisoners had to pass in gaining the prison.

It appears to us that the foregoing reasons sufficiently warrant the conclusions we have drawn therefrom. We likewise believe, from the depositions of men who were eye-witnesses of a part of Shortland's conduct on the evening of the 6th April, that he was intoxicated with liquor at the time, from his brutality in beating a prisoner who was then supporting another severely wounded; from the blackguard and abusive language he made use of; and from his having frequently been seen in the same state. His being drunk was, of course, the means of inflaming his bitter enmity against the prisoners, and no doubt was the principal cause of the indiscriminate butchery, and of no quarter being shown.

We here solemnly aver there was no preconcerted plan to attempt breaking out. There cannot be produced the least shadow of a reason or inducement for that intention, the prisoners daily expecting to be released, and to embark on board cartels for their own native country; and we solemnly assert, likewise, that there was no intention of resisting, in any manner, the authority of the government of this depot.

[Signed by the committee.]

N. B. 7 were killed, 30 dangerously and 30 slightly wounded, making a total of 67 killed and wounded.

R. G. Beasley to the Commissary General of Prisoners.

SIR: LONDON, April 18, 1815.

I had the honor to transmit, on the 13th and 15th instant, two reports on the unfortunate transaction of the 6th instant at Dartmoor prison—the one by the British authorities, and the other by a committee of our prisoners. The latter I lost no time in laying before this Government, and, on the receipt of it, Lord Castlereagh sought an interview with Mr. Clay and Mr. Gallatin, at which it was agreed that each party should appoint a commissioner to investigate the circumstances. If it had suited the convenience of Mr. Clay or Mr. Gallatin to have undertaken it, one of the British commissioners who signed the treaty of Ghent would have been appointed to act with him; but as neither of these gentlemen could go, and as my presence here could not be dispensed with at present, they advised me to apply to Mr. Charles King, of New York, who has readily undertaken to act, although it interferes in some degree with his private affairs.

Mr. King left town last evening for Dartmoor, with a Mr. Larpent, who is to act with him.

The result of the investigation shall be transmitted to you as soon as received; in the mean time, I am happy to have it in my power to state that every disposition has been manifested to do what is due to the occasion.

I transmit, herewith, a list of the unfortunate sufferers in this affair.

I also enclose a copy of a letter which I have just received from the transport board, relative to the proposals I made, on the receipt of your letter of the 6th ultimo, for sending home our prisoners.

It is proper that I should here remark, that, at the interview which took place between Lord Castlereagh and Messrs. Gallatin and Clay, his lordship proposed this arrangement, and that these gentlemen advised me to agree to it.

I have the honor to be, &c.

R. G. BEASLEY.

GEORGE MAGRATH.

Description of death wounds inflicted on the evening of April 6, 1815.

John Haywood, (black.) The ball entered a little posterior to the acromien of the left shoulder, and, passing obliquely upwards, made its egress about the middle of the right side of the neck.

Thomas Jackson. The ball entered the left side of the belly, nearly in a line with the naval, and made its egress a little below the false ribs in the opposite side; a large portion of the intestinal canal protruded through the wound made by the ingress of the ball. He languished until 8 o'clock on the morning of the 7th, when he died.

James Mann. The ball entered at the inferior angle of the left scapula, and lodged under the integument of the right pectoral muscle. In its course, it passed through the inferior margin of the right and left lobes of the lungs.

Joseph Toker Johnson. The ball entered at the inferior angle of the left scapula, penetrated the heart, and, passing through both lobes of the lungs, made its egress at the right axilla.

William Leveridge. The ball entered about the middle of the left arm, through which it passed, and, penetrating the corresponding side, betwixt the second and third ribs, passing through the left lobe of the lungs, the mediastinum, and over the right lobe, lodged betwixt the fifth and sixth ribs.

James Campbell. The ball entered at the outer angle of the right eye, and in its course it fractured and depressed the greater part of the frontal bone, fractured the nasal bones, and made its egress above the orbital ridge of the left eye. He languished until the morning of the 8th, when he died.

TH. GEO. SHORTLAND, Agent.
GEO. MAGRATH, Surgeon.

From Alexander McLeay to R. G. Beasley.

SIR: TRANSPORT OFFICE, April 19, 1815.

I am directed by the commissioners for the transport service, &c. to acquaint you that the lords commissioners of the admiralty have, by their order of yesterday's date, been pleased to signify the consent of His Majesty's Government that the expense of conveying the American prisoners of war from this country to America should be shared by the two Governments, leaving the interpretation of the article in the late treaty of peace upon this subject for future explanation; and that the board are accordingly about to take measures for providing vessels for the conveyance of the remainder of the prisoners, understanding that the vessels already engaged by you are calculated to convey about three thousand men.

I am, sir, &c.

ALEXANDER McLEAY.

R. G. BEASLEY, Esq.

From R. G. Beasley to the Commissary General of Prisoners.

SIR: LONDON, April 30, 1815.

In my letter of the 19th instant I informed you of the measures which had been adopted here in consequence of the late unfortunate event at Dartmoor prison.

I have now the honor to transmit the copy of a letter addressed to me by Mr. Clay and Mr. Gallatin, relative to that occurrence, and to the transportation of the American prisoners in this country to the United States.

In the absence of Mr. Adams, it becomes my duty to communicate, for the information of our Government, the result of the investigation at Dartmoor. I enclose a copy of the joint report* of the commissioners appointed for that purpose; also of a letter from Mr. King to Mr. Adams, and of a list of the killed and wounded on that melancholy occasion.†

I shall leave to Mr. Adams any further steps which he may deem it proper to take in this business. I cannot, however, forbear to notice here the erroneous impression of the prisoners, that their detention so long has been owing to me. You are aware, sir, of my constant exertions during the war to effect their liberation. Immediately on the signing of the treaty of peace at Ghent, I received my instructions on that subject, propbsing, as a condition, that all the prisoners who might be delivered over to me by the British Government should be considered as prisoners of war, and not at liberty to serve until regularly exchanged, in the event of the treaty not being ratified by the President. This proposition was declined, and in a peremptory manner. On the receipt of the intelligence of the ratification from America, I lost not a moment in requesting the release of the prisoners, according to the terms of the treaty; and the number of vessels which I had hired, as mentioned in my letter of the 13th instant, and which are now on their voyage to the United States, will show that the necessary steps were taken to provide for their immediate transportation to their country. The prisoners, also, were informed of these measures, and of the exertions which had been made from the commencement to return them to their homes with the least possible delay. Therefore, whatever may have been their uneasiness under confinement, and whatever hostile feelings they may have had towards me, as noticed in the report and in Mr. King's letter, I may say, with confidence, that I could not prevent the one, nor have I deserved the other.

I have the honor to be, &c.

The Hon. JOHN MASON, &c. R. G. BEASLEY.

Extracts of a letter from R. G. Beasley, Esq., Agent for American Prisoners of War in England, to the Commissary General of Prisoners, dated OCTOBER 10, 1815.

"In compliance with the request contained in that of the 5th August, [the commissary general's letter,] I transmit, herewith, copies of my correspondence with the transport board on the subject of the general release of American prisoners in this country on the conclusion of the treaty at Ghent, and on the receipt of the President's ratification; also, copies and extracts of letters informing the prisoners of the measures taken for their release, preceding the occurrence at Dartmoor of the 6th April.

"It was always my practice before requesting, by written communication, the release of prisoners, to urge the measure in person; and this repeatedly, until either it was granted, or there appeared not any hope of success; and then my letter followed, for the purpose of reducing the negotiation to a more official form. This practice I pursued upon the conclusion of the treaty at Ghent, when my request was refused; and again on the receipt of the ratification of the President, when the release was agreed upon. Upon these occasions I, of course, availed myself of every circumstance which I conceived calculated to accomplish the object I had in view; and I frequently found the board concurring with me upon points which, when submitted to the admiralty, were rejected." "One of my letters, informing the prisoners of the measures taken for their release, was addressed to those on parole at Ashburton, which is about sixteen miles distant from Dartmoor, and with whom the prisoners at this latter place were in constant correspondence. I have to observe, further, that when inquiry as to the probable time of release was made at my office by friends of prisoners, which at that time was very frequently the case, they were always requested, when writing to them, to desire the information to be made as public in the prison as possible."

From R. G. Beasley to Alexander McLeay.

SIR: HARLEY STREET, January 18, 1815.

A treaty of peace having been concluded at Ghent between Great Britain and the United States, I am induced, by a desire to shorten the sufferings of the American prisoners in this country, to address the board relative to them. I do this with the more confidence of its being favorably received, as I am persuaded that this wish is equally entertained by the British Government.

I have, therefore, to request that a certain number of prisoners may be released, as soon as I may be able to procure proper conveyances for them to the United States, under the condition that they shall be subject to exchange should the treaty not be ratified by the President of the United States.

I am, &c. R. G. BEASLEY.

ALEXANDER McLEAY, Esq., Transport Office.

From Alexander McLeay to R. G. Beasley.

SIR: TRANSPORT OFFICE, January 21, 1815.

Having received, and laid before the commissioners for the transport service, &c., your letter of the 18th instant, proposing, under the circumstances therein stated, that a certain number of American prisoners of war may be permitted to return to the United States, I have it in command to acquaint you that the same has been referred to the consideration of the lords commissioners of the admiralty, and that their lordships have, in reply, been pleased to signify that they do not think proper to accede to your proposition.

I am, &c. ALEXANDER McLEAY, Secretary.

R. G. BEASLEY, Esq.

From R. G. Beasley to Alexander McLeay.

SIR: HARLEY STREET, March 15, 1815.

The treaty of Ghent having been ratified by the Governments of the United States and this country, and peace being thus happily restored between the two nations, I beg to inquire whether there is any objection to deliver over to me the prisoners detained in this country, as soon as I can provide for their conveyance?

I am, &c. R. G. BEASLEY.

ALEXANDER McLEAY, Esq., Transport Office.

From Alexander McLeay to R. G. Beasley.

SIR: TRANSPORT OFFICE, March 16, 1815.

I have received, and laid before the commissioners of the transport service, &c., your letter of the 15th instant, requesting to be informed, under the circumstances therein stated, whether there be any objection to deliver over to you the Americans now detained as prisoners of war in this country, upon your providing vessels for their conveyance to the United States.

In reply, I am directed to acquaint you that the board are ready to embark all the prisoners in question, upon your providing vessels at Plymouth for their conveyance; it being understood that all the debts contracted by them in this country must previously be paid. I am, &c.

ALEXANDER McLEAY, Secretary.

R. G. BEASLEY, Esq.

Extract of a letter from R. G. Beasley, addressed to the Committee of American Prisoners of War at Dartmoor.

LONDON, March 22, 1815.

"Three cartels are now preparing here, with all expedition, for the conveyance of the prisoners to the United States."

R. G. Beasley to American Prisoners of War, at Ashburton.

AGENCY FOR AMERICAN PRISONERS OF WAR,

GENTLEMEN: LONDON, March 23, 1815.

I have to inform you, that the treaty of peace having been ratified by the President, the release of the prisoners of war will commence without delay.

Although I have not as yet received any instructions from our Government, I have engaged, and am fitting out, four vessels for their conveyance, to proceed to Plymouth to receive them, and shall use every despatch in sending them to the United States.

I am, &c. R. G. BEASLEY.

To the American Prisoners of War on parole at Ashburton.

Extract of a letter from R. G. Beasley to Captain T. G. Shortland, Agent for Prisoners of War at Dartmoor.

LONDON, March 25, 1815.

"I have engaged four vessels for cartels, which are fitting out with all despatch. They will sail, I hope, in five or six days for Plymouth, to receive prisoners. Their tonnage, together, is about 1,600 tons."

From R. G. Beasley to Dr. Magrath.

SIR: LONDON, March 31, 1815.

I have received your letter of the 29th instant, acquainting me with your opinion of the complaints of Mr. Proctor and Mr. Robinson, now in Dartmoor hospital. In return, I beg to inform you that these two prisoners shall be sent home in the first cartel, which will, I expect, sail from this place to-morrow for Plymouth.

I am, &c.

R. G. BEASLEY.

GEORGE MAGRATH, Esq., Surgeon Dartmoor Prison Hospital, Devon.

From R. G. Beasley to the Committee of American Prisoners of War.

AGENCY FOR AMERICAN PRISONERS OF WAR,

GENTLEMEN: LONDON, March 31, 1815.

It appearing, by several letters which I have received from Dartmoor, that the prisoners have taken up an idea that any who may have the means of proceeding to the United States would, on application, receive a free discharge, I request that you will make it known throughout the prison that such is not the fact.

There must be other and better reasons to induce me to consent to their release in this manner, at this time. The situation of Europe, under the prospect of another war, multiplies the risk of impressment. I have taken measures to have them all released and sent home by cartels with as little delay as possible, where they are much wanted, and where wages are very high.

I am, &c. R. G. BEASLEY.

To the Committee of American Prisoners of War, Dartmoor.

14th CONGRESS.] No. 282. [1st SESSION.

GREAT BRITAIN—IMPRESSED AMERICAN SEAMEN.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, APRIL 29, 1816.

To the House of Representatives of the United States: APRIL 29, 1816.

I transmit to the House of Representatives a report from the Secretary of State, on the subject of their resolution of February 28, 1816.

JAMES MADISON.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, April 27, 1816.

The Secretary of State, to whom was referred the resolution of the House of Representatives, requesting the President to cause to be laid before the House a statement of the number of impressed American seamen confined in Dartmoor prison; the number surrendered, given up, or taken from on board British vessels captured during the late war; together with their places of residence, respectively, has the honor to submit to the President, in the papers marked A, B, and C, all the information which he has, as yet, been able to obtain relative to the object stated in the resolution.

The paper A contains a list of such impressed seamen as were transferred from British ships of war to Dartmoor and other prisons in England.

B, contains the names of those who were transferred, in like manner, to prisons in the West Indies and Nova Scotia.

C, the names of those who were discharged in England from British ships of war since the peace.

JAMES MONROE.

14th CONGRESS.] No. 283. [2d SESSION.

MESSAGE OF THE PRESIDENT AT THE COMMENCEMENT OF THE SECOND SESSION OF THE FOURTEENTH CONGRESS.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, DECEMBER 3, 1816.

Fellow-citizens of the Senate, and of the House of Representatives:

In reviewing the present state of our country, our attention cannot be withheld from the effect produced by peculiar seasons, which have very generally impaired the annual gifts of the earth, and threatened scarcity in particular districts. Such, however, is the variety of soils, of climates, and of products, within our extensive limits, that the aggregate resources for subsistence are more than sufficient for the aggregate wants. And as far as an economy of consumption, more than usual, may be necessary, our thankfulness is due to Providence, for what is far more than a compensation, in the remarkable health which has distinguished the present year.

Amidst the advantages which have succeeded the peace of Europe, and that of the United States with Great Britain, in a general invigoration of industry among us, and in the extension of our commerce, the value of which is more and more disclosing itself to commercial nations, it is to be regretted that a depression is experienced by particular branches of our manufactures, and by a portion of our navigation. As the first proceeds, in an essential degree, from an excess of imported merchandise, which carries a check in its own tendency, the cause, in its present extent, cannot be of very long duration. The evil will not, however, be viewed by Congress without a recollection that manufacturing establishments, if suffered to sink too low, or languish too long, may not revive, after the causes shall have ceased; and that, in the vicissitudes of human affairs, situations may recur in which a dependance on foreign sources for indispensable supplies may be among the most serious embarrassments.

The depressed state of our navigation is to be ascribed, in a material degree, to its exclusion from the colonial ports of the nation most extensively connected with us in commerce, and from the indirect operation of that exclusion.

Previous to the late convention at London between the United States and Great Britain, the relative state of the navigation laws of the two countries, growing out of the treaty of 1794, had given to the British navigation a material advantage over the American, in the intercourse between the American ports and British ports in Europe. The convention of London equalized the laws of the two countries relating to those ports, leaving the intercourse between our ports and the ports of the British colonies subject, as before, to the respective regulations of the parties. The British Government enforcing new regulations, which prohibit a trade between its colonies and the United States in American vessels, whilst they permit a trade in British vessels, the American navigation loses accordingly; and the loss is augmented by the advantage which is given to the British competition over the American, in the navigation between our ports and British ports in Europe, by the circuitous voyages enjoyed by the one, and not enjoyed by the other.

The reasonableness of the rule of reciprocity, applied to one branch of the commercial intercourse, has been pressed on our part, as equally applicable to both branches: but it is ascertained that the British cabinet declines all negotiation on the subject; with a disavowal, however, of any disposition to view in an unfriendly light whatever countervailing regulations the United States may oppose to the regulations of which they complain. The wisdom of the Legislature will decide on the course which, under these circumstances, is prescribed by a joint regard to the amicable relations between the two nations and to the just interests of the United States.

I have the satisfaction to state, generally, that we remain in amity with foreign Powers.

An occurrence has, indeed, taken place in the Gulf of Mexico, which, if sanctioned by the Spanish Government, may make an exception as to that Power. According to the report of our naval commander on that station, one of our public armed vessels was attacked by an overpowering force under a Spanish commander, and the American flag, with the officers and crew, insulted in a manner calling for prompt reparation. This has been demanded. In the mean time, a frigate and a smaller vessel of war have been ordered into that gulf for the protection of our commerce. It would be improper to omit that the representative of His Catholic Majesty in the United States lost no time in giving the strongest assurances that no hostile order could have emanated from his Government, and that it will be as ready to do as to expect whatever the nature of the case and the friendly relations of the two countries shall be found to require.

The posture of our affairs with Algiers, at the present moment, is not known. The Dey, drawing pretexts from circumstances, for which the United States were not answerable, addressed a letter to this Government, declaring the treaty last concluded with him to have been annulled by our violation of it, and presenting, as the alternative, war, or a renewal of the former treaty, which stipulated, among other things, an annual tribute. The answer, with an explicit declaration that the United States preferred war to tribute, required his recognition and observance of the treaty last made, which abolishes tribute and the slavery of our captured citizens. The result of the answer has not been received. Should he renew his warfare on our commerce, we rely on the protection it will find in our naval force actually in the Mediterranean.

With the other Barbary States our affairs have undergone no change.

The Indian tribes within our limits appear also disposed to remain at peace. From several of them purchases of lands have been made, particularly favorable to the wishes and security of our frontier settlements, as well as to the general interests of the nation. In some instances, the titles, though not supported by due proof, and clashing those of one tribe with the claims of another, have been extinguished by double purchases; the benevolent policy of the United States preferring the augmented expense to the hazard of doing injustice, or to the enforcement of justice against a feeble and untutored people, by means involving or threatening an effusion of blood. I am happy to add, that the tranquillity which has been restored among the tribes themselves, as well as between them and our own population, will favor the resumption of the work of civilization, which had made an encouraging progress among some tribes; and that the facility is increasing for extending that divided and individual ownership, which exists now in moveable property only, to the soil itself; and of thus establishing, in the culture and improvement of it, the true foundation for a transit from the habits of the savage to the arts and comforts of social life.

As a subject of the highest importance to the national welfare, I must again earnestly recommend to the consideration of Congress a re-organization of the militia, on a plan which will form it into classes, according to the periods of life more and less adapted to military services. An efficient militia is authorized and contemplated by the constitution, and required by the spirit and safety of free government. The present organization of our militia is universally regarded as less efficient than it ought to be made; and no organization can be better calculated to give to it its due force than a classification which will assign the foremost place in the defence of the country to that portion of its citizens whose activity and animation best enable them to rally to its standard. Besides the consideration that a time of peace is the time when the change can be made with most convenience and equity, it will now be aided by the experience of a recent war, in which the militia bore so interesting a part.

Congress will call to mind that no adequate provision has yet been made for the uniformity of weights and measures, also contemplated by the constitution. The great utility of a standard, fixed in its nature, and founded on the easy rule of decimal proportions, is sufficiently obvious. It led the Government, at an early stage, to preparatory steps for introducing it; and a completion of the work will be a just title to the public gratitude.

The importance which I have attached to the establishment of a university within this District, on a scale and for objects worthy the American nation, induces me to renew my recommendation of it to the favorable consideration of Congress. And I particularly invite again their attention to the expediency of exercising their existing powers, and, where necessary, of resorting to the prescribed mode of enlarging them, in order to effectuate a comprehensive system of roads and canals, such as will have the effect of drawing more closely together every part of our country, by promoting intercourse and improvements, and by increasing the share of every part in the common stock of national prosperity.

Occurrences having taken place which show that the statutory provisions for the dispensation of criminal justice are deficient in relation both to places and to persons, under the exclusive cognizance of the national authority, an amendment of the law, embracing such cases, will merit the earliest attention of the Legislature. It will be a seasonable occasion, also, for inquiring how far legislative interposition may be further requisite in providing penalties for the offences designated in the constitution or in the statutes, and to which either no penalties are annexed, or none with sufficient certainty. And I submit to the wisdom of Congress whether a more enlarged revisal of the criminal code be not expedient, for the purpose of mitigating, in certain cases, penalties which were adopted into it, antecedent to experiment and examples which justify and recommend a more lenient policy.

The United States, having been the first to abolish, within the extent of their authority, the transportation of the natives of Africa into slavery, by prohibiting the introduction of slaves, and by punishing their citizens participating in the traffic, cannot but be gratified at the progress made by concurrent efforts of other nations towards a general suppression of so great an evil. They must feel, at the same time, the greater solicitude to give the fullest efficacy to their own regulations. With that view, the interposition of Congress appears to be required by the violations and evasions which, it is suggested, are chargeable on unworthy citizens who mingle in the slave trade under foreign flags, and with foreign ports; and by collusive importations of slaves into the United States, through adjoining ports and territories. I present the subject to Congress with a full assurance of their disposition to apply all the remedy which can be afforded by an amendment of the law. The regulations which were intended to guard against abuses of a kindred character, in the trade between the several States, ought also to be rendered more effectual for their humane object.

To these recommendations I add, for the consideration of Congress, the expediency of a remodification of the judiciary establishment, and of an additional department in the executive branch of Government.

The first is called for by the accruing business which necessarily swells the duties of the federal courts, and by the great and widening space within which justice is to be dispensed by them. The time seems to have arrived which claims for members of the Supreme Court a relief from itinerary fatigues, incompatible as well with the age which a portion of them will always have attained, as with the researches and preparations which are due to their stations, and to the juridical reputation of their country. And considerations equally cogent require a more convenient organization of the subordinate tribunals, which may be accomplished without an objectionable increase of the number or expense of the judges.

The extent and variety of executive business, also accumulating with the progress of our country and its growing population, call for an additional department, to be charged with duties now overburdening other departments, and with such as have not been annexed to any department.

The course of experience recommends, as another improvement in the executive establishment, that the provision for the station of Attorney General, whose residence at the seat of Government, official connexions with it, and management of the public business before the judiciary, preclude an extensive participation in professional emoluments, be made more adequate to his services and his relinquishments; and that, with a view to his reasonable accommodation, and to a proper depository of his official opinions and proceedings, there be included in the provision the usual appurtenances to a public office.

In directing the legislative attention to the state of the finances, it is a subject of great gratification to find that, even within the short period which has elapsed since the return of peace, the revenue has far exceeded all the current demands upon the Treasury, and that, under any probable diminution of its future annual product, which the vicissitudes of commerce may occasion, it will afford an ample fund for the effectual and early extinguishment of the public debt. It has been estimated that, during the year 1816, the actual receipts of revenue at the Treasury, including the balance at the commencement of the year, and excluding the proceeds of loans and Treasury notes, will amount to about the sum of forty-seven millions of dollars; that, during the same year, the actual payments at the Treasury, including the payment of the arrearages of the War Department, as well as the payment of a considerable excess beyond the annual appropriations, will amount to about the sum of thirty-eight millions of dollars; and that, consequently, at the close of the year, there will be a surplus in the Treasury of about the sum of nine millions of dollars.

The operations of the Treasury continue to be obstructed by difficulties, arising from the condition of the national currency; but they have, nevertheless, been effectual, to a beneficial extent, in the reduction of the public debt, and the establishment of the public credit. The floating debt of Treasury notes and temporary loans will soon be entirely discharged. The aggregate of the funded debt, composed of debts incurred during the wars of 1776 and of 1812, has been estimated, with reference to the 1st of January next, at a sum not exceeding one hundred and ten millions of dollars; the ordinary annual expenses of the Government, for the maintenance of all its institutions, civil, military, and naval, have been estimated at a sum less than twenty millions of dollars; and the permanent revenue, to be derived from all the existing sources, has been estimated at a sum of about twenty-five millions of dollars.

Upon this general view of the subject, it is obvious that there is only wanting to the fiscal prosperity of the Government the restoration of a uniform medium of exchange. The resources and the faith of the nation, displayed in the system which Congress has established, insure respect and confidence both at home and abroad. The local accumulations of the revenue have already enabled the Treasury to meet the public engagements in the local currency of most of the States; and it is expected that the same cause will produce the same effect throughout the Union. But, for the interests of the community at large, as well as for the purposes of the Treasury, it is essential that the nation should possess a currency of equal value, credit, and use, wherever it may circulate. The constitution has intrusted Congress, exclusively, with the power of creating and regulating a currency of that description; and the measures which were taken during the last session, in execution of the power, give every promise of success. The Bank of the United States has been organized under auspices the most favorable, and cannot fail to be an important auxiliary to those measures.

For a more enlarged view of the public finances, with a view of the measures pursued by the Treasury Department previous to the resignation of the late Secretary, I transmit an extract from the last report of that officer. Congress will perceive in it ample proofs of the solid foundation on which the financial prosperity of the nation rests, and will do justice to the distinguished ability and successful exertions with which the duties of the Department were executed during a period remarkable for its difficulties and its peculiar perplexities.

The period of my retiring from the public service being at little distance, I shall find no occasion more proper than the present for expressing to my fellow-citizens my deep sense of the continued confidence and kind support which I have received from them. My grateful recollection of these distinguished marks of their favorable regard can never cease; and with the consciousness that if I have not served my country with greater ability, I have served it with a sincere devotion, will accompany me as a source of unfailing gratification.

Happily, I shall carry with me from the public theatre other sources, which those who love their country most will best appreciate. I shall behold it blessed with tranquillity and prosperity at home, and with peace and respect abroad. I can indulge the proud reflection that the American people have reached, in safety and success, their fortieth year as an independent nation; that, for nearly an entire generation, they have had experience of their present constitution, the offspring of their undisturbed deliberations and of their free choice; that they have found it to bear the trials of adverse as well as prosperous circumstances; to contain, in its combination of the federate and elective principles, a reconcilement of public strength with individual liberty; of national power for the defence of national rights with a security against wars of injustice, of ambition, or vain glory, in the fundamental provision which subjects all questions of war to the will of the nation itself, which is to pay its costs and feel its calamities. Nor is it less a peculiar felicity of this constitution, so dear to us all, that it is found to be capable, without losing its vital energies, of expanding itself over a spacious territory, with the increase and expansion of the community for whose benefit it was established.

And may I not be allowed to add to this gratifying spectacle, that I shall read in the character of the American people, in their devotion to true liberty, and to the constitution which is its palladium, sure presages that the destined career of my country will exhibit a Government pursuing the public good as its sole object, and regulating its means by the great principles consecrated in its charter, and by those moral principles to which they are so well allied? a Government which watches over the purity of elections, the freedom of speech and of the press, the trial by jury, and the equal interdict against enroachments and compacts between religion and the State; which maintains inviolably the maxims of public faith, the security of persons and property, and encourages, in every authorized mode, that general diffusion of knowledge which guaranties to public liberty its permanency, and, to those who possess the blessing, the true enjoyment of it? a Government which avoids intrusions on the internal repose of other nations, and repels them from its own; which does justice to all nations with a readiness equal to the firmness with which it requires justice from them; and which, whilst it refines its domestic code from every ingredient not congenial with the precepts of an enlightened age and the sentiments of a virtuous people, seeks, by appeals to reason, and by its liberal examples, to infuse into the law which governs the civilized world a spirit which may diminish the frequency, or circumscribe the calamities of war, and meliorate the social and beneficent relations of peace? a Government, in a word, whose conduct, within and without, may bespeak the most noble of all ambitions—that of promoting peace on earth, and good will to man?

These contemplations, sweetening the remnant of my days, will animate my prayers for the happiness of my beloved country, and a perpetuity of the institutions under which it is enjoyed.

JAMES MADISON.

14th CONGRESS.] No. 284. [2d SESSION.

SWEDEN AND NORWAY.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, DECEMBER 13, 1816.

To the Senate of the United States: WASHINGTON, December 13, 1816.

A treaty of commerce between the United States and the King of Sweden and Norway having been concluded and signed on the 4th of September last by their plenipotentiaries, I lay the same before the Senate for their consideration and advice as to a ratification.

JAMES MADISON.

[ORIGINAL.]

Au nom de la très Sainte et Indivisible Trinité:

Les Etats Unis d'Amérique et Sa Majesté le Roi de Suède et de Norvége, également animés du desir sincère de maintenir et consolider les relations d'amitié et de commerce qui ont subsisté jusqu'ici entre les deux états, et étant convaincus qu'on ne saurait mieux remplir cet objet qu'en établissant réciproquement le commerce entre les deux états sur la base solide de principes libéraux et équitables, également avantageux aux deux pays, ont nommé pour cet effet des plénipotentiaires, et les ont munis des pouvoirs nécessaires pour traiter et conclure en leur nom, savoir: Le Président des Etats Unis

[TRANSLATION.]

In the name of the most Holy and Indivisible Trinity:

The United States of America and His Majesty the King of Sweden and Norway, equally animated with a sincere desire to maintain and confirm the relations of friendship and commerce which have hitherto subsisted between the two States, and being convinced that this object cannot be more effectually accomplished than by establishing, reciprocally, commerce between the two States upon the firm basis of liberal and equitable principles, equally advantageous to both countries, have named to this end plenipotentiaries, and have furnished them with the necessary full powers to treat, and, in their

Monsieur Jonathan Russell, citoyen des dits Etats Unis, et actuellement leur ministre plénipotentiaire à la cour de Stockholm; et Sa Majesté le Roi de Suède et de Norvége son excellence Monsieur le Comte Laurent d'Engestrom, son Ministre d'Etat pour les Affaires Etrangères, Chancelier de l'Université de Lund, chevalier commandeur des ordres du Roi, chevalier de l'ordre du Roi Charles XIII., grand croix des ordres de St. Etienne de la Hongrie, de la Légion d'Honneur de France, de l'Aigle Noir et de l'Aigle Rouge de Prusse; et Monsieur le Comte Adolphe George de Mörner, son Conseiller d'Etat, et commandeur de l'ordre de l'Etoile Polaire; lesquels plénipotentiaires, après avoir produit et échangé leurs pleinpouvoirs trouvés en bonne et due forme, sont convenus des articles suivans:

Art. 1. Il y aura liberté réciproque de commerce entre tous les pays de la domination des Etats Unis d'Amérique et de Sa Majesté le Roi de Suède et de Norvége. Les habitans de l'un des deux pays pourront, avec toute sûreté pour leurs personnes, vaisseaux, et cargaisons, aborder librement dans les ports, places, et rivières du territoire de l'autre, partout où l'entrée est permise aux vaisseaux des nations les plus favorisées. Ils pourront s'y arrêter et résider dans quelque partie que ce soit des dits territoires; ils pourront y louer et occuper des maisons et des magasins pour leur commerce; et généralement les négocians ou trafiquans de chacune des deux nations jouiront chez l'autre de la plus entière sécurité et protection pour les affaires de leur négoce, étant seulement tenus à se conformer aux loix et ordonnances des deux pays respectifs.

Art. 2. Il ne sera point imposé de plus forts ou autres droits, impôts, ou charges quelconques sur l'importation dans les Etats Unis des productions du sol ou des manufactures des états de Sa Majesté le Roi de Suède et de Norvége, ni sur l'importion dans états de Sa Majesté le Roi de Suède et de Norvége des productions du sol ou des manufactures des Etats Unis, que ceux auxquels seraient assujettis les mêmes articles dans chacun des deux pays respectifs, si ces denrées étaient le produit du sol ou des manufactures de tout autre pays. Le même principe sera aussi observé pour l'exportation, en sorte que dans chacun des deux pays respectifs les articles qui seront exportés pour l'autre ne pourront être chargés d'aucun droit, impôt, ou charge quelconque plus fort ou autre que ceux auxquels seraient assujettis les mêmes articles s'ils étaient exportés pour tout autre pays quelconque.

Il ne sera non-plus imposé aucune prohibition, ni sur l'exportation ni sur l'importation d'aucun article provenant du sol ou des manufactures des Etats Unis, ou des pays de Sa Majesté le Roi de Suède et de Norvége, dans ou hors les dits Etats Unis, et dans ou hors les dits pays de Sa Majesté le Roi de Suède et de Norvége, qui ne s'étende également à toutes les autres nations.

Les vaisseaux des Etats Unis d'Amérique arrivant sur leur lest, ou important dans les états de Sa Majesté le Roi de Suède et de Norvége des produits du sol ou de l'industrie de leur pays, ou exportant des états de Sa Majesté Suédoise et Norvégienne les produits du sol ou de l'industrie nationale des dits états, ne seront tenus à payer, ni pour les vaisseaux, ni pour les cargaisons, aucuns droits, impôts, ou charges quelconques, plus forts ou autres que ceux que payeraient dans le même cas les vaisseaux des états de Sa Majesté le Roi de Suède et de Norvége; et, vice versa, les vaisseaux des états de Sa Majesté le Roi de Suède et de Norvége qui arrivent sur leur lest, ou qui importent dans les Etats Unis d'Amérique des productions du sol ou de l'industrie nationale de la Suède et de la Norvége, ou qui exportent des Etats Unis des produits du sol ou de l'industrie de ces pays, ne payeront ni pour les vaisseaux ni pour les cargaisons aucuns droits, impôts, ou charges quelconques, autres ou plus forts que ceux qui seraient payés si ces mêmes denrées etaient transportées par des vaisseaux des Etats Unis, respectivement.

Ce qui est statué ci-dessus s'étendra aussi à la colonie Suédoise de S. Barthélemy, tant par rapport aux droits et avantages dont les vaisseaux des Etats Unis jouiront dans ses ports que par rapport à ceux dont les vaisseaux name, to conclude a treaty, to wit: The President of the United States Jonathan Russell, a citizen of the said United States, and now their minister plenipotentiary at the court of Stockholm; and His Majesty the King of Sweden and Norway his excellency the Count Laurent d'Engestrom, his Minister of State for Foreign Affairs, Chancellor of the University of Lund, knight commander of the orders of the King, knight of the orders of Charles XIII., grand cross of the orders of St. Etienne of Hungary, of the Legion of Honor of France, of the Black Eagle and of the Red Eagle of Prussia; and the Count Adolphe George de Morner, his Counsellor of State, and commander of the order of the Polar Star; and the said plenipotentiaries, after having produced and exchanged their full powers, found in good and due form, have agreed on the following articles:

Article 1. There shall be between all the territories under the dominion of the United States of America and of His Majesty the King of Sweden and Norway a reciprocal liberty of commerce. The inhabitants of either of the two countries shall have liberty, with all security for their persons, vessels, and cargoes, to come freely to all ports, places, and rivers within the territories of the other, into which the vessels of the most favored nations are permitted to enter. They can there remain and reside in any part whatsoever of the said territories; they can there hire and occupy houses and warehouses for their commerce; and, generally, the merchants and traders of each of the two nations shall enjoy in the other the most complete security and protection for the transaction of their business, being bound alone to conform to the laws and statutes of the two countries, respectively.

Art. 2. No other or higher duties, imposts, or charges whatsoever shall be imposed on the importation into the territories of His Majesty the King of Sweden and Norway of the produce or manufactures of the United States, nor on the importation into the United States of the produce or manufactures of territories of His Majesty the King of Sweden and Norway, than those to which the same articles would be subjected in each of the two countries, respectively, if these articles were the growth, produce, or manufacture of any other country. The same principle shall likewise be observed in respect to exportation in such manner, that in each of the two countries, respectively, the articles which shall be exported for the other cannot be charged with any duty, impost, or charge whatsoever higher or other than those to which the same articles would be subjected if they were exported to any other country whatever.

Nor shall any prohibition be imposed on the exportation or importation of any article the growth, produce, or manufacture of the territories of His Majesty the King of Sweden and Norway, or of the United States, to or from the said territories of His Majesty the King of Sweden and Norway, or to or from the said United States, which shall not equally extend to all other nations.

Swedish or Norwegian vessels arriving in ballast, or importing into the United States the produce or manufactures of their country, or exporting from the United States the produce or manufactures of said States, shall not be obliged to pay, either for the vessels or cargoes, any other or higher duties, imposts, or charges whatsoever, than those which the vessels of the United States would pay in the same circumstances; and, vice versa, the vessels of the United States arriving in ballast, or importing into the territories under the dominion of His Majesty the King of Sweden and Norway the produce or manufactures of the United States, or exporting from the territories under the dominion of His Majesty the King of Sweden and Norway the produce or manufactures of these territories, shall not pay, either for the vessels or the cargoes, any other or higher duties, imposts, or charges whatsoever, than those which would be paid if these articles were transported by Swedish or Norwegian vessels, respectively.

That which is here above stipulated shall also extend to the Swedish colony of St. Bartholomew, as well in what relates to the rights and advantages which the vessels of the United States shall enjoy in its ports as in relation to those which the vessels of the colony shall enjoy in the de la colonie jouiront dans les ports des Etats Unis: bien entendu que les propriétaires soyent colons établis et naturalisés à S. Barthélemy, et qu'ils y ayent fait naturaliser leurs vaisseaux.

Art. 3. Sa Majesté le Roi de Suède et de Norvége consent que tous les articles qui sont le produit du sol ou des manufactures des Indes Occidentales, et dont l'entrée est permise dans des vaisseaux Suédois ou Norvégiens, soit que ces marchandises viennent directement ou indirectement des dites Indes, puissent aussi être importés dans ses états par des vaisseaux des Etats Unis; et qu'alors il ne sera payé ni pour les dits vaisseaux, ni pour les cargaisons, de droits, impôts, ou charges quelconques, plus forts ou autres que ceux qui seraient payés par des vaisseaux Suédois ou Norvégiens dans le même cas, avec une addition seulement de dix pour cent sur les dits droits, impôts, ou charges, et pas davantage.

Pour éviter tout mésentendu à cet égard, il est ici expressément déclaré, que la dénomination d'Indes Occidentales doit être prise dans le sens le plus étendu, en y comprenant toute cette partie du monde, soit îles ou terre ferme, qui de tout temps a été appelée Indes Occidentales, en opposition avec cette autre partie du monde appelée Indes Orientales.

Art. 4. De leur côté, les Etats Unis d'Amérique consentent à ce que tous les articles qui sont les produits du sol ou des manufactures des pays qui bordent ou environent la mer Baltique, et dont l'entrée est permise dans les vaisseaux des Etats Unis, soit que ces denrées viennent directement ou indirectement de la Baltique, puissent aussi être importés de même dans les Etats Unis par des vaisseaux Suédois ou Norvégiens; et qu'alors il ne sera payé ni pour les dits vaisseaux ni pour les cargaisons de droits, impôts, ou charges quelconques plus forts ou autres que ceux qui seraient payés par des vaisseaux des Etats Unis dans le même cas, avec une addition de dix pour cent sur les dits droits, impôts, ou charges, et pas davantage.

Afin de prévenir tout incertitude à l'égard des droits, impôts, ou charges quelconques, que devrait payer un vaisseau appartenant aux citoyens ou sujets de l'une des parties contractantes, et arrivant dans les ports de l'autre avec une cargaison qui consisterait en partie des produits du sol ou des manufactures du pays auquel le vaisseau appartiendrait, et en partie de quelques autres marchandises, dont l'importation est permise au dit vaisseau par les articles précédens, il est convenu, qu'en cas d'une cargaison ainsi mélée, le dit vaisseau payera toujours les droits, impôts, ou charges, suivant la nature de cette partie de la cargaison qui est sujette aux plus gros droits, tout comme si le vaisseau n'eut apporté que cette seule espèce de marchandises.

Art. 5. Les hautes parties contractantes s'accordent mutuellement la faculté d'entretenir dans les ports et places de commerce de l'autre des consuls, vice-consuls, ou agens de commerce, qui jouiront de toute la protection et assistance nécessaire pour remplir duement leurs fonctions; mais il est ici expressément déclaré, que dans le cas d'une conduite illégale ou impropre envers les lois ou le Gouvernement du pays auquel il est envoyé, le dit consul, vice-consul, ou agent, pourra ou être puni conformément aux lois, ou être mis hors de fonction, ou renvoyé par le Gouvernement offensé, celui-ci en donnant les raisons à l'autre: bien entendu, cependant, que les archives et documens relatifs aux affaires du consulat seront à l'abri de toute recherche, et devront être soigneusement conservés, étant mis sous le scellé du dit consul et de l'autorité de l'endroit où il aura résidé.

Les consuls ou leurs suppléans auront le droit, comme tels, de servir de juges at d'arbitres dans les différends qui pourraient s'élever entre les capitaines et les équipages des vaisseaux de la nation dont les affaires sont confiées à leurs soins. Les Gouvernemens respectifs n'auront le droit de se mêler de ces sortes d'affaires qu'en tant que la conduite des équipages ou du capitaine troublerait l'ordre et la tranquillité dans le pays où le vaisseau se trouve, ou que le consul du lieu se verrait obligé d'appeler l'intervention du pouvoir exécutif pour faire respecter ou maintenir sa décision; bien entendu que cette espèce de jugement ou d'arbitrage ne saurait, ports of the United States, provided the owners are inhabitants of St. Bartholomew, are there established and naturalized, and shall have there caused their vessels to be naturalized.

Art. 3. His Majesty the King of Sweden and Norway agrees that all articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of the West Indies, which are permitted to be imported in Swedish or Norwegian vessels, whether these articles be imported directly or indirectly from the said Indies, may likewise be imported into its territories in vessels of the United States; and there shall not be paid, either for said vessels or the cargoes, any higher or other duties, imposts, or charges whatsoever than those which would be paid by Swedish or Norwegian vessels in the same circumstances, with an addition only of ten per centum on the said duties, imposts, and charges, and no more.

In order to avoid misapprehension in this respect, it is expressly declared that the term "West Indies" ought to be taken in its most extensive sense, comprising all that portion of the earth, whether main land or islands, which at any time has been denominated the West Indies, in contradistinction to that other portion of the earth denominated the East Indies.

Art. 4. The United States of America, on their part, agree that all articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of the countries surrounding the Baltic sea, or bordering thereon, which are permitted to be imported in vessels of the United States, whether these articles be imported directly or indirectly from the Baltic, may likewise be imported into the United States in Swedish or Norwegian vessels; and there shall not then be paid for the said vessels, or for the cargoes, any higher or other duties, imposts, or charges whatsoever, than those which would be paid by vessels of the United States in the same circumstances, with an addition only of ten per centum on the said duties, imposts, and charges, and no more.

In order to avoid all uncertainty in respect to the duties, imposts, or charges whatsoever which a vessel belonging to the citizens or subjects of one of the contracting parties ought to pay, on arriving in the ports of the other with a cargo consisting partly of articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of the country to which the vessel belongs, and partly of any other merchandise, which the said vessel is permitted to import by the preceding articles, it is agreed, that in case a cargo should be thus mixed, the vessel shall always pay the duties, imposts, and charges, according to the nature of that part of the cargo which is subjected to the highest duties, in the same manner as if the vessel imported this sort of merchandise only.

Art. 5. The high contracting parties grant mutually the liberty of having, in the places of commerce and ports of the other, consuls, vice-consuls, or commercial agents, who shall enjoy all the protection and assistance necessary for the due discharge of their functions. But it is here expressly declared that, in case of illegal or improper conduct in respect to the laws or Government of the country to which they are sent, the said consul, vice-consul, or agent, may be either punished according to law, dismissed, or sent away by the offended Government, that Government assigning to the other the reasons therefor. It is, nevertheless, understood that the archives and documents relative to the affairs of the consulate shall be protected from all examination, and shall be carefully preserved, being placed under the seal of the consul and of the authority of the place where he shall have resided.

The consuls or their deputies shall have the right, as such, to act as judges and arbitrators in the differences which may arise between the captains and crews of the vessels of the nation whose affairs are intrusted to their care. The respective Governments shall have no right to interfere in matters of this kind, except the conduct of the captain and crew shall disturb the peace and tranquillity of the country in which the vessel may be, or that the consul of the place shall feel himself obliged to resort to the interposition and support of the executive authority to cause his decision to be respected and maintained; pourtant, priver les parties contendantes du droit qu'elles ont à leur retour de recourir aux autorités judiciaires de leur patrie.

Art. 6. Afin de prévenir toute dispute ou incertitude à l'égard de ce qui devra être réputé comme étant le produit du sol ou des manufactures des parties contractantes, respectivement, il est convenu que ce qui aura été désigné ou spécifié comme tel dans l'expédition que le chef ou l'intendant de la douane aura donnée aux vaisseaux qui sortiront des ports Européens des états de Sa Majesté le Roi de Suède et de Norvége sera reconnu et admis comme tel dans les Etats Unis; et que de même, ce qui le chef ou collecteur de la douane dans les ports des Etats Unis aura désigné et spécifié comme étant le produit du sol ou des manufactures des Etats Unis sera admis et reconnu comme tel dans les états de Sa Majesté le Roi de Suède et de Norvége. La spécification ou désignation donnée par le chef de la douane dans les colonies de Sa Majesté le Roi de Suède et de Norvége, et certifiée par le gouverneur de la colonie d'où l'exportation aura été faite, sera regardée comme preuve suffisante de l'origine des articles ainsi désignés ou spécifiés, pour qu'ils soyent admis à ce titre dans les ports des Etats Unis.

Art. 7. Les citoyens ou sujets de l'une des parties contractantes, arrivant avec leurs vaisseaux à l'une des côtes appartenantes à l'autre, mais ne voulant pas entrer dans le port, ou, après y être entrés, ne voulant pas décharger quelque partie de la cargaison ou déranger quelque chose du chargement, auront la liberté de partir et de poursuivre leur voyage sans être en quelque sorte molestés ou obligés de rendre compte du contenu de la cargaison, et sans payer d'autres droits, impôts, ou charges quelconques pour les vaisseaux ou la cargaison que les droits de pilotage, (quand on s'est servi d'un pilote,) et ceux pour le quayage ou pour l'entretien des fanaux là, où ces mêmes droits sont perçus sur les nationaux dans le même cas; bien entendu, cependant, que lorsque des vaisseaux appartenans aux citoyens ou sujets de l'une des parties contractantes se trouveraient dans l'enceinte de la jurisdiction de l'autre, ils se conformeront aux réglemens et ordonnances concernant la navigation, et les places ou ports dans lesquels on peut aborder, qui sont en vigueur à l'égard des nations les plus favorisées; et il sera permis aux officiers de douane dans les districts desquels les dits vaisseaux se trouvent de les visiter, de rester à bord, et de prendre telles précautions que peuvent être nécessaires pour prévenir tout commerce illicite pendant que les mêmes vaisseaux restent dans l'enceinte de cette même jurisdiction.

Art. 8. Il est aussi convenu, que les vaisseaux de l'une des parties contractantes, étant entrés dans les ports de l'autre, ils pourront se borner à ne décharger qu'une partie de leur cargaison selon que le capitaine ou propriétaire le désire, et qu'ils pourront s'en aller librement avec le reste de la cargaison sans payer de droits, impôts, ou charges quelconques que pour la partie qui aura été mise à terre, et qui sera marquée et biffée sur la liste ou la manifeste contenant l'énumération des effets que le vaisseau aura du apporter; laquelle liste devra toujours être présentée en entier à la douane au lieu où le vaisseau aura abordé. Il ne sera rien payé pour la partie de la cargaison que le vaisseau aura emporté, et avec laquelle il pourra continuer sa route pour un ou plusieurs autres ports du même pays dans lesquels l'entrée est permise aux vaisseaux des nations les plus favorisées, et y disposer du reste de sa cargaison en payant les droits qui y sont attachés; ou bien il pourra s'en aller avec la cargaison qui lui reste pour les ports de quelque autre pays. Il est, cependant, entendu que les droits, impôts, ou charges quelconques qui sont payables pour le vaisseau même doivent être acquittés dans le premier port où il rompt le chargement et en décharge une partie, et qu'aucuns droits ou impositions pareils ne seront demandés de nouveau dans les ports du même pays, où le dit vaisseau pourra vouloir entrer après, à moins que les nationaux ne soyent sujets à quelques droits ultérieurs pour le même cas.

it being, nevertheless, understood that this kind of judgment or award shall not deprive the contending parties of the right which they shall have, on their return, to recur to the judicial authorities of their own country.

Art. 6. In order to prevent all dispute and uncertainty in respect to what may be considered as being the growth, produce, and manufacture of the contracting parties, respectively, it is agreed, that whatever the chief or intendant of the customs shall have designated and specified as such, in the clearance delivered to the vessels which depart from the European ports of His Majesty the King of Sweden and Norway, shall be acknowledged and admitted as such in the United States; and that, in the same manner, whatever the chief or collector of the customs in the ports of the United States shall have designated and specified as the growth, produce, or manufacture of the United States, shall be acknowledged and admitted as such in the territories of His Majesty the King of Sweden and Norway.

The specification or designation given by the chief of the customs in the colonies of His Majesty the King of Sweden and Norway, and confirmed by the governor of the colony, shall be considered as sufficient proof of the origin of the articles thus specified or designated, to obtain for them admission into the ports of the United States accordingly.

Art. 7. The citizens or subjects of one of the contracting parties, arriving with their vessels on any coast belonging to the other, but not willing to enter into port, or, being entered into port, and not willing to unload or break bulk, shall have liberty to depart, and to pursue their voyage without molestation, and without being obliged to render account of their cargo, or to pay any duties, imposts, or charges whatsoever on the vessels or cargo, excepting only the dues of pilotage, (when a pilot shall have been employed,) or those of quayage, or light money, whenever those dues are paid in the same circumstances by the citizens or subjects of the country. It being, nevertheless, understood, that whenever the vessels belonging to the citizens or subjects of one of the contracting parties shall be within the jurisdiction of the other, they shall conform to the laws and regulations concerning navigation, and the places and ports into which they may be permitted to enter, which are in force with regard to the citizens or subjects of the country; and it shall be lawful for the officers of the customs, in the district where the said vessels may be, to visit them, to remain on board, and to take such precautions as may be necessary to prevent all illicit commerce while such vessels remain within the said jurisdiction.

Art. 8. It is also agreed, that the vessels of one of the contracting parties, entering the ports of the other, shall be permitted to discharge a part only of their cargoes, whenever the captain or owner shall desire so to do, and they shall be allowed to depart freely with the remainder, without paying any duties, imposts, or charges whatsoever, except on that part which shall have been landed, and which shall be marked and noted on the list or manifest containing the enumeration of the merchandise which the vessel ought to have on board, and which list ought always to be presented, without reservation, to the officers of the customs at the place where the vessel shall have arrived; and nothing shall be paid on the part of the cargo which the vessel takes away; and the said vessel may proceed therewith to any other port or ports in the same country, into which vessels of the most favored nations are permitted to enter, and there dispose of the same; or the said vessel may depart therewith to the ports of any other country. It is, however, understood, that the duties, imposts, or charges, which are payable on the vessel itself, ought to be paid at the first port where it breaks bulk and discharges a part of the cargo, and that no such duties or impositions shall be again demanded in the ports of the same country where the said vessel may thereafter enter, except the inhabitants of the country be subjected to further duties in the same circumstances.

ART. 9. Les citoyens ou sujets de l'une des parties contractantes jouiront dans les ports de l'autre, tant pour leurs vaisseaux que pour leurs marchandises, de tous les droits et facilités d'entrepôt dont jouissent les nations le plus favorisées dans les mêmes ports.

ART. 10. Au cas que quelque vaisseau appartenant à l'un des deux états, ou à leurs citoyens et sujets, aura échoué, fait naufrage, ou souffert quelque autre dommage sur des côtes de la domination de l'une des deux parties contractantes, il sera donné toute aide et assistance aux personnes naufragées, ou qui se trouvent en danger, et il leur sera accordé des passeports pour assûrer leur retour dans leur patrie. Les navires et marchandises naufragés, ou leur provenu, si les effets eussent été vendus, étant reclamés dans l'an et jour par les propriétaires, ou leur ayant-cause, seront restitués en payant les mêmes frais du sauvement conformément aux lois et coutumes des deux nations que payeraient les nationaux dans le même cas. Les Gouvernemens respectifs veilleront à ce que les compagnies qui sont ou pourront être instituées pour sauver les personnes et effets naufragés, ne se permettent point de vexations ou actes arbitraires.

ART. 11. Il est convenu que les vaisseaux qui arrivent directement des Etats Unis à un port de la domination de Sa Majesté le Roi de Suède et de Norvége, ou des pays de sa dite Majesté en Europe à un port des Etats Unis, et qui sont pourvus d'un certificat de santé donné par l'officier compétent à cet égard du port d'où le vaisseau est sorti, et assurant qu'aucune maladie maligne ou contagieuse n'existait dans ce port, ne seront soumis à aucune autre quarantine que celle qui sera nécessaire pour la visite de l'officier de santé du port où le vaisseau est arrivé; après laquelle il sera permis au vaisseau d'entrer immédiatement et de décharger sa cargaison; bien entendu toujours qu'il n'y ait eu personne à bord du vaisseau qui s'est trouvé attaqué pendant le voyage d'une maladie maligne ou contagieuse, et que la contrée d'où vient le vaisseau ne soit pas à cette époque si généralement regardée comme infectée ou suspectée qu'on ait été obligé de donner auparavant une ordonnance par laquelle tous les vaisseaux qui viendraient de ce pays seraient regardés comme suspectés, et soumis à la quarantine.

ART. 12. Le traité d'amitié et de commerce, conclu à Paris, en 1783, par les plénipotentiaires des Etats Unis et de Sa Majesté le Roi de Suède, est renouvellé et mis en vigueur par le présent traité, pour tout ce qui est convenu dans les articles deux, cinq, six, sept, huit, neuf, dix, onze, douze, treize, quatorze, quinze, seize, dix-sept, dix-huit, dix-neuf, vingt-un, vingt-deux, vingt-trois, et vingt-cinq du dit traité, ainsi que les articles séparés un, deux, quatre, et cinq, qui furent signés le même jour par les mêmes plénipotentiaires; et les articles désignés seront regardés comme ayant force et vigueur tout comme s'ils étaient ici insérés mot à mot: bien entendu, que les stipulations contenues dans les articles précités seront toujours censées ne rien changer aux conventions précédemment conclues avec d'autres nations amies et alliées.

ART. 13. Vu l'éloignement des pays respectifs des deux hautes parties contractantes, et l'incertitude qui en résulte sur les divers événemens qui peuvent avoir lieu, il est convenu qu'un bâtiment marchand appartenant à l'une des parties contractantes, et se trouvant destiné pour un port qui serait supposé bloqué au moment du départ de ce bâtiment, ne sera cependant pas capturé ou condamné pour avoir essayé une première fois d'entrer dans le dit port, à moins qu'il ne puisse être prouvé que le dit bâtiment ait pu et du apprendre, en route, que l'état de blocus de la place en question continuait; mais les bâtimens qui, après avoir été renvoyés une fois, essayeraient pendant le même voyage d'entrer une seconde fois dans le même port ennemi, durant la continuation du blocus, se trouveront alors sujets à être détenus et condamnés.

ART. 14. Le présent traité, dès qu'il aura été ratifié par le Président des Etats Unis, par et avec l'avis et

ART. 9. The citizens or subjects of one of the contracting parties shall enjoy in the ports of the other, as well for their vessels as for their merchandise, all the rights and privileges of entrepot which are enjoyed by the most favored nations in the same ports.

ART. 10. In case any vessel belonging to either of the two States, or to their citizens or subjects, shall be stranded, shipwrecked, or have suffered any other damage on the coasts under the dominion of either of the parties, all aid and assistance shall be given to the persons shipwrecked, or who may be in danger thereof, and passports shall be granted them to return to their own country. The ships and merchandise wrecked, or the proceeds thereof, if the effects be sold, being claimed in a year and a day by the owners or their attorney, shall be restored, on paying the same costs of salvage, conformably to the laws and usages of the two nations, which the citizens or subjects of the country would pay in the same circumstances. The respective Governments shall watch over the companies which are or may be instituted for saving shipwrecked persons and property, that vexations and abuses may not take place.

ART. 11. It is agreed that vessels arriving direct from the United States at a port under the dominion of His Majesty the King of Sweden and Norway, or from the ports of his said Majesty in Europe at a port of the United States, furnished with a certificate of health from the competent health officer of the port whence they took their departure, certifying that no malignant or contagious disease existed at that port, shall not be subjected to any other quarantine than such as shall be necessary for the visit of the health officer of the port at which they may have arrived; but shall, after such visit, be permitted immediately to enter and discharge their cargoes: Provided, always, That there may not be found any person on board who has been, during the voyage, afflicted with a malignant or contagious disease, and that the country from which the vessel comes may not be so generally regarded at the time as infected or suspected that it has been previously necessary to issue a regulation by which all vessels coming from that country are regarded as suspected, and subjected to quarantine.

ART. 12. The treaty of amity and commerce concluded at Paris, in 1783, by the plenipotentiaries of the United States and of His Majesty the King of Sweden, is renewed and put in force by the present treaty, in respect to all which is contained in the second, fifth, sixth, seventh, eighth, ninth, tenth, eleventh, twelfth, thirteenth, fourteenth, fifteenth, sixteenth, seventeenth, eighteenth, nineteenth, twenty-first, twenty-second, twenty-third, and twenty-fifth articles of the said treaty, as well as the separate articles one, two, four, and five, which were signed the same day by the same plenipotentiaries; and the articles specified shall be considered to have as full force and vigor as if they were inserted word for word: Provided, nevertheless, That the stipulations contained in the articles above mentioned shall always be considered as making no change in the conventions previously concluded with other friendly and allied nations.

ART. 13. Considering the distance of the respective countries of the two high contracting parties, and the uncertainty that results therefrom in relation to the various events which may take place, it is agreed that a merchant vessel belonging to one of the contracting parties, and destined to a port supposed to be blockaded at the time of her departure, shall not, however, be captured or condemned for having a first time attempted to enter the said port, unless it may be proved that the said vessel could and ought to have learned, on her passage, that the place in question continued to be in a state of blockade; but vessels which, after having been once turned away, shall attempt a second time, during the same voyage, to enter the same port of the enemy, while the blockade continues, shall be liable to detention and condemnation.

ART. 14. The present treaty, when the same shall have been ratified by the President of the United States, le consentement du Sénat, et par Sa Majesté le Roi de Suède et de Norvége, restera en vigueur, et sera obligatoire pour les Etats Unis et Sa Majesté le Roi de Suède et de Norvége, pendant l'espace de huit ans, à compter de l'échange des ratifications; et celles-ci seront échangées dans huit mois après la signature de ce traité, et plutôt si faire se peut.

En foi de quoi, les plénipotentiaires respectifs ont signé le présent traité, et y ont apposé le cachet de leurs armes. Fait à Stockholm, le quatre Septembre, l'an de Grâce mil huit cent seize.

by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and by His Majesty the King of Sweden and Norway, shall continue in force, and be obligatory on the United States and His Majesty the King of Sweden and Norway, for the term of eight years from the exchange of the ratifications; and the ratifications shall be exchanged in eight months from the signature of this treaty, or sooner if possible.

In faith whereof, the respective plenipotentiaries have signed the present treaty, and have thereunto set the seal of their arms. Done at Stockholm, the fourth day of September, in the year of Grace one thousand eight hundred and sixteen.

14th CONGRESS.] No. 285. [2d SESSION.

NEUTRAL OBLIGATIONS.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, DECEMBER 26, 1816.

WASHINGTON, December 26, 1816,

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

It is found that the existing laws have not the efficacy necessary to prevent violations of the obligations of the United States as a nation at peace towards belligerent parties, and other unlawful acts on the high seas, by armed vessels equipped within the waters of the United States.

With a view to maintain more effectually the respect due to the laws, to the character, and to the neutral and pacific relations of the United States, I recommend to the consideration of Congress the expediency of such further legislative provisions as may be requisite for detaining vessels actually equipped, or in a course of equipment, with a warlike force, within the jurisdiction of the United States; or, as the case may be, for obtaining from the owners or commanders of such vessels adequate securities against the abuse of their armaments, with the exceptions in such provisions proper for the cases of merchant vessels furnished with the defensive armaments usual on distant and dangerous expeditions, and of a private commerce in military stores permitted by our laws, and which the law of nations does not require the United States to prohibit.

JAMES MADISON.

[The following documents, relating to the subject referred to in the above message, were laid before the House of Representatives, by Mr. Forsyth, chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations.]

Mr. Forsyth to the Secretary of State.

SIR: JANUARY 1, 1817.

I am instructed by the Committee of Foreign Relations to inquire what information has been given to the Department of State of violations, or intended violations, of the neutral obligations of the United States to foreign Powers, by the arming and equipment of vessels of war in our ports; what prosecutions have been commenced under the existing laws to prevent the commission of such offences; what persons prosecuted have been discharged, in consequence of the defects of the laws now in force; and the particular provisions that have been found insufficient, or for the want of which persons deserving punishment have escaped.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JOHN FORSYTH,
Chairman Committee Foreign Relations.

Hon. JAMES MONROE.

Secretary of State to Mr. Forsyth.

SIR: DEPARTMENT OF STATE, January 6, 1817.

Having communicated to you, verbally, the information asked for by your letter of the 1st instant, except so far as relates to the last inquiry it contains, I have now the honor to state, that the provisions necessary to make the laws effectual against fitting out armed vessels in our ports, for the purpose of hostile cruising, seem to be—

1st. That they should be laid under bond not to violate the treaties of the United States, or the obligations of the United States under the law of nations, in all cases where there is reason to suspect such a purpose on foot, including the cases of vessels taking on board arms and munitions of war, applicable to the equipment and armament of such vessels, subsequent to their departure.

2d. To invest the collectors, or other revenue officers where there are no collectors, with power to seize and detain vessels under circumstances indicating strong presumption of an intended breach of the law: the detention to take place until the order of the Executive, on a full representation of the facts had thereupon, can be obtained. The statute book contains analogous powers to this above suggested. (See particularly the eleventh section of the act of Congress of April 25, 1808.)

The existing laws do not go to this extent. They do not authorize the demand of security in any shape, or any interposition on the part of the magistracy as a preventive, where there is reason to suspect an intention to commit the offence. They rest upon the general footing of punishing the offence merely where, if there be full evidence of the actual perpetration of the crime, the party is handed over, after the trial, to the penalty denounced.

I have the honor to be, &c. JAMES MONROE.

Hon. JOHN FORSYTH, Chairman Com. Foreign Relations.

Secretary of State to Mr. Forsyth.

SIR: DEPARTMENT OF STATE, January 10, 1817.

In addition to the letter which I wrote to you on the 6th, in reply to the one which you wrote to me on the 1st instant, I have the honor to state, that information has been received at this Department, from various sources, that vessels have been armed and equipped in our ports for the purpose of cruising against the commerce of nations in amity with the United States, and no doubt is entertained that this information was in some instances correct. The owners of these vessels have, however, generally taken care so to conceal these armaments and equipments, and the object of them, as to render it extremely difficult, under existing circumstances, to prevent or punish this infraction of the law. It has been represented—

1st. That vessels belonging to citizens of the United States, or foreigners, have been armed and equipped in our ports, and have cleared out from our custom-houses, as merchant vessels; and, after touching at other ports, have hoisted the flag of some of the belligerents, and cruised under it against the commerce of nations in amity with the United States.

2dly. That in other instances, other vessels, armed and equipped in our ports, have hoisted such flags after clearing out and getting to sea, and have, in like manner, cruised against the commerce of nations in amity with the United States, extending their depredations, in a few cases, to the property of citizens of the United States.

3dly. That in other instances, foreign vessels have entered the ports of the United States, and, availing themselves of the privileges allowed by our laws, have, in various modes, augmented their armaments, with pretended commercial views; have taken on board citizens of the United States, as passengers, who, on their arrival at neutral ports, have assumed the character of officers and soldiers in the service of some of the parties in the contest now prevailing in our southern hemisphere.

Information, founded upon these representations, has from time to time been given to the attorneys and collectors of the respective districts in which the armaments are stated to have been made; but, from the difficulty of obtaining the necessary evidence to establish facts on which the law would operate, few prosecutions have been instituted.

In reply to your second inquiry, I beg leave to refer to the communication from the Secretary of the Treasury to the Committee of Ways and Means, during the last session of Congress, in the case of the "American Eagle," and to the papers enclosed herewith.

I have the honor to be, &c. JAMES MONROE.

Hon. JOHN FORSYTH, Chairman Com. Foreign Relations.

Extract of a letter from John Dick, Esq., Attorney of the United States for the district of Louisiana, to the Secretary of State, dated

MARCH 1, 1816.

Attempts to violate the laws, by fitting out and arming, and by augmenting the force of vessels, have no doubt been frequent; but certainly in no instance successful, except where conducted under circumstances of concealment that eluded discovery, and almost suspicion; or where carried on at some remote part of the coast, beyond the reach of detection or discovery. In every instance where it was known that these illegal acts were attempting, or where it was afterwards discovered that they had been committed, the persons engaged, as far as they were known, have been prosecuted, while the vessels fitted out, or attempted to be fitted out, have been seized and libelled under the act of the 5th of June, 1794; and when captures have been made by vessels thus fitted out and armed, or in which their force was augmented or increased within our waters, where the property taken was brought within our jurisdiction, or even found upon the high seas by our cruisers and brought in, it has been restored to the original Spanish owners, and, in some instances, damages awarded against the captors.

An enumeration of the cases in which individuals have been prosecuted for infringing, or attempting to infringe, our neutrality, in aid of the Governments of New Spain, and in which vessels have been seized and libelled, under the act of the 5th June, 1794, together with a list of the vessels and property restored to the original Spanish owners, (confining the whole to the operations of the year commencing March, 1815, and ending February, 1816,) will show more conclusively, perhaps, than any thing else can, how totally without foundation are the complaints, and how misplaced are the assertions of the minister of Spain on this head.

The names of individuals prosecuted in the district court of the United States for the Louisiana district, during the year 1815, for violating, or attempting to violate, the neutrality of the United States, in aid of the Governments of the United Provinces of New Grenada and of the United Provinces of Mexico.

3. Schooner Amiable Maria, $3,850.
4. Schooner Experimento, restored 3d August.
5. The polacre brig De Regla and cargo, proceeds restored 18th December, 1815, $19,209 50.

6. Schooner Alerta and cargo, being the proceeds of the capture of about eighteen small vessels, restored 18th December, 1815, $62,150 05.

Damages awarded to the original owners against the captors in the two foregoing cases, $55,272 99.

7. Cargo of the schooner Petit Melan, restored 1st February, 1816, $2,444 31.

8. Cargo of the schooner Presidente, 1st February, 1816, $10,931 15.

9. Schooner Sante Ritor and cargo, restored 1st February, 1816, $37,962 94.

The preceding account of Spanish property restored to the original proprietors, after being in the possession of the enemies of Spain, is defective, inasmuch as it does not comprehend the whole of the cases of restoration that have taken place within the period to which the detail is confined. The very hasty manner in which I have made this communication did not admit of a more accurate statement. The principal cases, however, are included in it.

In several other cases, where the property was claimed for the original Spanish owners, the claims were dismissed, because it did not appear that any violation of our neutrality had taken place. The capturing vessels were not armed, nor was their force augmented within our jurisdiction, nor had the captures been made within a marine league of our shore. The principles that guided the decisions of the court, as well in restoring the property captured, where our neutral means had been used, as in declining all interference where that was not the case, manifest, I think, a disposition to, and an exercise of, the most rigid neutrality between the parties.

If the whole of this letter is not an act of supererogation, to dwell longer upon those parts of the correspondence of the Chevalier De Onis which relate to Louisiana would at least be so considered.

Mr. Glenn to the Secretary of State.

SIR: BALTIMORE, September 7, 1816.

Immediately upon the receipt of your letters of the 16th of August, I obtained from the collector of this port an affidavit, stating that Thomas Taylor had, in April last, sworn that he was a citizen of the United States, and, as such, had cleared out the schooner Romp, which vessel the collector also declared, on oath, he believed to have cruised against the vessels of the King of Spain since that time. Upon which affidavit, an intelligent justice of the peace of this city, well disposed, upon the score of political feeling, to do as much as justice required towards the punishment of Taylor for his conduct, issued a warrant, by virtue of which Taylor was arrested. Upon its return, I appeared before the justice, (whose name is John Dougherty,) and presented all the documents which were sent to me in company with your letter, which were read and received as evidence by him. I also caused a sailor, who had served on board the Romp, and who was at that time in hospital at this place, to be summoned, as also the editor of the "American" newspaper, in which Taylor's letter had appeared, bearing date at "Baltimore, the 10th of July, 1816;" all of whom were examined, on oath, before the justice. The sailor was cautioned not to criminate himself, upon which he refused to answer any question. Mr. Murphy, one of the editors of the American, declared, on oath, that he had no authority whatever from Taylor to publish the letter which bore his signature, but that he had taken the same, of his own accord, as an article of intelligence, from a newspaper printed in Charleston. I was not, you will perceive, in the slightest degree assisted in my case by the examination of these witnesses. I, however, urged before the justice that the depositions laid a sufficient ground of probable cause of suspicion against Taylor, when connected with the affidavit of the collector. I also produced some authority to show that Taylor ought to be committed. Whereupon the justice desired until yesterday morning to consider upon the case, and requested that the marshal might be present at the time of his decision, which accordingly took place. The justice has, notwithstanding all these circumstances, actually discharged Taylor, upon the ground, as he states, that he could not find there was any probable cause to believe he was concerned with, or advised Squire Fisk, to commit the acts of piracy which were committed by him on his late cruise, and as Taylor never was on board the Romp from the time she left Baltimore. Thus ended this case, as far as I have gone.

Judge Houston will be here in one or two days to hold a district court. Upon his arrival, I shall lay all the proofs before him, and claim from him a warrant, which I presume he will grant without hesitation, the issue of which shall be communicated to you without delay.

As the editors of the American and Patriot tell me they copied the letter written by Taylor, bearing date the 10th July, 1816, from the Savannah Republican or the Charleston Patriot, unless I can procure the testimony of one of these editors to prove that Taylor actually gave them that letter for publication, I do not see how he is to be implicated criminally with Fisk. If Judge Houston should take cognizance of the case, I will, at all events, be glad to have the witnesses who were examined in Virginia here on the 7th of November next, to give evidence before the grand jury which will be summoned to attend the circuit court.

In this case, there are a variety of circumstances tending to show Taylor's co-operation with and assistance to Fisk; but none, I fear, sufficiently conclusive to convict him, unless we can prove the authenticity of his letter of instructions, which can only be done by procuring his orders to publish his last letter, which admits the authenticity of the first.

I enclose to you four letters which have been lately received by me from the Spanish consul here, as also my answer to them. I shall be happy to hear that I have, in all these affairs, acted in such a manner as to meet your approbation.

I have the honor, &c. ELIAS GLENN.

GREAT BRITAIN—DISCRIMINATING DUTIES.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, FEBRUARY 3, 1817.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States: FEBRUARY 3, 1817.

The Government of Great Britain, induced by the posture of the relations with the United States which succeeded the conclusion of the recent commercial convention, issued an order on the 17th day of August, 1815, discontinuing the discriminating duties payable in British ports on American vessels and their cargoes. It was not until the 22d of December following that a corresponding discontinuance of discriminating duties on British vessels and their cargoes in American ports took effect, under the authority vested in the Executive, by the act of March, 1816. During the period between those two dates, there was, consequently, a failure of reciprocity or equality in the existing regulations of the two countries. I recommend to the consideration of Congress the expediency of paying to the British Government the amount of the duties remitted during the period in question to the citizens of the United States, subject to a deduction of the amount of whatever discriminating duties may have commenced in British ports after the signature of that convention, and been collected previous to the 17th of August, 1815.

GREAT BRITAIN—DEPORTATION OF SLAVES.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, FEBRUARY 7, 1817.

To the Senate of the United States: FEBRUARY 7, 1817.

I transmit to the Senate a report of the Secretary of State, complying with their resolution of the 28th of last month.

JAMES MADISON.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, February 5, 1817.

The Secretary of State, to whom has been referred the resolution of the Senate of the 28th of last month, requesting the President to cause to be laid before the Senate such information as he may possess touching the execution of so much of the first article of the late treaty of peace and amity between His Britannic Majesty and the United States of America as relates to the restitution of slaves, has the honor to submit to the President the accompanying papers, marked A, B, C, D, and E, as containing all the information in this Department supposed to be called for by the said resolution.

All which is respectfully submitted.

Extract of a letter from the Secretary of State to Mr. Adams, dated

MAY 11, 1815.

I am sorry to have to state that the British naval commanders have construed the stipulation in the treaty not to carry off with their forces the slaves whom they had taken from our citizens differently from this Government. My correspondence with Mr. Baker, of which a copy is enclosed, will show the ground of this difference, which appears to be so decidedly in favor of the United States, that it has excited surprise that it should have existed; and still greater that the British officers should have acted on their construction, by removing the slaves in question. Mr. Baker makes a distinction between the slaves who were in British ships of war in our waters, and those who were in the posts held by their forces at the time of the exchange of the ratifications of the treaty, but I think without reason. It seems to have been the intention of the parties, and to be the clear import of the article, that they should carry off no slaves that were then within our limits. They were as much in the possession and under the authority of the British commanders in the forts, or other places held by their troops on the land, as in their vessels. It was as much a carrying away in the one instance as in the other; and the injury to the proprietors of the slaves was the same. In short, I see no ground for such a distinction. The United States have a right either to the restitution of all these slaves, or to compensation for their loss. I shall forward to you, without delay, a list of those thus removed, with an estimate of their value; the payment of which, if the slaves themselves are not restored, you will claim of the British Government.

[Enclosed in the preceding.]

The Secretary of State to Mr. Baker, Chargé d'Affaires of His Britannic Majesty.

SIR: APRIL 1, 1815.

I regret to have to state that the commanders of His Britannic Majesty's naval forces in the Chesapeake, and on Cumberland island, and other islands off the southern coast, have construed the stipulation in the first article of the treaty of peace, lately concluded between the United States and Great Britain, very differently from what is thought to be a just construction of it by this Government. They comprise slaves, and other private property, under the same regulation with artillery, and other public property, and contend that none ought to be restored except such as were, at the time of the exchange of the ratifications of the treaty, in the forts and places where they were originally taken.

By the first article of the treaty it is stipulated "that all territory, places, and possessions whatsoever, taken from either party by the other during the war, or which may be taken after the signing of this treaty, excepting only the islands hereinafter mentioned, shall be restored without delay, and without causing any destruction or carrying away any of the artillery or other public property originally captured in the said forts or places, and which shall remain therein upon the exchange of the ratifications of this treaty; or any slaves or other private property."

A very obvious distinction exists between private and public property; and there may be a strong and obvious motive for destroying the one, when there can be none for destroying the other. It frequently happens, in surrendering territory by a treaty of peace, that the party withdrawing stipulates a right to destroy the fortifications in its possession, and to carry away or destroy the artillery and munitions of war in them; but it is believed that no example can be found of a stipulation to authorize the destruction of private property of any kind, especially slaves. Equally strange would a stipulation be not to destroy them.

The terms of the article preserve this distinction between public and private property in a guarded manner. All territory, places, and possessions, with a particular exception, shall be restored, without destroying or carrying away any of the artillery or other public property originally captured in the said forts or places, and which remain there upon the exchange of ratifications. So far the stipulation acts upon proper subjects, and conforms to usage. Extend it to slaves and other private property, and how inconsistent and unnatural the application! Had it been intended to put slaves and other private property on the same ground with artillery and other public property, the terms "originally captured in the said forts or places, and which shall remain therein on the exchange of the ratifications of this treaty," would have followed at the end of the sentence, after "slaves and other private property." In that case, both interests, the public and the private, would have been subject to the same restraint. But, by separating them from each other, and putting the restrictive words immediately after "artillery and other public property," it shows that it was intended to confine their operation to those objects only, excluding from it "slaves and other private property."

Other consequences, equally inconsistent with the spirit and equity of the article, would follow from the construction given of it by the British naval commanders. If the slaves and other private property are placed on the same footing with artillery and other public property, the consequence must be that all will be carried away. It is believed that none of the slaves were taken in forts or other places where the British troops happened to be at the exchange of the ratifications of the treaty. By far the greater number, if not the whole, were taken from proprietors inhabiting the country bordering on the bays and rivers which empty into the Atlantic. As this fact was well known to the commissioners of both nations, it furnishes a conclusive argument against the construction contended for by the British naval commanders. It cannot be believed that the commissioners would have agreed to a stipulation which they respectively knew would produce no effect.

In supposing that all the slaves would be carried away under the construction given to this article by the British naval commanders, I have considered the term "place," in a qualified sense, synonymous with "fort," as a military station, taken by the British forces and held by them at the peace. But if it is construed in a more enlarged sense, such as the country from which the slaves were taken, none could be carried away even under that construction. That it must be construed in this enlarged sense, if applicable to slaves and other private property, is obvious from the consideration that the act of taking them removed them from the places where they were taken.

The stipulation in this article, in relation to the point in question, by a fair and just construction, appears to me to amount to this: that each party shall restore, without delay, all the territory, places, and possessions, which had been taken by it, with the exception of certain islands; that neither shall destroy or carry away artillery or public property, provided they be, at the time of the exchange of ratifications, in the forts or places in which they were originally captured; that neither shall carry away slaves or other private property. The restraint provided against the carrying away of the latter is evidently connected with the great object of the article, the restoration of territory, places, and possessions, and not with forts and places, in the qualified sense suggested; in which sense it applies to artillery and other public property only, the ordinary and proper appurtenances of forts and other military posts.

From every view which I have been able to take of this subject, I am of opinion that the United States are entitled to all the slaves and other private property which were in the possession of the British forces, within the limits of the United States, on the exchange of the ratifications of the treaty, whether they were in forts or British ships of war.

Presuming that your Government has instructed you upon this subject, and that it concurs in this construction of the article, I flatter myself that you will give directions to the British naval commanders not to carry away any of the slaves and other private property which may thus be fairly claimed by the United States.

I have the honor to be, &c. JAMES MONROE.

ANTHONY ST. JOHN BAKER, Esq., &c.

Mr. Baker to Mr. Monroe.

SIR: WASHINGTON, April 3, 1815.

I have had the honor to receive your letter of the 1st instant, stating that the commanders of His Majesty's naval forces have given a different construction to that part of the first article of the treaty of peace lately concluded between the two countries which relates to the restoration of slaves and private property from what is thought by the American Government to be its just construction, by making the restriction annexed to the restoration of artillery and public property likewise apply to slaves and private property; at the same time expressing your opinion that the United States are entitled to all the slaves and other private property in possession of the British forces within the limits of the United States on the exchange of the ratifications, whether they were in forts or British ships of war, and requesting, under the supposition that His Majesty's Government concurred in this construction of the article, and had furnished me with instructions accordingly, that I would give directions to the naval commanders not to carry away any of the slaves so claimed by the United States.

As I have not received any communication on the subject from the commander-in-chief on the American station, by whose orders the several naval commanders have, no doubt, been guided, I am unacquainted with the grounds on which he rests his interpretation of the words of the first article of the treaty. It is, however, not improbable that he may have imagined that it could not have been intended by the plenipotentiaries of the two countries that there should be a general prohibition against carrying away from the places restored all private property of every description, and to whomsoever belonging, found therein on the exchange of the ratifications; and that, therefore, as some limitation must have been contemplated in the case of private as well as public property, the restriction attached by the words immediately preceding to the latter, was likewise applicable to the former.

I regret to find that, by the view taken of this part of the first article, the Government of the United States claims the negroes, originally American, on board of the British ships of war which happened to be within the limits of the United States at the time of the exchange of the ratifications, as I do not conceive that it can be satisfactorily shown that this construction is sanctioned by the words of the article; and I have no hesitation in stating my belief, founded on the best means of information, that, at the time the article was framed, it was meant that the prohibition against carrying away slaves and private property should be taken in connexion with the restoration of territory, places, and possessions; and that if it had been supposed by His Majesty's plenipotentiaries at Ghent that the words were susceptible of the construction now given to them, and that a claim would be founded upon them for the delivering up of persons who had sought refuge during the war on board of British ships, their insertion would have been decidedly objected to, and others proposed.

Not being, however, in possession of any instructions from my Government upon this subject, the only step which it is in my power to take in relation to it is to transmit to England, and to the naval commander-in-chief on this station, copies of your letter; and I have no doubt that the reasoning contained in it will, in the most perfect spirit of amity, be duly and considerately examined, with the sincere desire to give that interpretation to the article in question which may be most consonant to justice and to its true and fair meaning.

I have the honor to be, &c.

ANTHONY ST. JOHN BAKER.

To the Hon. JAMES MONROE, &c.

Mr. Graham to the Secretary of State.

SIR: CITY OF WASHINGTON, February 28, 1815.

I now enclose a copy of the correspondence between the commissioners appointed on the part of the United States to receive and make the necessary arrangements respecting the public and private property in possession of the British forces within the Chesapeake bay, to be given up under the first article of the treaty of peace between the United States and Great Britain, and Captain John Clavelle, commanding the British forces in the Chesapeake bay.

In pursuance of the arrangements therein made, Colonel Bayly has remained to take an inventory of the property and slaves, and to endeavor to ascertain, as far as practicable, to whom they belong.

I have the honor to be, &c. GEORGE GRAHAM.

The Hon. JAMES MONROE.

Messrs. Bayly, Graham, and Skinner to Mr. Clavelle.

SIR: SCHOONER ADELINE, CHESAPEAKE BAY, February 23, 1815.

The undersigned, commissioners appointed on the part of the United States to receive, and make all necessary arrangements concerning, the property which may be in the possession of the forces of His Britannic Majesty in the Chesapeake, or on the shores or islands thereof, and which is to be delivered up and restored, agreeably to the first article of the treaty of peace and amity between the United States and His Britannic Majesty, concluded and signed at Ghent, on the 24th day of December, 1814, have the honor to inform you, that, having exhibited to you their powers, they are now ready to proceed to execute the trust reposed in them; and they take this occasion to observe, that, under the stipulations of the first article of the said treaty, all slaves, and other private property, which may now be in possession of the forces of His Britannic Majesty within the Chesapeake, are claimed to be delivered up forthwith, and that all such as may have been removed since the 17th instant, (the day on which the exchange of the ratifications of the treaty took place,) are claimed to be restored with all convenient despatch.

We have the honor to be, &c.

THO. M. BAYLY,
GEORGE GRAHAM,
JOHN S. SKINNER.

Captain JOHN CLAVELLE,
Commander of His Britannic Majesty's forces in the Chesapeake.

Mr. Clavelle to Messrs. Bayly, Graham, and Skinner.

GENTLEMEN: H. M. SHIP ORLANDO, IN THE PATUXENT, February 23, 1815.

I have just had the honor of receiving your communication of this day's date, stating that you are appointed, on the part of the United States, to receive and make all necessary arrangements concerning the property which may be in possession of the forces of His Britannic Majesty in the Chesapeake, or on the shores or islands thereof, agreeably to the first article of the treaty of peace between His Britannic Majesty and the United States; and in reply I beg to state, that I understand the first article of the treaty, relative to private and public property, thus, viz: all territory, places, and possessions whatsoever, taken from either party by the other during the war, or which may have been taken after the signing this treaty, excepting only the islands hereafter mentioned, shall be restored without delay, and without causing any destruction or carrying away any of the artillery or other public stores, or any slaves, or other private property originally captured in the said forts or places, and which shall remain therein upon the exchange of the ratification of this treaty.

As none of the slaves now in Tangier were captured there, I cannot feel myself at liberty to deliver them up; far less can I give up those now serving on board His Britannic Majesty's ships, as by entering into the service they made themselves free men. I shall, however, give directions that the whole of those on board the different ships, of every description, shall be discharged into this ship until I receive instructions from Rear Admiral Cockburn, to whom I shall immediately despatch a vessel.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JOHN CLAVELLE.

To Messrs. BAYLY, GRAHAM, and SKINNER.

Messrs. Bayly, Graham, and Skinner to Mr. Clavelle.

SIR: SCHOONER ADELINE, IN THE CHESAPEAKE BAY, February 23, 1815.

We have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your reply to our communication of this date, and regret to find that you do not feel yourself at liberty to deliver up all slaves and other private property of the citizens of the United States, which came under your control previously or subsequently to the date of the exchange of the ratifications of the treaty concluded by the commissioners on the part of the United States and Great Britain, and still remaining within the Chesapeake, or on the shores or islands thereof.

As, however, you have put a construction upon the first article of the treaty, which, in our estimation, the terms of it do not warrant, and difficulties have arisen in the execution of our trust which were not anticipated, it becomes our duty to ask your co-operation in taking, for the mutual satisfaction of our respective Governments, an inventory of all slaves and other private property within the waters of the Chesapeake, or on the shores or islands thereof, and now in the possession of His Britannic Majesty's forces; that the difference of construction placed upon the first article of said treaty may be satisfactorily adjusted, and its stipulations executed in good faith. We are further satisfied you will perceive the propriety of furnishing us, for the information of the proper authorities, as far as the means in your power may render it practicable, with an account of all slaves and other private property of citizens of the United States, which may have been removed from the Chesapeake, or any of the shores or islands thereof, since the date of the ratification of the treaty; and, in like manner, with an account of all artillery or other public property, if any, which was, on the date of the ratification of the said treaty, or which may still remain, within the forts or places where the same was originally captured.

We have the honor to be, &c.

THOMAS M. BAYLY,
GEORGE GRAHAM,
JOHN S. SKINNER.

Captain JOHN CLAVELLE,
Commander of His Britannic Majesty's forces, &c.

Mr. Clavelle to the American Commissioners.

GENTLEMEN: H. B. M. ship ORLANDO, IN THE PATUXENT, February 24, 1815.

In reply to your communication of yesterday's date, which I had the honor of receiving last evening, I beg to state that I do conceive the terms of the first article of the treaty of peace between His Britannic Majesty and the United States do admit of the construction I put on it yesterday in my note to you, and not at all applicable to the slaves now on Tangier island, or those on board His Britannic Majesty's ships under my command, now in the Chesapeake, they not having been captured "there." But, in order that every thing may be perfectly understood, and properly arranged hereafter, I shall be most happy to meet your wishes for the mutual satisfaction of our respective Governments, by ascertaining and taking an inventory of all slaves, and other private property of the citizens of the United States, within the waters of the Chesapeake, or on the shores or islands thereof, and now in the possession of His Britannic Majesty's forces.

I further state, for your information, that no slaves, or other private property, have been removed from the Chesapeake, or any of the shores or islands thereof, since the exchange of the ratifications of the treaty; nor has any artillery or other public property.

As soon as the weather is fine I shall proceed to Tangier for the purpose of assisting you in taking an inventory of the slaves, which I certainly cannot think of giving up until I receive instructions on that head, conceiving they do not come within the limits of the first article of the treaty.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JOHN CLAVELLE.

To the AMERICAN COMMISSIONERS, &c.

Mr. Bayly to the Secretary of State.

SIR: ACCOMAC, April 18, 1815.

Yesterday Captain Clavelle, with the Orlando and Madagascar frigates, and schooner Bream, sailed from near Tangier harbor for Bermuda. I enclose to you copies of my last letter to him, and his reply, upon the subject of the slaves and other property, public and private, which ought not to have been carried away.

I have the honor to be, &c.

THOMAS M. BAYLY.

The Hon. JAMES MONROE, Secretary of State.

SIR: ACCOMAC, April 13, 1815.

I am informed that you intend to-morrow to leave the Chesapeake bay, with the ships under your command; and I wish to know your determination respecting the restoration of the slaves and other property, public and private, which were captured from the United States and citizens thereof, during the late war, and which were in the waters of the Chesapeake, and islands thereof, on the day the ratification of the treaty of peace and amity between the United States and Great Britain was exchanged.

You have informed me of your visit to Mr. Baker, chargé d'affaires of His Britannic Majesty at Washington, and that you have received from Rear Admiral Cockburn his instructions; I may, therefore, except your final determination, and I hope that your construction upon the first article of this treaty of amity is such that the slaves and other property contemplated by it will not be carried away.

I have the honor to be, &c.

THOMAS M. BAYLY.

JOHN CLAVELLE, Esq., Commanding His Britannic Majesty's ships, &c.

SIR: H. B. M. ship ORLANDO, IN THE CHESAPEAKE, April 15, 1815.

In reply to your communication of the 13th instant, I beg to state that my determination is not to restore any slaves, private or public property, captured before the exchange of the ratifications of the treaty of peace between His Britannic Majesty and the United States, agreeably to my instructions from Rear Admiral Cockburn on that head.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JOHN CLAVELLE.

Copy of a letter from Thomas M. Newell, captain of sea-fencibles, and Thomas Spalding, to Brigadier General Floyd, dated at

SIR: SAPELO ISLAND, March 16, 1815.

We left Darien on Sunday, the 5th instant, and arrived at Dungeness at 4 o'clock on Monday. As we observed British troops embarking, and as we believed many slaves and much private property would be sent off with them, we determined to call upon Admiral Cockburn immediately, and to present the letters from General Pinkney and yourself, with our letter of authority. On reading General Pinkney's letter, and discovering that, instead of a copy of the treaty of peace from the Secretary of State's office, the National Intelligencer was enclosed, Admiral Cockburn expressed much surprise; and it appeared, from his manner, that his temper was not a little ruffled by the incident. He totally denied the authority of a treaty so communicated to him. After reminding him that the Intelligencer was the state paper of the United States for such purposes, that in England the publication of a treaty in the Gazette would be a proper promulgation of it, and the impossibility that there would be of furnishing to every detached squadron that floated upon the sea any more authentic copy of a treaty of peace than the public papers afforded—these were the ideas brought forward, and this the language, with the exception of its being abridged. Admiral Cockburn still denied our positions, but then proposed to us that we should make a transcript of the treaty; that we should certify it to be a true copy, and should present it to him as such on the part of General Pinkney and yourself. As forms were no object, we assented to this at once. The difficulty having been got over, we thought it proper to enter immediately on the subject-matter of our mission, and requested to know of Admiral Cockburn what public property taken at Point Petre or at St. Mary's remained upon Cumberland island, in the ships near Dungeness, or in the ships then lying in the sound, of which there were many; some of these ships taken at St. Mary's, and there loaded with property taken at the same place.

As we had no instructions as to the extent of the restitution we should demand, and were left to our own judgment on the occasion, we determined to adopt the same rule in regard to private property and to slaves that we had adopted in regard to public property. We therefore demanded all the slaves and private property, of every description, taken or received at Cumberland island, at St. Mary's, or St. Simon's, and which were then on Cumberland island, or lying in the waters contiguous to the same, on board his ships, or which had been there at the ratification of the treaty of peace by the President of the United States; and, in making this demand, we were happy to find that a very great portion of the public and private property, and almost all the slaves taken or received since the British forces had been operating in Georgia, came within the limits we had prescribed to our demand. To our inquiry as to public property, and our demand as to private, Admiral Cockburn at once replied, "he had no public property; that the guns he had removed; the munitions of war he had destroyed;" but if they were there, not having been taken at Cumberland island, which place alone remained in his possession at the ratification of the treaty, they did not come within the operation of the first article of it; that, with regard to slaves and other property, he meant to adopt the same rule; "that the property and slaves taken at Cumberland, and remaining there at the ratification, would be restored; but what were taken or received from other places, although on Cumberland, or in the ships in the river or sound, would not."

It will be understood that we do not here repeat the words, but the substance, of what Admiral Cockburn said, who appeared, during the whole of this conversation, a little warm. Having discovered the construction which Admiral Cockburn was pleased to put upon the treaty, and his manner forbidding a hope of a change of opinion, Mr. Spalding thought it proper to draw his attention to the ships then lying within a hundred yards of the wharf of Dungeness, on board of which it was known some slaves were, by observing to him that the river was taken possession of at the same time that Cumberland was occupied by the British forces; that it was equally in his possession with the soil adjacent on the ratification of the treaty, and would only be restored to the United States the moment he withdrew his forces from Dungeness; that, consequently, under his own rule, the property and slaves on board those ships, originally taken at Cumberland, it was expected would partake of the quality of the property and slaves originally found on Cumberland and remaining there. To this Admiral Cockburn replied, that wherever the British flag was, there was British territory; and, by way of elucidating his position, demanded of Mr. Spalding whether if he (Admiral Cockburn) committed a murder on board of those ships in time of peace, he believed him amenable to the laws of the United States? "No, sir," said he, "I am amenable to my own Government, and to my own sovereign." To this it was replied, he was amenable to his own Government and to his own sovereign as an officer, but he was amenable to the laws of the United States as a man. And it was in turn asked whether he believed, if a murder was committed on board an American ship in the river Thames, the laws of England would not operate upon the murderer? "No, sir." "I too, sir, have studied the laws of England in my youth, and I think they would." "Then, sir, we are at issue, and it is unnecessary to say more." "If we are at issue, Admiral Cockburn, upon an abstract principle, it is of little importance. Will you please to turn over to the first article of the treaty, and we will see if we can agree upon a practical result?" This conversation is reported in its very words, that you may be possessed of the admiral's manner of reasoning and mode of thinking at our arrival; and it was closed by observing that we should address a note to him, which we hoped he would answer as soon as possible; then took our leave. The next day, the 7th instant, we called upon him, and presented a transcript of the treaty, certified by us to be a true copy, which he accepted. We then handed him the following note, (No. 1,) which, after having read, he promised to answer the morning following. And here it is proper to observe, that at the meeting, and at the many that followed it, Admiral Cockburn was calm, and his manner courteous in a high degree. During the evening of this day we understood that Admiral Sir Alexander Cochrane had arrived, and, consequently, we should not receive any answer to our note until there had been a conference between Admiral Cochrane and himself. At this delay we felt no regret, as we hoped from him, from many causes not necessary to state, a more liberal construction of the treaty. The weather was so bad that it was the 10th before this communication took place, immediately after which Admiral Cockburn transmitted to us the following note, in answer to the one we had addressed him. (No. 2.)

Finding this note was approved of in the margin by Sir Alexander Cochrane, and understanding, and even knowing from our own sight, that he had taken his departure from the coast by the time we had received this note, all attempts at demonstrating the incorrectness of the conclusion drawn by Admiral Cockburn from the first article of the treaty seemed useless; for Admiral Cockburn no longer had the power, if he had the inclination, to correct his first opinion; and we presently understood that even the small return of slaves and property embraced by his construction of the treaty was yielded with some reluctance by Sir Alexander Cochrane. We, therefore, the same evening, addressed to Admiral Cockburn the note that follows. (No. 3.) And, in the conversation which took place after the delivery of this note, it was agreed that orders would be given to restore to the owners any slaves that were received in the British camp or ships after the ratification of the treaty; and, in consequence of this understanding, orders were given to restore some slaves so situated, by Admiral Cockburn; but every means were used by the inferior officers to prevent the due execution of these orders, particularly on board the Regulus, Captain Robert Ramsay, as we were informed, and as Captain Newell himself was witness to. It was at the same time indicated to us the course which would be pursued with the slaves that had repaired to the British camp or British ships, from Florida, namely: that they should be sent to Bermuda, and there confined in a ship until the decision of the British administration was taken on their case. We have deemed it proper to communicate this as not unimportant to our own Government and our own citizens.

On the morning of the 11th an answer to our note was received, covering a list of seventy-seven negroes, a few bales of cotton, and a few horses and cattle, which were to be restored, as having been originally taken at Cumberland island, and having remained there at the ratification of the treaty. (No. 4.)

In order to place the matter in a proper light, we the same day transmitted the following answer, which closed our joint correspondence with the admiral. (No. 5.)

And here it is necessary, for understanding the last clause of our letter, to state what led to it. Mr. Spalding had suggested to Admiral Cockburn, after every other means had failed, his giving permission to claimants to go on board his ships in the offing, to obtain the voluntary return of their slaves; this he assented to with great willingness. He sent an officer with them, and, in the presence of ourselves, gave the most positive instructions to the officer to have every facility afforded them. This produced a return of thirteen slaves; six of Captain Wylly's, five of Mr. Couper's, one of Major Butler's, and one of Major Johnston's; and would have produced the return of hundreds, if it had not been for the means employed by the inferior officers to prevent their return. On the morning of the 13th instant the British flag was struck at Dungeness, and, having consulted with the many respectable gentlemen with us as to the necessity of the occasion, we called upon Captain Massias for an officer and twenty-five men to be sent to Dungeness, to prevent, as far as possible, fugitive slaves still joining the British ships that were yet in the offing, and were to remain so for two or three days.

Mr. Spalding then addressed the following letter to Admiral Cockburn, and followed Captain Newell, who had already taken his departure. (No. 6.)

Having thus, sir, closed the mission with which we were charged by General Pinkney and yourself, it is important, in our opinion, that we should observe to you that, on our arrival at Dungeness, on the 6th instant, the United States' barge taken at St. Mary's was at the wharf, but was removed that evening; and we also understood that most of the cannon taken at Point Petre were removed, subsequent to the ratification of the treaty, from Cumberland. Five or six hundred negroes, brought from St. Simon's as late as the 15th February, were at Cumberland long after the ratification, and many of them sent off in the night of the day after our arrival.

In conversation with Mr. Spalding, it was admitted by Admiral Cockburn that Major Kinsman of the marines had continued to enter fugitive slaves into the colonial and West India regiments, after notice of the ratification of the treaty, and until he (Admiral Cockburn) had given written orders to the contrary.

Accompanying this letter, you will receive a list of such slaves as their masters have returned to us. From Mr. Hamilton, who lost two hundred and twenty odd, and from Major Butler, who lost one hundred and thirty, and from many others, whom the terror of the times had driven away, we have no returns. Nor is it to be wondered at that a thin population fled before a war which has been conducted in the spirit which this has been since January last; for it carried insurrection as its means, and, like the awful visitations of Providence, ruin has marked its course. But we state, sir, with pleasure, that the unhappy sufferers look with manly firmness to their own Government for a reparation of their injuries; and to that Government we beg leave to consign them, with a firm persuasion that they will not be disappointed in their expectations.

And we remain, sir, &c.

SIR: CUMBERLAND ISLAND, March 6, 1815.

We are instructed by General Floyd to call upon you, and are by him authorized to receive from you any public or private property, or any slaves, that are or were in your possession at the time of the ratification of the treaty of peace by the President of the United States. The construction put upon this article by us is, that all private property, and all slaves in your possession, whether on land or water, at the ratification of the treaty of peace, are to be restored. We place this construction upon the first article of the treaty, because it appears to have originated in the most amicable dispositions of both the American and British commissioners—amicable on the part of the American commissioners, in only demanding what might be restored without inconvenience; amicable on the part of the British commissioners, in promising to restore all that could be restored without great inconvenience; for we cannot persuade ourselves that the restoration of private property, or slaves, is to be limited to the slaves or property taken in the forts or places you occupied; for it must be obvious to you, sir, and it must be obvious to all, that there are no slaves, and that there is but little private property ever taken in forts. The limitation that appears to exist in the first part of the first article of the treaty, as to such property as may remain in the forts and places in your possession, is obviously confined to artillery and other public property taken in such forts or places, and which, if once removed, would have required much trouble and much expense to restore. And this conclusion is the more obvious, from noticing that in the following part of the same article, archives, records, deeds, and papers, which are objects of easy transport, are promised to be restored, into whosesoever hands they may have fallen, or wheresoever they may have been transferred.

Begging that we may have an answer upon this subject, so deeply interesting to the inhabitants of Georgia, as soon as possible, We remain, sir, &c.

I have had the honor to receive the document which you state yourselves authorized to assure me is a true copy of the treaty of peace that has been concluded between our respective Governments, and which you have been instructed to lay before me by Generals Pinkney and Floyd.

Accompanying this document, I am likewise honored with your note of this day, informing me of your being authorized to receive from me any public or private property, or slaves, to be restored by me under the first article of the aforesaid treaty, and explaining to me the construction you are pleased to put upon that article. But I only find in the certified copy you have laid before me that "all territory, places, or possessions taken during the war, or after the signing the treaty, (excepting only as therein excepted,) shall be restored without delay, and without causing any destruction or carrying away of the artillery or other public property originally captured in the said forts or places, and which shall remain therein upon the exchange of the ratifications of this treaty, or any slaves or other private property." It becomes, therefore, alone necessary for me to state to you, that Cumberland island being the only place or possession taken from America in this neighborhood, which was retained by me at the date of the ratification alluded to, I shall, as quickly as possible, evacuate it, without causing any destruction; and I shall leave on it, or deliver to you, whatever public or private property or slaves (originally captured here) remained upon the island at the date of the ratification.

I have not the slightest reason or inclination to doubt the amicable disposition you state to have actuated the British and American commissioners in forming this treaty. It appears, however, clear to me, by the expressions they have thought proper to adopt in it, that I am only required or authorized to make the restitution I have above stated; and I must beg to decline venturing an opinion as to whether the treaty is properly worded, according to the intentions of the commissioners; but I apprehend, had they wished to imply (as you conceive) "that all private property and slaves in my possession, whether on land or water, were to be restored," it might have been so specified without difficulty; and although you observe there are no slaves, and but little private property ever taken in "forts," yet the continuation of the words "or places" may, perhaps, do away the difficulty which presented itself to you on that point. Therefore, gentlemen, in giving up this place, in conformity with the treaty you have done me the honor to lay before me, I must beg to be excused from entering into discussion relative to captures made elsewhere on land or water, and which have been removed from the places where captured prior to the exchange of the ratifications of the treaty.

I have the honor to be, &c. G. COCKBURN, Rear Admiral.

SIR: CUMBERLAND ISLAND, March 10, 1815.

Your letter of the 7th is before us; and after the desire you have been pleased to express of declining all discussion of your construction of the first article of the treaty of peace between the United States and Great Britain, it only remains for us to call upon you for a list of the property, public or private, and the slaves "originally captured on Cumberland island," which you have declared your readiness to deliver. It is our duty to add this further and final remark, that this list will, we presume, include all slaves originally captured on the island of Cumberland, whether such slaves may have been usually resident on that island, or, having come from other sections of the country, have there first fallen under the dominion of the British arms; and, particularly, that it will include all slaves and other property taken or received since the ratification of the treaty of peace between our respective Governments. We remain, sir, &c.

GENTLEMEN: HEAD-QUARTERS, CUMBERLAND ISLAND, March 11, 1815.

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your note of the 10th current, the first part of which obliges me to beg your reconsideration of my letter of the 7th, as, I believe, so far from declining therein "all discussion of my construction of the first article of the treaty of peace lately concluded between our Governments," I have there quoted, verbatim, the major part of it, and have explicitly stated to you the line of conduct which my construction of the said article called upon me to adopt, in giving up the territory possessed by the forces under myorders.

I declined only entering into discussion respecting "captures made elsewhere, and which had been removed from the places where captured prior to the exchange of the ratifications of the treaty," such not appearing to me to come within the specified intention of the aforesaid first article of the treaty; and you will perceive, by his signature added to my letter, the commander-in-chief of His Britannic Majesty's forces on the North American station concurs with me in this opinion.

I have herewith the honor to transmit, in compliance with your request, a list of property and slaves originally captured on Cumberland island, and which appear to have remained on it at 11 P. M. of the 17th ultimo, the period at which the ratifications were exchanged.

I have the honor to be, &c.

G. COCKBURN, Rear Admiral.

To Captain NEWELL and THOMAS SPALDING, } Agents for receiving restored territory and property, &c.

A list of slaves and property to be given up with Cumberland island, in conformity with the treaty lately concluded between Great Britain and the United States.

SIR: CUMBERLAND ISLAND, March 11, 1815.

We have to acknowledge the receipt of your note of the 11th instant, containing a list of slaves and other property which had been originally found on Cumberland island, and which were remaining on the island at the ratification of the treaty of peace by the President. Against this construction of the first article of the treaty of peace we must still protest; and we must still contend, sir, that all the property and all the slaves that were on Cumberland island, or in the rivers and waters adjacent to the same, at the ratification of the treaty, in the spirit of amity in which that article was concluded, should have been restored; and this construction of the first article of the treaty was the more important to the people of the United States, as a great proportion of the property taken, and a great proportion of the slaves received, were sent from the waters of the United States, or from the island of Cumberland, as late as between the period of the 2d and the 5th of March, and no inconsiderable number of slaves have been sent on board your shipping in the offing, even since we have had the honor of addressing to you our first note, of the 7th instant. But, sir, to have pressed our construction of the treaty after your letter had been approved of by the commander-in-chief, (Sir Alexander Cochrane,) and he had retired from the station, would have been something more than useless. We have then, sir, no alternative but to prefer this affair to our Government. We cannot, however, conclude this correspondence without acknowledging the pleasure we feel at the facilities which you have offered to all claimants of slaves to obtain their voluntary return—facilities which, we are sensible, would have been productive of more effect had more time been allowed to operate.

And we are, sir, &c.

SIR: CUMBERLAND ISLAND, March 13, 1815.

It is with much regret I have to state that of the slaves which you have ordered to be restored, as having joined the British forces under your command, after the ratification of the treaty of peace by the President of the United States, several of them, now on board the Regulus, Captain Ramsey, have not been delivered. These slaves are two of Mr. Armstrong's, (January and Mary Stubs,) one of the slaves of Mr. Miller, and the four of Mr. Copp, which were yesterday directed to be given up. I have to add, that two of the three slaves delivered up to Mr. Armstrong, the very night they returned home made their escape, and will unquestionably attempt to reach your ships. I must therefore request that any of the above persons that can be found, or any other slaves that may join your fleet, from the United States, before they quit this station, may be delivered over to Captain Massias, at Point Petre, or to his officer at Dungeness.

I am, sir, respectfully, &c.

D.

Extract of a letter from Thomas Spalding, Esq. to the Secretary of State.

ST. GEORGE'S, (BERMUDA,) May, 1815.

We sailed from Savannah on the 10th of May, and arrived on the 19th at Bermuda. While I was yet doubtful whether to apply to Governor Cockburn, of the Bermudas, (as I soon understood there were but few American slaves remaining in his Government, except what were in the naval arsenal at Ireland, and under the control of the naval commander,) I received from Admiral Griffith, through a lieutenant of the British navy, an intimation that he was desirous of seeing the agent who was understood to have arrived from the United States to make some demand of slaves and property. I waited, therefore, upon the admiral on the 20th instant, and found him very sick. I presented to him General Pinkney's authority, purporting to be derived from the President of the United States. He received me politely, appeared to me to be a mild and gentlemanly man; expressed much regret at the circumstance that led to the necessity of making this demand, but declared his inability to afford any relief; confirmed to me what I had before learned, of most of the slaves having been sent to Halifax. He desired me, to-morrow, to address him in writing; that he would transmit my communication to his Government, which was all that was in his power; spoke something of giving me facilities on board of his ships to see and obtain the voluntary return of slaves. Finding that he was ill, and much exhausted, I took my leave, and promised to address him a letter as soon as I could prepare one.

Governor Sir James Cockburn arrived at St. George's on Saturday evening, and on Monday, the 22d, at an early hour, I called upon him, still undetermined in my own mind whether to make my application to him on the subject of my mission or not, until I knew, at least, that there was something in his power to grant worth asking for. I, however, as I believed it to be my duty, in the event of having something to request, presented to him General Pinkney's letter of authority. He instantly lost his temper; denied my authority contained in that letter; declared he would receive nothing from any one but the Secretary of State. After giving such explanations as I believed to comport with my duty, I found his irritation increased rather than diminished. He would not permit me to proceed to detail any of the reasons for my mission, though very ready, as he said he was bound in candor to do, to declare against the American interpretation of the first article of the treaty; and vehemently added, that he would rather Bermuda, and every man, woman, and child in it, were sunk under the sea, than surrender one slave that had sought protection under the flag of England. I could add more in this spirit, but more is not necessary. I withdrew from the Governor, and transmitted my letter, which was then ready, to the admiral, and which is enclosed. (No. 1.)

I noticed the Governor came down to the wharf within a few moments after my leaving him, and embarked in a boat. I was then apprehensive the admiral's communications would change their complexion; and this I found to be too true, as the enclosed letter, (No. 2,) which I received late on Tuesday, the 23d, will show.

No. 1.

Mr. Spalding to Rear Admiral Griffith.

SIR: ST. GEORGE'S, BERMUDA, May 22, 1815.

I am appointed by the President of the United States the agent, and instructed by him to proceed in the first place to Bermuda, and from thence to any other of the colonies of His Britannic Majesty, for the purpose of demanding the restoration of all public or private property, and particularly of all slaves, which have been taken from the United States after the ratification of the treaty, in contravention (as my Government conceives) of the first article.

It is not my desire, nor is it the desire of my Government, to enter into any discussion on the justice or policy of taking private proverty, or of receiving slaves during the continuation of the war; but that war having terminated happily for both nations, in peace, the object of that peace unquestionably is to heal the wounds that the hand of war has inflicted. To do this effectually, there must certainly be on both sides a liberal and enlightened construction of every article of the treaty; but, above all, of that article in which individual as well as national right is concerned. I will now beg leave to invite your attention to the words of the first article of the treaty; which are—

"That all territory, places, and possessions whatsoever, taken from either party during the war, or which may be taken after the signing of this treaty, excepting only the islands hereinafter mentioned, shall be restored without delay, and without causing any destruction, or carrying away any of the artillery or other public property originally captured in the said forts or places, and which shall remain therein upon the exchange of the ratifications of this treaty; or any slaves or other private property."

After a careful perusal of this article, it very naturally and forcibly occurs to the mind that this article contains two separate and distinct principles—a restoration of public property; a restitution of private property: that there is a manner of restitution liberal and enlightened; there is a manner of restitution illiberal and unfriendly, which the British commissioners, in the spirit of amity which dictated this article, were determined to guard against, by saying, "that all territory, places, and possessions, taken during the war, should be restored without delay, and without causing any destruction, or carrying away any artillery or other public property, which shall remain therein after the exchange of the ratifications of this treaty." These conditions can, from their nature, have no relation to private property; they cannot be applied to it but by a strange perversion of language, and, by being so applied, the whole quality of the article becomes changed; and instead of being liberal and friendly, becomes limited, illiberal, and unfriendly.

The Government of the United States was, therefore, greatly surprised to find that on a demand, at the Chesapeake, at Cumberland island, and in Louisiana, of public or private property, or slaves that were remaining within the limits of the United States at the ratification of the treaty of peace, the commanding officers every where adopted the extraordinary principle, that if either public or private property, or slaves, were removed a single mile from the place of capture, they were not restorable, though still within the limits of the United States; though even under the eye of the commissioners who were instructed at the several points to demand the restoration, and, in many instances, in the presence of the original proprietors, many days after the ratification of the treaty had been notified to the officers commanding. Public and private property and slaves were shipped in a period of restored peace, in many instances to the ruin of the beholders, from the limits of the United States, because, as the commanding officers said, "the property or slaves were not taken at the particular point which the British forces occupied at the moment of the ratification of the treaty." So that all that was necessary to make the first article of the treaty, as far as regarded private property or slaves, a complete nullity, as the British commanders were morally certain of receiving the earliest intimation of the contents of the treaty, they had only to draw in their outposts, and to contract their limits to points where no property and few slaves had been taken. This was conspicuously the case in Georgia. Much property was taken at St. Mary's, and some negroes; at St. Simon's some cotton and other property, and many hundred slaves; from St. Simon's the British forces were withdrawn but four days before the ratification of the treaty, and two hundred British troops occupied St. Mary's for a day and a night even after the ratification of the treaty. Yet, sir, because these two places had not remained in the uniform possession of the British forces to the very moment of the ratification, all the property and all the slaves taken at either, and placed in deposite at Cumberland, were considered without the pale of its operation. Here I flatter myself I might rest, with assurance of your according in the justice of the construction which the Government of the United States has given to the first article of the treaty, in expecting that all public or private property, or slaves, which had been taken or received by the British forces during the war, and which remained within the limits of the United States at the ratification of the treaty of peace, whether on the land or within the acknowledged waters, would be restored.

But, not to be wanting to myself, and not to be wanting to my Government, I must reluctantly trespass upon your time while I enforce the distinction I drew in the first part of my letter, between public property, to which the limitation in the first article of the treaty relates, and which enlarges and liberalizes its operation, and its application to slaves and private property, which would limit and make null its operations.

There may be, and often is, a strong motive for destroying public, when there can be none for destroying private property. It frequently happens, in surrendering territory by a treaty of peace, that the party withdrawing stipulates a right to destroy the fortifications in its possession, and to carry away or destroy the artillery and munitions of war in them; but it is believed that no example can be found of a stipulation to authorize the destruction of private property of any kind, especially slaves. Equally strange would a stipulation be not to destroy them.

The terms of the article preserve this distinction between public and private property in a guarded manner.

All territory, places, and possessions, (with a particular exception,) shall be restored, without destroying or carrying away any of the artillery or other public property, originally captured in the said forts or places, and which remain there upon the exchange of ratifications. So far, the stipulation acts upon proper subjects, and conforms to usage. Extend it to slaves and other private property, and how inconsistent and unnatural the application! Had it been intended to put slaves and other private property on the same ground with artillery and other public property, the terms "originally captured in the said forts or places, and which shall remain therein on the exchange of the ratifications of this treaty," would have followed at the end of the sentence after "slaves and other private property." In that case, both interests, the public and the private, would have been subject to the same restraint. But, by separating them from each other, and putting the restrictive words immediately after "artillery and other public property," it shows that it was intended to confine their operation to those objects only, excluding from it "slaves and other private property."

I will now close my letter to you by stating, that at the ratification of the treaty of peace, on the 17th of February, forty thousand dollars worth of cotton, tobacco, rice, other produce, and other goods, were on Cumberland island, or in the ship Countess Harcourt and others, taken at St. Mary's and in its vicinity; and that those ships lay at that time in the Cumberland river, within a short distance of the shore; that the Countess Harcourt and the ship Maria Theresa had taken refuge in His Catholic Majesty's province of East Florida; they depended upon the neutrality of their situation for protection, and made no resistance; that about seven hundred out of seven hundred and thirty negroes that joined the British forces from Georgia were on Cumberland island, or in the ships so taken and then lying in Cumberland river. The first of these negroes, excepting a few that had departed in ships of war, left the United States in the Countess Harcourt on the 19th of February; that many hundreds of them left Cumberland island on the night of the 6th of March, and after I had had myself the honor of demanding them, on the part of the United States, from Admiral Cockburn. I have not yet been furnished by my Government with a list of slaves or private property that were either at Tangier island or in Louisiana, liable to restitution under the first article; but from the public papers we are assured of the fact, and a few days will put me in possession of the necessary evidence of the property and slaves so situated. The documents in support of the facts in relation to the property and slaves from Georgia, I shall be ready at any time to present to you.

And I beg you, sir, to believe that, if in any part of this letter I have used strong language, it is far from my intention to offend, for I feel fully assured my Government rejoices at the restoration of the relations of peace, and fondly hopes that neither time nor circumstance will again alienate two nations that manners, and customs, and language, and mutual interest should unite.

I am, &c.

Admiral Griffith to Mr. Spalding.

His Majesty's ship Bulwark, Bermuda, May 23, 1815.

Sir:

I have to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 22d instant, informing me that you are appointed by the President of the United States the agent, and instructed by him to proceed, in the first place, to Bermuda, and from thence to any other of the colonies of His Britannic Majesty, for the purpose of demanding the restoration of all public or private property, and particularly of all slaves who have been taken from the United States after the ratification of the treaty, in contravention (as your Government conceives) of the first article.

Had I felt myself authorized or qualified to enter into a discussion of the several topics your letter embraces, it would, in the first place, have been my duty to call upon you to produce the authority under which you have come to these islands on a mission of this public nature; for I presume, as you state your appointment to be by the President of the United States, that the letter you put into my hand when I had the pleasure of seeing you the day before yesterday, (and which, if I recollect right, was signed "Pinkney," who you informed me was a major general in the service of the United States,) is not the only authority you are in possession of. However, sir, it is quite unnecessary to take this preliminary step, for the subject of your letter appearing to me more properly to belong to our respective Governments to discuss, than to the officers, military or naval, of either, the regular channel through which to make any applications of the nature of those alluded to in it I should suppose would be the British minister resident in the United States. Be this, however, as it may, I consider it entirely out of my province to enter into either negotiation or discussion with you on them; and the more so, from having learned, since you called upon me, that the subject of your mission to these islands had been fully discussed between Rear Admiral Cockburn (before he left the coast of Florida) and commissioners appointed by the Government of the United States; and that all persons then in possession of the British, who could possibly be considered as coming within the most liberal construction of the treaty, had been restored; and that the rear admiral's conduct and decisions had been fully approved by the late commander-in-chief, Sir Alexander Cochrane, at Cumberland island.

I shall not fail to transmit your letter to my Government; and it might, at the same time, be satisfactory for a copy of the authority under which you have come to these islands to accompany it, should you think proper to furnish me with one.

I need scarcely observe that it will be loss of time your waiting here for the documents alluded to in the last paragraph but one of your letter, or visiting any other British islands or settlements for the purposes set forth in your said letter; for I can venture to assure you that there is not any authority at either competent to deliver up persons who, during the late war, placed themselves under the protection of the British flag, or property which may have been captured during the continuance of hostilities.

I am, sir, &c.

EDWARD GRIFFITH,
Rear Admiral and Commander-in-chief.

Thomas Spalding, Esq.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Adams to the Secretary of State, dated at London, June 23, 1815.

I further observed that the British admiral stationed in the Chesapeake had declined restoring slaves that he had taken, under a construction of the first article of the treaty which the Government of the United States considered erroneous, and which I presumed this Government would likewise so consider; that a reference to the original draught of the British projet, and to an alteration proposed by us and assented to by the British plenipotentiaries, would immediately show the incorrectness of this construction. He said he thought it would be best to refer this matter to the gentlemen who were authorized to confer with us on the subject of a treaty of commerce. He asked me if Mr. Clay and Mr. Gallatin had communicated to me what had passed between them and this Government on that head. I said they had. After inquiring whether I was joined in that commission, he said that the same persons had been appointed to treat with us who had concluded with us the treaty at Ghent, and that Mr. Robinson, the vice president of the board of trade, had been added to them. They had already had some conferences with Messrs. Clay and Gallatin, and their powers were now made out and ready for them to proceed in the negotiation.

London, August 15, 1815.

Sir:

The departure of Mr. Bagot having been some time delayed, and the private accounts from the United States received here indicating the actual continuance of Indian hostilities on the Mississippi and Missouri, I have thought it my duty, by an official communication to this Government, to press for the surrender of Michilimackinac, and to apprize them that payment would be claimed for the value of the slaves carried away in contravention of the first article of the treaty of Ghent. I have the honor to enclose, herewith, a copy of my letter to Lord Castlereagh on this occasion. I had mentioned to him the subject of the slaves in my first interview, and he had then expressed an intention to refer it to the commissioners with whom we were then negotiating the commercial convention; but they received no instructions relative to it, and considered their powers as limited to the objects upon which my colleagues were authorized conjointly with me to treat.

Extract from Mr. Adams's letter to Lord Castlereagh, dated

August 9, 1815.

My Lord:

In two several conferences with your lordship, I have had the honor of mentioning the refusal of His Majesty's naval commanders, who, at the restoration of peace between the United States and Great Britain, were stationed on the American coast, to restore the slaves taken by them from their owners in the United States during the war, and then in their possession, notwithstanding the stipulation in the first article of the treaty of Ghent that such slaves should not be carried away. Presuming that you are in possession of the correspondence on this subject which has passed between the Secretary of State of the United States and Mr. Baker, it will be unnecessary for me to repeat the demonstration that the carrying away of these slaves is incompatible with the terms of the treaty. But as a reference to the documents of the negotiation at Ghent may serve to elucidate the intentions of the contracting parties, I am induced to present them to your consideration, in hopes that the minister of His Majesty, now about to depart for the United States, may be authorized to direct the restitution of the slaves conformably to the treaty, or to provide for the payment of the value of those carried away contrary to that stipulation, which, in the event of their not being restored, I am instructed by my Government to claim.

The first projet of the treaty of Ghent was offered by the American plenipotentiaries, and that part of the first article relating to slaves was therein expressed in the following manner:

"All territory, places, and possessions, without exception, taken by either party from the other during the war, or which may be taken after the signing of this treaty, shall be restored without delay, and without causing any destruction, or carrying away any artillery or other public property; or any slaves or other private property."

This projet was returned by the British plenipotentiaries with the proposal of several alterations, and, among the rest, in this part of the first article, which they proposed should be so changed as to read thus:

"All territory, places and possessions, without exception, belonging to either party, and taken by the other during the war, or which may be taken after the signing of this treaty, shall be restored without delay, and without causing any destruction, or carrying away any of the artillery or other public property, or any slaves or other private property, originally captured in the said forts or places, and which shall remain therein upon the exchange of the ratifications of this treaty."

It will be observed, that in this proposal, the words "originally captured in the said forts or places, and which shall remain therein upon the ratifications of this treaty," operated as a modification of the article as originally proposed in the American projet. Instead of stipulating that no property, public or private, artillery or slaves, should be carried away, they limited the prohibition of removal to all such property as had been originally captured in the forts and places, and should remain there at the exchange of the ratifications. They included within the limitation private as well as public property; and had the article been assented to in this form by the American plenipotentiaries, and ratified by their Government, it would have warranted the construction which the British commanders have given to the article as it was ultimately agreed to, and which it cannot admit; for, by a reference to the protocol of conference held on the 1st of December, 1814, there will be found among the alterations to the amended projet, proposed by the American plenipotentiaries, the following:

"Transpose alterations consisting of the words originally captured in the said forts or places, and which shall remain therein upon the exchange of the ratifications of this treaty, after the words public property."

"Agreed to by the British plenipotentiaries."

It thus appears that the American plenipotentiaries admitted, with regard to artillery and public property, the limitation which was proposed by the British amended projet, but that they did not assent to it with regard to slaves and private property; that, on the contrary, they asked such a transposition of the words of limitation as would leave them applicable only to artillery and public property, and would except slaves and private property from their operation altogether; that the British plenipotentiaries and Government, by this proposed transposition of the words, had full notice of the views of the other contracting party, in adhering to the generality of the prohibition to carry away slaves and private property, while acquiescing in a limitation with respect to artillery and public property. With this notice, the British Government agreed to the transposition of the words; and, accordingly, that part of the article as ratified by both Governments now stand thus:

"All territory, places, and possessions whatsoever, taken by either party from the other during the war, or which may be taken after the signing of this treaty, excepting only the islands hereinafter mentioned, shall be restored without delay, and without causing any destruction, or carrying away any of the artillery or other public property, originally captured in the said forts or places, and which shall remain therein upon the exchange of the ratifications of this treaty; or any slaves or other private property."

From this view of the stipulation, as originally proposed at the negotiation of Ghent, as subsequently modified by the proposals of the respective plenipotentiaries, and as finally agreed to by both the contracting parties, I trust it will remain evident, that, in evacuating all places within the jurisdiction of the United States, and in departing from their waters, the British commanders were bound not to carry away any slaves, or other private property of the citizens of the United States, which had been taken on their shores. Had the construction of the article itself been in any degree equivocal, this statement of the manner in which it was drawn up would have sufficed to solve every doubt of its meaning. It would also show that the British plenipotentiaries were not unaware of its purport, as understood by those of the United States, and as I am instructed to urge its execution.

AUGUST 22, 1815.

Referring then to the contents of my letter of the 9th instant to Lord Castlereagh, which he had seen, I told him [Lord Liverpool] that having expected Mr. Bagot was on the eve of his departure, I had been anxious that he might go provided with instructions which might give satisfaction to the Government of the United States with regard to the execution of two very important stipulations in the treaty of Ghent. He said that, as to the surrender of Michilimackinac, there could be no sort of difficulty. The orders for its evacuation had been long since given. It was merely the want of barracks for their troops that had occasioned a momentary delay, and he had no doubt that the fort had been before this delivered up. There never had been for a moment the intention, on the part of the British Government, to retain any place which they had stipulated to restore. But, with respect to the slaves, they certainly construed very differently from the American Government the stipulations relating to them. They thought that it applied only to the slaves in the forts and places which, having been taken during the war, were to be restored at the peace. I said that, independent of the construction of the sentence which so strongly marked the distinction between the artillery and public property, and slaves and private property, the process by which the article had been drawn up demonstrated, beyond all question, that a distinction between them was intended and understood by both parties. The first projet of the treaty had been presented by us. This had been required, and even insisted upon by the British plenipotentiaries. The article was, therefore, drawn up by us, and our intention certainly was to secure the restoration both of the public and private property, including slaves, which had been in any manner captured on shore during the war. The projet was returned to us with a limitation upon the restoration of property, whether public or private, to such as had been in the places when captured, and should remain there at the time of the evacuation. We assented to this so far as regards artillery and public property, which, by the usages of war, is liable to be taken and removed, but not with regard to private property and slaves, which we thought should, at all events, be restored, because they ought never to have been taken. We therefore proposed the transposition of the words, as stated in my letter to Lord Castlereagh. The construction upon which the British commanders have carried away the slaves would annul the whole effect of the transposition of the words. Artillery and public property had, of course, been found, and could, therefore, be restored almost or quite exclusively in the forts or places occupied by troops. But there was not, perhaps, a slave to carry away in all those which were occupied by the British when the treaty was concluded; and to confine the stipulation relating to slaves within the same limits as those agreed to with regard to public property, would reduce them to a dead letter. He said that perhaps the British plenipotentiaries had agreed to the transposition of the words there at Ghent, without referring to the Government here; and that, although the intention of the parties might be developed by reference to the course of the negotiations, yet the ultimate construction must be upon the words of the treaty as they stood. He would see Mr. Goulburn, and inquire of him how they understood this transposition; but certainly, for himself, (and he could speak for the whole Government here,) he had considered them only as promising not to carry away slaves from the places which were occupied by their forces, and which they were to evacuate. There were, perhaps, few or no slaves in the places then occupied by them, but there was a probability, at the time when the treaty was signed, that New Orleans and other parts of the southern States might be in their possession at the time of the exchange of the ratifications. If they had understood the words to imply that persons who, from whatever motive, had taken refuge under the protection of the British forces, should be delivered up to those who, to say the least, must feel unkindly towards them, and might treat them harshly, they would have objected to it. Something else (he could not say what) would have been proposed. I said I had referred to the progress of the negotiation and the protocol of conferences, only as confirming what I thought the evident purport of the words of the treaty. To speak in perfect candor, I would not undertake to say that the British plenipotentiaries had taken a view of the subject different from that of their Government; but certainly we had drawn up the article without any anticipation that New Orleans or other southern ports, not then in their possession, would, at the ratification of the treaty, be occupied by them. Our intentions were to provide that no slaves should be carried away. We had no thought of disguising or concealing those intentions.

Had the British plenipotentiaries asked of us an explanation of our proposal to transpose the words, we should certainly have given it; we evidently had an object in making the proposal, and we thought the words themselves fully disclosed it. Our object was the restoration of all property, including slaves, which, by the usages of war among civilized nations, ought not to have been taken. All private property on shore was of that description. It was entitled, by the laws of war, to exemption from capture. Slaves were private property. Lord Liverpool said that he thought they could not be considered precisely under the general denomination of private property; a table or a chair, for instance, might be taken and restored without changing its condition, but a living and human being was entitled to other considerations. I replied that the treaty had marked no such distinction; the words implicitly recognised slaves as private property in the article alluded to—"slaves or other private property." Not that I meant to deny the principle assumed by him: most certainly a living, sentient being, and still more a human being, was to be regarded in a different light from the inanimate matter of which other private property might consist. And if, on the ground of that difference, the British plenipotentiaries had objected to restore the one while consenting to restore the other, we should readily have discussed the subject; we might have accepted or objected to the proposal they would have made. But what could that proposal have been? Upon what ground could Great Britain have refused to restore them? Was it because they had been seduced away from their masters by the promises of British officers? But had they taken New Orleans, or any other southern city, would not all the slaves in it have had as much claim to the benefit of such promises as the fugitives from their masters elsewhere? How, then, could the place, if it had been taken, have been evacuated according to the treaty, without carrying away any slaves, if the pledge of such promises was to protect them from being restored to their owners? It was true, proclamations inviting slaves to desert from their masters, had been issued by British officers. We considered them as deviations from the usages of war. We believed that the British Government itself would, when the hostile passions arising from the state of war should subside, consider them in the same light; that Great Britain would then be willing to restore the property, or to indemnify the sufferers by its loss. If she felt bound to make good the promises of her officers to the slaves, she might still be willing to do an act of justice, by compensating the owners of the slaves for the property which had been irregularly taken from them. Without entering into a discussion which might have been at once unprofitable and irritating, she might consider this engagement only as a promise to pay to the owners of the slaves the value of those of them which might be carried away. Lord Liverpool manifested no dissatisfaction at these remarks, nor did he attempt to justify the proclamation to which I particularly alluded.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Adams to Mr. Monroe, dated

LONDON, September 5, 1815.

In compliance with your instructions, I have this day addressed Lord Castlereagh, claiming payment from the British Government for the slaves carried away from Cumberland island and the adjoining waters, after the ratification of the treaty of peace, and in contravention to one of the express stipulations of that treaty.

My preceding despatches, Nos. 9 and 10, will have informed you of the steps I had taken by an official letter to Lord Castlereagh, and by a personal interview with the Earl of Liverpool, in relation to this subject, previous to the receipt of your last instructions. The letter to Lord Castlereagh has hitherto remained unanswered, and Lord Liverpool made no attempt to answer either the reasoning of your letter on the subject to Mr. Baker, or the statement of the proof with regard to the meaning of the article, resulting from the manner in which it had been drawn up and agreed to. The substance of what he said was, that, in agreeing to the article as it stands, they had not been aware that it would bind them to restore the slaves whom their officers had enticed away by promises of freedom.

The case of these slaves, carried away from Cumberland, seems not even to admit of the distinction to which Mr. Baker and Lord Liverpool resorted; yet the prospect of obtaining either restoration or indemnity appears to me not more favorable in this case than in many others of the same class. If there were any probability that this Government would admit the principle of making indemnity, it would become necessary for me to remark that the list of slaves transmitted to me, and of which I have sent to Lord Castlereagh a copy, is not an authenticated document; it is, itself, merely a copy of a paper, under the simple signature of two persons, one of them an officer in the service of the United States, and the other apparently a private individual. It can scarcely be expected that the British Government, or, indeed, any other, would grant a large sum of indemnities upon evidence of this description. Neither could I feel myself prepared to bargain for the value of these slaves, according to a general conjectural estimate of their value. I have made the offer, under the full conviction that it will not be accepted. But if indemnity should ever be consented by this Government to be made, the claims are of a nature to be settled only by a board of commissioners, authorized to scrutinize, in judicial forms, the evidence in support of them. I have also thought it would give a further sanction to the claim, to advance it while offering still to this Government the alternative of restoring the slaves themselves.

Mr. Adams to Lord Castlereagh.

MY LORD: LONDON, September 5, 1815.

In the letter which I had the honor of addressing to your lordship on the 9th of August last, I stated that I had been instructed by my Government to claim the payment of the value of the slaves carried away from the United States by the British naval commanders stationed on the American coast, notwithstanding the express stipulation to the contrary in the first article of the treaty of Ghent, in the event that such slaves should not be restored to their owners.

The enclosed is a copy of a list of seven hundred and two slaves taken in the State of Georgia by the forces under the command of Rear Admiral Cockburn, and carried away after the ratification of the treaty of peace from Cumberland island, or the waters adjacent to the same, which has been transmitted to me by the Secretary of State of the United States, with a new instruction to claim the indemnity justly due to the owners, to the full value of each slave. Should His Majesty's Government now prefer to restore the slaves, who must yet be in their possession or that of their officers, it is presumed to be still practicable; but their removal having been in contravention of the express stipulation of the treaty, it is to the faith of Great Britain, pledged by that stipulation, that the United States can alone recur for indemnification to the owners for the loss of their property, if the slaves are not restored.

If it should be deemed expedient rather to make this compensation than to restore the slaves to their owners, I am authorized to enter into such arrangements as may be thought proper for ascertaining the amount of the indemnity to be made, and settling the manner in which it may be allowed.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

To the Right Hon. Lord Viscount CASTLEREAGH, &c.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Adams to Mr. Monroe, dated

LONDON, September 26, 1815.

I have not yet received any answer to either of those which I addressed to Lord Castlereagh in relation to the slaves carried away in violation of the first article of the treaty of Ghent.

Copy of a letter from Mr. Adams to Lord Bathurst.

MY LORD: 25 CHARLES STREET, WESTMINSTER, October 7, 1815.

The documents of which I have now the honor of enclosing to your lordship copies, have been transmitted to me from the Government of the United States, with instructions to apply to that of His Majesty for the restitution of the slaves referred to in them, or for indemnity to their proprietor, Raleigh W. Downman, for the loss of them. In the cases which I have heretofore presented to the consideration of His Majesty's Government, and concerning which I am yet waiting for the honor of an answer, I have deemed it sufficient to state, in support of the documents furnished, the simple fact of the taking and carrying away of the slaves, and the appeal to the plain and explicit stipulation in the treaty of Ghent, which has been thereby violated. But, in addition to these grounds of claim, it cannot escape your lordship's discernment, that in the present case there are circumstances which entitle it to peculiar regard, independent of the engagement in the treaty—these slaves having been taken and carried away by a British officer, while himself under the special and solemn protection of a flag of truce. The transaction, therefore, was in the nature of a breach of parole; marked not only with the exceptionable characters of depredation upon private property, but with the disregard of that sacred pledge of peace which is tacitly and universally understood to be given by the assumption of a flag of truce. To prescribe the restitution of property thus captured, no express stipulation could be necessary; yet the stipulation of the treaty applies likewise to the present claim in all its force. I am induced to hope it will meet with the immediate attention of His Majesty's Government.

I am happy to avail myself of the occasion to renew to your lordship the assurance of my highest consideration.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

Copy of a note from Lord Bathurst to Mr. Adams.

FOREIGN OFFICE, October 9, 1815.

Earl Bathurst presents his compliments to Mr. Adams, and has the honor to inform him that His Majesty's Government will cause immediate inquiry to be made into the case of the slaves carried away by the officer of the flag of truce, as represented in Mr. Adams's note of the 7th instant.

Lord Bathurst requests Mr. Adams will accept the assurance of his high consideration.

Copy of a letter from Mr. Adams to the Secretary of State, dated

SIR: OCTOBER 31, 1815.

I have the honor to enclose copies of two papers received from Lord Bathurst, relative to the taking and carrying away of slaves from the United States by the British naval commanders, in violation of the first article of the treaty of Ghent, and also by an abuse of the privileges allowed to a flag of truce.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

Copy of a note from Lord Bathurst to Mr. Adams, dated

FOREIGN OFFICE, October 24, 1815.

The undersigned, one of His Majesty's principal Secretaries of State, has the honor to acknowledge the receipt of Mr. Adams's letter of the 7th instant, with the documents therein contained, relating to eleven slaves, the property of Raleigh W. Downman, an American, stated to have been received on board and carried off in a flag of truce sent by Captain Barrie (when senior officer in the command of the British flotilla up the Rappahannock) to procure the release of a surgeon's assistant who had been made prisoner.

The undersigned has the honor to acquaint Mr. Adams, that Captain Barrie having been referred to, without loss of time, for such particulars as he might be enabled to give upon this subject, a statement to the following effect has been received from that officer, which the undersigned hastens to communicate to Mr. Adams.

Captain Barrie has not any documents with him to which he can refer, but he feels confident that he may trust to his memory on this occasion.

The letters marked A and B, transmitted by Mr. Adams, Captain Barrie believes to be copies of those which passed between the American commanding officer and himself.

He is certain that he never received the letter marked D, a copy of which is transmitted in Mr. Adams's letter, and has no recollection of any slaves ever having been received on board any flag of truce during the time he was intrusted with the command of the Chesapeake squadron; if such a circumstance did occur, it was without his knowledge or authority. Had such an event fallen under Captain Barrie's cognizance, he would (if the slaves had forcibly been taken from the shore) instantly have ordered them to be restored, and the officer so offending into confinement, till he could be brought to trial; if, however, the slaves had voluntarily sought British protection, and had once obtained a footing under the British colors, he should not have taken upon himself to allow them to be forced back into slavery, but should have waited the directions of the commander-in-chief. During the two winters that Captain Barrie was employed as senior officer in the Chesapeake, the slaves were constantly escaping from the shore, and joining the British ships; on these occasions their general practice was to show something to represent the white flag, and Captain Barrie thinks it not improbable (if any slaves were received on board the Franklin) that they may have escaped in the canoe, and have themselves hoisted the flag which has been sworn to.

Before the surgeon's mate was restored Admiral Cockburn had arrived in the Chesapeake; and, if the letter D had ever reached the admiral, Captain Barrie is of opinion it certainly would have been communicated to him.

Captain Barrie states that the masters of the slaves very frequently came off to the ships to claim them; on which occasions he uniformly left it to the slaves whether they would remain under British protection or return to their masters, and even allowed the masters to converse with their slaves apart from the ship's company.

The violation of a flag of truce was a very tender subject with Captain Barrie at the period in question, for he had a short time previous been engaged in correspondence with the commanding officer of the United States forces at Norfolk on want of respect paid to British flags of truce; one of his small four-oared boats, unarmed, with a large new white flag flying, having been wantonly fired on in open day, though the boat was proceeding to the place where the Americans had previously arranged that flags of truce should be received. One of Captain Barrie's men was killed when the boat was receding from the shore, with the flag of truce still flying. The boat was employed to land the servant of the Russian secretary of legation, who was on board the Dragon, waiting a passage to Europe. Captain Barrie remarks on Downman's memorial, that, till after the peace, a squadron was constantly in the Chesapeake; and that, though the Dragon had sailed, the letter D, if then in existence, could easily have been presented to the senior officers, either at Tangier island or Symhan bay. The Franklin (the vessel stated to have carried off the slaves) remained in the bay with the ship she was manned from—the Havana.

The undersigned trusts that, after a perusal of the above statement on the part of Captain Barrie, Mr. Adams will concur in the opinion that some mistake exists with respect to the conduct imputed to that officer. But the undersigned has the honor to acquaint Mr. Adams, that, in order to ascertain, as well as possible, the real state of the transaction, a communication will be made forthwith to Admiral Cockburn, for the purpose of obtaining further information upon the subject, with which he must have been acquainted, as it appears that he had arrived in the Chesapeake before the surgeon's mate was restored.

The undersigned requests Mr. Adams will accept the assurances of his highest consideration.

BATHURST.

FOREIGN OFFICE, October 24, 1815.

The undersigned, one of His Majesty's principal Secretaries of State, has had the honor to receive Mr. Adams's letters of the 9th of August and 5th of September last; the first of which recites the first article of the treaty of Ghent, and requires "that His Majesty's naval commanders, who, at the restoration of peace between the United States and Great Britain, were stationed on the American coast, should restore the slaves taken by them from their owners in the United States during the war, and then in their possession." This claim is set up in consequence of the following interpretation which is given to the first article of the said treaty by the Government of the United States, in as far as it relates to slaves and private property, namely: "That, in evacuating all places within the jurisdiction of the United States, and in departing from their waters, the British commanders were bound not to carry away any slaves, or other private property of the citizens of the United States, which had been taken upon their shores;" and it takes its origin from a different construction of the same article of the treaty by His Majesty's naval officers on the coast of America, who (according to Mr. Monroe's letter to Mr. Baker of the 1st of April) contend that "slaves and other private property are comprised under the same regulation with artillery and other public property; and that none ought, in consequence, to be restored, except such as were, at the time of the exchange of the ratifications of the treaty, in the forts and places where they were originally taken."

The arguments brought forward by the American Government in support of their understanding of the first article of the treaty of Ghent rest partly upon such collateral evidence as may be deduced from the intention of the negotiators at the time they drew up that article. The undersigned need not remind Mr. Adams of the inconvenience which would result, were the parties upon whom treaties are binding to recur to the intentions of the negotiators of such treaty, instead of taking as their guide the context of the treaty itself on any point of controversy respecting it.

The undersigned is, however, willing to waive this objection. In this instance, it would appear that the alteration in the original article proposed by the British commissioners was introduced by a verbal amendment suggested by the American plenipotentiaries. Many alterations of this kind took place, sometimes at the suggestion of one party, and sometimes of the other; but it surely is not meant to be inferred from this that a change of phrase, professedly verbal, is to be taken as necessarily denoting or importing an admitted change of construction. It is certainly possible that one party may propose an alteration with a mental reservation of some construction of his own, and that he may assent to it on a firm persuasion that the construction continues to be the same; and that, therefore, he may conciliate, and yet concede nothing by giving his assent. The proposed alteration was considered as merely verbal; no suspicion appears to have been entertained that it changed the stipulation as originally introduced; and it is not averred that the American plenipotentiaries then thought of the construction now set up by their Government. The meaning of the British negotiators is admitted to have been made quite apparent by their projet; and as nothing passed indicative of any objections to it on the part of the American commissioners, or of any departure from it by the British negotiators when the alterations were suggested by one party and acceded to by the other; and as there was no discussion on the propriety of making the restitution more extensive as to slaves and other private property than as to the other property mentioned, the undersigned cannot subscribe to the conclusions which Mr. Adams and his Government have drawn from this manner of viewing the subject. The undersigned will now proceed to examine that part of the subject which regards the construction that has been given to the context of the article in question by the Government of the United States.

By the first article of the treaty it is stipulated that "there shall be a firm and universal peace between His Britannic Majesty and the United States, and between their respective countries, territories, cities, towns, and people, of every degree, without exception of places or persons. All hostilities, both by sea and land, shall cease as soon as this treaty shall have been ratified by both parties, as hereinafter mentioned. All territory, places, and possessions whatsoever, taken by either party from the other during the war, or which may be taken after the signing of this treaty, excepting only the islands hereinafter mentioned, shall be restored without delay, and without causing any destruction, or carrying away any of the artillery or other public property originally captured in the said forts or places, and which shall remain therein upon the exchange of the ratifications of this treaty, or any slaves or other private property. And all archives, records, deeds, and papers, either of a public nature or belonging to private persons, which, in the course of the war, may have fallen into the hands of the officers of either party, shall be, as far as may be practicable, forthwith restored and delivered to the proper authorities and persons to whom they respectively belong. Such of the islands in the bay of Passamaquoddy as are claimed by both parties shall remain in the possession of the party in whose occupation they may be at the time of the exchange of the ratifications of this treaty, until the decision respecting the title to the said islands shall have been made, in conformity with the fourth article of this treaty.

"No disposition made by this treaty as to such possession of the islands and territories claimed by both parties shall in any manner whatsoever be construed to affect the right of either."

The main purport of the first article, in the former part of it, relates to the general pacification, and, in the latter part of it, to some of the direct consequences on the territorial possessions of the two countries, and the property within such possessions. As to the public property in the posts or places to be restored, it provides that, if it shall have the double condition annexed to it of having been originally captured therein, and of remaining therein when the ratifications are exchanged, then such property is to be restored, and it is not to be destroyed or carried away. It would surely have been unusual and unreasonable to have stipulated for the restitution of any property which never had belonged to the fort or place, or which had been already destroyed or carried away, so as no longer in fairness to have been considered as belonging to it; for it would seem to have no connexion with the subject-matter of that part of the article in which the stipulation concerning it must be supposed to occur. As to public property, it appears quite plain that the carrying away here spoken of is from the fort or place to which it belonged, and from no other; for the condition which is admitted to apply to that would otherwise have no application at all; and no sound reason can be given why the condition might not, in both its branches, apply as well to private as to public property, provided the construction would fairly admit of it. Both parties appear to agree as to the conditions which relate to public property. But then immediately follow, in the same sentence, the words "or any slaves or other private property;" and here the question is, whether slaves and other private property are to be restored under the same limitation provided in the same article, and in that part of it which immediately precedes the words in question, or whether they are to be restored under different provisions? In the first place, the words do not admit of, nor is it contended by either party that there is, any distinction whatever made in this article between slaves and other private property. They are incontestably placed on the same footing; and whatever stipulations in this article apply to slaves, as one description of private property, must, of necessity, apply equally to all other private property referred to in the article. The question then is, under what conditions is it stipulated that private property (slaves inclusive) is to be restored? If it be contended that, by the position of the words in this article, private property is released from all the conditions under which it is admitted that public property is to be restored, the restitution becomes in that case unconditional. But Mr. Monroe does not contend for an unconditional restitution, and, therefore, seems to admit that the stipulation respecting private property is not a new and substantial stipulation, independent of preceding words; but that the words "carrying away," which, in the preceding part of the sentence, apply to the restitution of public property, apply equally to the restitution of private property. But, if the words "carrying away" apply to private as well as public property, how entirely arbitrary it is to say that the intervening words do apply to the one, and do not apply to the other, although the words "carrying away" grammatically govern both.

Admitting, however, this arbitrary construction, still it would be more extensive than that for which Mr. Monroe contends; for, in that case, there would be no limitation assigned as to the place where the private property was originally captured, nor any limitation as to the place from whence the private property was not to be carried away. All merchant vessels, therefore, captured on the high seas, and their effects, must, according to this construction, be restored, even if they should not be within the limits of the United States at the time of the exchange of the ratifications. Neither would there be any limitation as to the time subsequent to which the carrying away is not to take place. It might be from the commencement of the war, or from the signature of the treaty, or from the exchange of the ratifications: whereas Mr. Monroe contends that the places where they had been originally captured, the places from whence they must not be carried away, and the period to which this limitation applies, are well ascertained by the first article. According to the construction of this article by the American Government, the private property in contemplation is limited to such as had been originally captured within the territories of the United States; and such property, so captured, must not be carried away after the exchange of the ratifications, nor from any place within the limits of the United States, whether this private property be at that period in American ports, or British ships of war, or British vessels. But if the first article provide for all these stipulations, one of them placing private property on the same footing as that on which, by the same, public property is placed, and the others establishing dissimilar conditions, it is impossible to look at those passages in this first article, which can alone be made to apply to such provisions, and not be at once satisfied that these limitations cannot be extracted, without such omissions and interpolations as the undersigned is persuaded that it is not the intention of the American Government to maintain. As to the application of this article to private property on shipboard, neither does the first article itself, not did any discussion respecting it, express or refer to any such restitution of property remaining in British ships of war or British vessels. There are not only no words in the article which stipulate such a provision, but there is a provision in the second article which stipulates the contrary. By the second, the conditions are stipulated on which vessels and their effects are to be restored: they are to be restored if the vessels be not captured until after a given time from the exchange of the ratifications. If the vessels were captured previous to the time limited, neither they nor their effects are to be restored, wherever such vessels with their effects may be, although they should be within the limits of the United States; yet, according to the stipulations of the second article, which have a direct application to private property on shipboard, if they have been captured within a limited time, they may be carried away at any subsequent period, without reference to the exchange of the ratifications. To Mr. Monroe's observation, that destruction, in the first article, cannot apply to slaves, it might be sufficient to answer, that the expression may certainly apply to other private property, and that the stipulations which apply to one must apply to the other; but the observation is, in truth, not material to the question at issue, because the point in dispute is not with reference to private property destroyed, but to private property carried away; which words, it is admitted, do apply to slaves and other private property. The question, then, seems to be this: Is that construction the true one which is the most simple and is grammatically correct, and was that which it is admitted one of the contracting parties intended, and against which the other did not at the time object? or is that construction to be adopted which was not at the time professed which the words of the article do not express, and which is in contravention of the article which immediately follows it?

In this alternative, the undersigned has no hesitation in communicating to Mr. Adams that the British Government is under the necessity of adhering to the construction of the disputed point in the first article of the treaty of Ghent, as set forth in this note, much as it has to regret that the construction should differ so widely from that of the Government of the United States.

The undersigned requests Mr. Adams to accept the assurances of his high consideration.

BATHURST.

It cannot be doubted that the British Government will make a just indemnity to the owners for the slaves who were carried from the United States by the British officers, in violation of the treaty of peace. The construction of the article, relating to this subject, given in my letter to Mr. Baker, and maintained with so much reason and force in your conference with Lord Liverpool, is that alone which can be admitted here. The palpable violation of the treaty by the British officers, in carrying those persons off, after the peace was proclaimed, from the presence of their owners, excited a sensibility which need not be described. A vigorous effort of the Government to obtain justice is claimed, and expected by them. Lists of the slaves taken from Cumberland island and Tangiers have already been forwarded, and lists of those taken from other parts will be forwarded when obtained.

Extract of a letter from the Secretary of State to Mr. Adams, dated

NOVEMBER 20, 1815.

It is not expected that the British Government will pay for any slaves who were carried from the United States, in violation of the treaty, of which satisfactory proof is not adduced. The proof applicable to those who were taken from Cumberland and Tangier islands will, I presume, be placed on the strongest ground; and I have no doubt that proof equally strong may be obtained of the removal of many others, who were carried off after the peace in British ships from other quarters. It is important that the principle be first established that the British Government will pay for the slaves carried off in violation of the treaty. The manner of liquidating the claims is the next point to be arranged. The mode suggested by you, the appointment of a board of commissioners, with full powers to investigate every case, is thought the most eligible—indeed, the only one that could do justice to the parties. This board ought to consist of one or more commissioners, to be appointed in equal number by each Government, and to hold its session in the United States.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Adams to the Secretary of State, dated

LONDON, February 8, 1816.

In adverting to the subject of the slaves, I reminded him [Lord Castlereagh] that there were three distinct points relating to them, which had been under discussion between the two Governments. The first, regarding the slaves carried away by the British commanders from the United States, contrary, as the American Government holds, to the express stipulation of the treaty of Ghent. After referring to the correspondence which has taken place on this topic at Washington and here, I observed that the last note concerning it, which I had received from Lord Bathurst, seemed to intimate that this Government had taken its final determination on the matter; that I hoped it was not so; I hoped they would give it further consideration; it had been the cause of so much anxiety to my Government; it was urged so constantly and so earnestly in my instructions. The language of the treaty appeared to us so clear and unequivocal; the violation of it, in carrying away the slaves, so manifest; and the losses of property occasioned to our citizens so considerable, and so serious, that I would not abandon the hope that further consideration would be given to it here, and ultimately that satisfaction would be made to the United States on this cause of complaint. Lord Castlereagh said that he had not seen the correspondence to which I referred, but that he would have it looked up, and examine it. There was, I told him, a special representation concerning eleven slaves taken from Mr. Downman by the violation of a flag of truce sent ashore by Captain Barrie. I had also received from Lord Bathurst an answer relative to this complaint, stating that it had been referred to Captain Barrie for a report, and giving the substance of that which he had made. It did not disprove any of the facts alleged by Mr. Downman; but I must remark that Captain Barrie was himself the officer who had sent the flag of truce, and who was responsible for the violation of it; and that, as a general principle, it was scarcely to be expected that satisfaction for an injury could ever be obtained, if the report of the person upon whom it was charged should be received as a conclusive answer to the complaint. He said he supposed the complaint itself was only the allegation of an individual, and that, naturally, reference must be made to the officer complained of for his answer to the charge.

I replied that the documents I had furnished copies of, in Mr. Downman's case, did not consist merely of his allegations; there were affidavits of several other persons—taken, indeed, ex parte, because they could not be taken otherwise—but they were full and strong to the points, both of the violation of the flag, and of the carrying away of the slaves. He said he did not know how they could proceed otherwise, unless the affair were of sufficient importance for the appointment of commissioners by the two Governments; but he had not seen the papers, and would look into them.

LONDON, February 17, 1816.

The note respecting the slaves carried away is a reply to that which I received from Earl Bathurst in October last, as an answer to your letter to Mr. Baker, and to my letters of the 9th August and 5th September last to Lord Castlereagh. A copy of Lord Bathurst's note was transmitted to you immediately after it was received. The determination to refuse all satisfaction for this glaring violation of the treaty appeared, by the note, to be so settled and peremptory, that I thought it would be most prudent to allow some interval of time to elapse previous to exposing all the distortion of facts and perversion of argument with which it abounded. I found, upon the conversation with Lord Castlereagh, that he had seen none of the papers which had passed on this question during his absence in France, and this circumstance has afforded a proper occasion for urging the discussion again.

Mr. Adams to the Right Honorable Lord Viscount Castlereagh, His Majesty's principal Secretary of State for the Department of Foreign Affairs.

No. 13 CRAVEN STREET, February 17, 1816.

The undersigned, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary from the United States of America, requests the attention of Lord Castlereagh to the letters which he had the honor of addressing to his lordship on the 9th of August and 5th of September last, in relation to the slaves belonging to the citizens of the United States, carried away by the naval commanders of the British forces from places within the United States subsequently to the peace between the two countries, and in violation of the engagement in the first article of the treaty of Ghent.

In pressing this subject once more upon the consideration of His Majesty's Government, the undersigned deems it necessary to state the terms of the stipulation in the treaty, and the facts in breach of it, constituting the injury for which he is instructed to ask redress from the justice and good faith of the British Government.

The stipulation of the treaty is as follows:

"All territory, places, and possessions whatsoever, taken by either party from the other during the war, or which may be taken after the signing of this treaty, excepting only the islands hereinafter mentioned, shall be restored without delay, and without causing any destruction, or carrying away any of the artillery or other public property originally captured in the said forts or places, and which shall remain therein upon the exchange of the ratifications of this treaty; or any slaves or other private property."

The facts in violation of this stipulation are, that, inevacuating sundry places within the United States which had been taken by the British forces during the war, the British naval commanders did carry away great numbers of slaves belonging to citizens of the United States. In his letter of the 5th of September the undersigned had the honor of enclosing a list of seven hundred and two slaves carried away, after the ratification of the treaty of peace, from Cumberland island and the waters adjacent, in the State of Georgia, by the forces under the command of Rear Admiral Cockburn, with the names of the slaves and those of their owners, citizens of the United States. A number, perhaps still greater, were carried away from Tangier island, in the State of Virginia, and from other places, lists of whom and of their proprietors the undersigned expects to be enabled in like manner to produce. The only foundation which these naval commanders have alleged for this procedure was a construction of the paragraph containing this stipulation, so contrary to its grammatical sense and obvious purport, that the undersigned is well assured if the same phrase had occurred in any municipal contract between individuals, no judicial tribunal in this kingdom would entertain for a moment a question upon it; a construction under which the whole operation of the words "slaves or other private property" was annihilated, by extending to them the limitation confined by the words of the treaty to artillery and public property.

In addition to the unequivocal import of the words, the undersigned, in his letter of the 9th of August, adduced the manner in which the article had been drawn up, discussed, and finally agreed upon, at the negotiation of the treaty, to prove that the intention of the parties had been conformable to the plain letter of the article. It was intimated in the answer to his two letters which he had the honor of receiving from Earl Bathurst, that some inconvenience might result if the parties upon whom treaties are binding were to recur to the intentions of the negotiators of such treaty, instead of taking as their guide the context of the treaty itself on any point of controversy respecting it. In reply to which, the undersigned observes that his letter did not recur to the intentions of the negotiators, but to the intentions of the parties to the treaty, as manifested in the process of drawing up and agreeing to the article; and not even to them instead of the context of the treaty itself, but to support and maintain the context of the treaty against what he deemed a misconstruction equally at variance with the rules of grammar and the intentions of the parties.

It is observed, in Lord Bathurst's answer, that, in this instance, the article as it stands was agreed to by a verbal amendment suggested by the American plenipotentiaries to the original article proposed by the British commissioners. Far otherwise; the original article was proposed by the American, and not by the British plenipotentiaries. The original article proposed that, in evacuating the places to be restored, no property, public or private, artillery or slaves, should be carried away. An alteration was proposed by the British plenipotentiaries, and its object was to limit the property to be restored with the places, to such as had been originally captured in the places, and should be remaining there at the time of the exchange of the ratifications. The reason alleged for this alteration applied only to public property. It might be impracticable to restore property which, though originally captured in the places, might have been removed from it before the exchange of the ratifications.

But private property, not having been subject to legitimate capture with the places, was not liable to the reason of the limitation; to which the American plenipotentiaries, therefore, assented only so far as related to artillery and public property; they did not assent to it as related to slaves and other private property. It was not a mere verbal alteration which they proposed: they adhered, in relation to slaves and other private property, to their original draught of the article, while they consented to the proposed alteration with regard to artillery and public property. To this qualified acceptance the British commissioners agreed. Nor need the undersigned remind Lord Castlereagh that the British plenipotentiaries did not sign the treaty of Ghent until this article, as finally agreed to, and every other important part of the treaty, had been submitted to the British Government itself, and received their sanction and approbation.

If Lord Bathurst had taken this which is presented as the true view of the circumstances under which the article in question was drawn up and adopted, the undersigned is persuaded that he would have been spared the necessity of adverting to the following passage of his lordship's answer, in which the undersigned trusts that some error of a copyist has left its meaning imperfectly expressed.

"It is certainly possible that one party may propose an alteration, with a mental reservation of some construction of his own, and that he may assent to it on the firm persuasion that the construction continues to be the same; and that, therefore, he may conciliate, and yet concede nothing by giving his assent."

The only sense which the undersigned can discover in this sentence, as it stands, is that a party may conciliate, and yet concede nothing, by assenting to an alteration insidiously proposed by himself. Impossible as it is that such could have been Lord Bathurst's real meaning, the undersigned is equally unwilling to believe that his lordship intended to insinuate that, in the case of the stipulation now in question, an alteration was, on the part of the United States, proposed with a mental reservation of a construction not then avowed, which was assented to by Great Britain with a firm persuasion that, under the alteration, the construction would remain the same. The undersigned must be allowed to say that there was nothing in the transaction referred to which could justify such an insinuation; that the article, as originally drawn by the American plenipotentiaries, and presented to the British Government, was plain and clear; that it admitted of no other construction than that for which the American Government now contends; that it avowedly and openly contained a stipulation that, in the evacuation of all the territories, places, and possessions to be restored, no slave should be carried away; that an alteration was proposed by the British plenipotentiaries, which was accepted only in part; that in this partial acceptance the British Government acquiesced—the undersigned will certainly not say with a mental reservation to make up, by a subsequent construction of their own, for the part to which the United States did not assent; but he does deem it his duty to say, that when Great Britain proposed an alteration to that, of the meaning of which there could be no doubt, and when the alteration was accepted conditionally, and under a modification to which she agreed, she was bound to perceive that the modification, thus insisted upon by the other party, was not a mere verbal change in the phraseology of her proposal, but, so far as it extended, a substantial adherence to the original draught of the article.

It is further urged, in Lord Bathurst's answer, that the construction contended for by the American Government is inconsistent with another article of the treaty; for that it would require the restoration of the merchant vessels, and their effects, captured on the high seas, even if they should not be within the limits of the United States at the time of the exchange of the ratifications. The undersigned is not aware how such an inference can be drawn from any thing that has passed between the two Governments on the subject. Merchant vessels and effects captured on the high seas are, by the laws of war between civilized nations, lawful prize, and, by the capture, become the property of the captors. It was never asserted by the American Government that the stipulation in question could mean that, in evacuating the places taken, within the territorial jurisdiction of either party, the other should be precluded from carrying away his own property. But as, by the same usages of civilized nations, private property is not the subject of lawful capture in war upon the land, it is perfectly clear that, in every stipulation, private property shall be respected, or that, upon the restoration of places taken during the war, it shall not be carried away; the meaning of the expressions is defined by the subject-matter to which they relate, and extends only to the property of the party from whom the place was taken, or of persons under his allegiance. But in the present case it will not be pretended that the slaves, whose removal is complained of as a breach of the compact, were the property either of His Majesty, of the naval officers in his service who carried them away, or of any of his subjects. They were the property of citizens of the United States—precisely the species of property which it was expressly stipulated should not be carried away; and, far from setting up now, as is suggested in Lord Bathurst's note, a construction not thought of when the treaty was formed, the American Government do but claim the performance of the stipulation in the only sense which could be applied to it at that time. That the British Government gave it then any other construction, was not only never communicated to the Government of the United States, but was impossible to be foreseen by them. When Great Britain had solemnly agreed, without hinting an objection, to the principle of restoring captured slaves, it could not be foreseen that the engagement would be narrowed down to nothing by a strained extension of them—of a condition limited, by the words of the treaty, to another species of property. It was impossible to anticipate a construction of an important stipulation which should annihilate its operation. It was impossible to anticipate that a stipulation not to carry away any slaves would, by the British Government, be considered as faithfully executed by British officers in carrying away all the slaves in their possession.

The undersigned concludes with the earnest hope that His Majesty's Government, reviewing the subject in the spirit of candor and of justice, will accede to the proposal which he has been instructed to offer, and make provision to indemnify the owners of slaves which were carried away in contravention to the engagement of the treaty.

He is happy to avail himself of the occasion to renew to Lord Castlereagh the assurance of his high consideration.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

LONDON, March 13, 1816.

I now enclose a copy of the note sent to Lord Castlereagh, concerning the slaves taken from Mr. Downman, by the violation of a flag of truce sent by Captain Barrie. You will have seen, by Lord Bathurst's note, a copy of which was transmitted to you immediately after it was received, that Captain Barrie disclaims all knowledge of the fact that the slaves were taken. As it appears by the documents that one of the slaves escaped from Bermuda and returned to his master, it may probably be in Mr. Downman's power to furnish many further particulars which may be of essential use in the prosecution of this inquiry, such as the name of the vessel to which they were first sent from the flag; how, and by what vessel, and when, they were afterwards sent to Bermuda, and into whose charge they were delivered there; perhaps, even the name of the officer who bore the flag; and whether Jeffery, the surgeon's mate, for whom the flag was sent, was on board the Franklin while the slaves were there; or whether they had already been sent on board another vessel before he embarked. Barrie's statement and Lord Bathurst's note seem intended to cast doubts upon the very fact of the slaves having been taken.

[N. B. A copy of the above was sent to Mr. Downman, but no answer has been received.]

Mr. Adams to the Right Honorable Lord Viscount Castlereagh, His Majesty's principal Secretary of State for the Department of Foreign Affairs.

13 CRAVEN STREET, March 12, 1816.

The undersigned, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary from the United States of America, has the honor of inviting the attention of Lord Castlereagh to a letter which, on the 7th of October last, the undersigned addressed to Earl Bathurst, in relation to eleven slaves, the property of Raleigh W. Downman, a citizen of the United States, alleged to have been taken and carried away by the violation of a flag of truce sent by Captain Barrie, commander of His Majesty's ship Dragon. With this letter were enclosed copies of Mr. Downman's memorial to the President of the United States, representing the facts, and of several other documents to substantiate them; to all which the undersigned now begs leave to refer Lord Castlereagh.

The undersigned had the honor of receiving from Lord Bathurst an answer to this letter, acquainting him that Captain Barrie himself had been immediately referred to for such particulars as he might be enabled to give upon this subject, and communicating the substance of his report upon this reference.

There are many particulars in this statement of Captain Barrie, which, appearing to have no bearing upon the special object of inquiry, and tending rather to draw the attention from it to other points of discussion, might with propriety be left unnoticed, but for the insinuations that they convey. He remarks, for instance, that, at the period in question, the violation of a flag of truce was a very tender subject with him; and he refers to a previous correspondence in which he had been engaged with the commanding officer of the United States forces at Norfolk, on want of respect paid to British flags of truce, upon occasion of one of his own having been fired upon. The undersigned might deem it sufficient to say, that this was not the subject upon which Captain Barrie was called for information. As the captain does not recollect the violation, by his own people, of the flag sent by himself, he did not mean to allege it as a retaliation upon that of which another flag sent by him had been the sufferer. Yet he avows that, if slaves, fugitives from their masters, had been received on board a flag sent by himself, he would not have restored them to their owners without an express order from his commander-in-chief: a tenderness for a flag of truce upon which the undersigned forbears to comment.

Of the particular incident asserted by Captain Barrie, the undersigned has no cognizance; but, so far as this part of that officer's narrative may be understood as intending an imputation upon American officers or the American Government, of disrespect to the sacred character of a flag, the undersigned will only remind Lord Castlereagh of the repeated offers made by the Government of the United States during the war, and by the American plenipotentiaries at the negotiation of peace, to punish every infraction of the most liberal laws of war, on their part, and to indemnify, as far as possible, every sufferer under them. It was in the power of Great Britain to have accepted these offers, on the single condition of reciprocity. The correctness of two of the documents transmitted by the undersigned to Lord Bathurst, and marked A and B, is admitted by Captain Barrie. He declares that he never received the document marked D—a circumstance acknowledged in Mr. Downman's memorial, and accounted for by the statement, that before a vessel could be procured to bear the flag with this letter, the British vessels had left the Chesapeake.

With regard to the violation of the flag of truce, and the taking and carrying away of the slaves, Captain Barrie states, in general terms, that he has no recollection of any slaves ever having been received on board any flag of truce, during the time he was intrusted with the command of the Chesapeake squadron; and that if such a circumstance did occur, it was without his knowledge or authority.

The fact of the violation of the flag, and of the taking and carrying away of the slaves, is testified in the papers transmitted to Earl Bathurst, by the depositions, upon oath, of four witnesses; and His Majesty's Government did not consider the transaction as duly investigated, or that justice had been done to the complaining party, merely because Captain Barrie had stated the fact not to be within his recollection or knowledge. It was mentioned in Lord Bathurst's note that a communication would forthwith be made to Admiral Cockburn, for the purpose of obtaining further information upon the subject, with which, it is added, he must have been acquainted, as it appears that he had arrived in the Chesapeake before the surgeon's mate was restored.

The undersigned can urge no objection to any source of information to which His Majesty's Government may deem it expedient to resort for ascertaining the facts to their own satisfaction; but he thinks it proper to suggest that there are other sources which might also tend to the elucidation of the facts. Perhaps Captain Barrie could indicate the name of the officer by whom he sent the flag. Mr. Jeffery, the surgeon's mate, whose restoration was the object of the flag, and who actually returned with it, might give some light upon the subject. The captain and officers of the Havana must be supposed to know something of the affair. But, independently of the recollection of all officers, themselves so materially and so pointedly interested in the result of the inquiry, from the documents transmitted by the undersigned, it appears that one of the slaves made his escape from the island of Bermuda, and returned to his master. Information respecting the others might, then, be easily obtained by the British Government from Bermuda. That the slaves were taken, the undersigned believes cannot admit of a doubt. How they were disposed of, is a question interesting to the solicitude which His Majesty's Government have felt upon an allegation which has been considered as implicating the character of British officers. The violation of a flag constitutes, in this instance, an aggravation which seems to call, with peculiar energy, for a complete and unequivocal investigation. The undersigned is persuaded that His Majesty's Government will feel it to be due to the complaint of the individual, to the honor of their officers, and to their own sense of justice.

He has the honor of renewing to Lord Castlereagh the assurance of his high consideration.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Adams to the Secretary of State, dated

LONDON, March 30, 1816.

I have the honor to enclose copies of a note which I have received from Lord Castlereagh, with a report from Sir George Cockburn to the Secretary of the Admiralty, Mr. Croker, concerning the taking and carrying away of Mr. Downman's slaves. You will not fail to perceive that the admiral, like Captain Barrie, disclaims all knowledge of the transaction whatever, and that the effort and tendency of both their letters is to excite doubts with regard to the truth of Mr. Downman's statement in his memorial to the President. I have no doubt it will be easy, and beg leave to suggest it may be very important to Mr. Downman, to furnish additional evidence of the facts and particulars which may lead to the disclosure how and why the transportation, in broad day, of eleven slaves, to the British squadron, and by them to Bermuda, could be effected without the knowledge of either of the British commanding officers.

FOREIGN OFFICE, March 26, 1816.

The undersigned has had the honor of receiving Mr. Adams's note of the 11th instant, respecting the slaves asserted by Mr. Downman to have been carried away from his estates by a flag of truce, contrary to the usages of war.

The undersigned has now the honor of transmitting to him a report which has been recently received from Rear Admiral Sir George Cockburn; and as soon as the further reports which the admiral has promised to make upon the arrival of Captain Hamilton at the anchorage off St. Helena shall be received, the undersigned will not fail to communicate it to Mr. Adams, being not less anxious than himself upon a case in which a flag of truce is stated to have been violated.

The undersigned begs to renew to Mr. Adams the assurance of his high consideration.

CASTLEREAGH.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, Esq., &c.

Admiral Cockburn to Mr. Croker.

SIR: NORTHUMBERLAND, ST. HELENA ROADS, February 9, 1816.

With reference to Mr. Barrie's letter (No. 15) of the 3d of November, and its enclosures, respecting certain slaves stated to have been carried away from the American shore, within the Chesapeake, by a British flag of truce, in the month of December, 1814, I lose no time in begging you to acquaint their lordships that I have no knowledge whatever of such transaction, nor is mention made of any such in my various documents of that period, though His Majesty's ships then in the Chesapeake, and on the adjacent coasts, were all acting under my immediate orders, and, consequently, made all their reports to me.

Mr. Downman's memorial to Mr. Madison induces me, however, to mention to their lordships, that, from my first entering the Chesapeake, in March, 1813, until the conclusion of the war, the said inland navigation was never left without several of His Majesty's ships; and when I quitted it in December, 1814, with a part of the squadron, I left there three frigates and two sloops under the orders of Captain Clavelle, of the Orlando, with whom communications from the land were held by means of flags of truce, from one extremity of its shores to the other, as will appear by two of the paragraphs extracted from letters I received about the same period from that officer, (herewith enclosed;) and the first paragraph will show (in reply to a part of Colonel Chawning's letter) that it was not uncustomary to trust the tender in question (which was the one attached to and manned from the Havana) up the Rappahannock river with hostile views. After the proclamation which was issued on this subject, the slaves were constantly coming, at all risks, to our ships, tenders, and boats, &c. for protection, which occasioned our squadron to be visited by Americans under flags of truce, asking the restoration of these unhappy people, under various pleas; and I cannot help thinking that, if the transactions in question had really taken place, as set forth by Mr. Downman, it would have come before me, either through Captain Clavelle, or through some other channel, previous to quitting the station, as I continued not only upon the coast, but actually on shore in America, until after the ratification of the treaty of peace, and was to the last in the habit of receiving letters on such subjects from all parts of the country, Washington not excepted.

The Havana being now upon this station, and it being possible that some of the officers and people who were in the tender may be still on board the frigate, I will, whenever she returns to this anchorage, cause Captain Hamilton to make every inquiry and report to me thereupon; and I shall not fail to transmit it to their lordships by the earliest opportunity afterwards, at which time I will also return the several papers which have been transmitted to me referring thereto.

I have the honor to be, &c.

GEORGE COCKBURN.

Extract of a letter from Mr. John Quincy Adams, Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States at London, to the Secretary of State, dated

LONDON, April 15, 1816.

Since this interview with Lord Castlereagh I have received from him a note respecting the slaves carried away from the United States after the ratification of the peace. A copy of it is enclosed. To reply to it at present would be to no purpose. I shall wait for your further instructions.

Copy of a letter from Lord Castlereagh to Mr. Adams.

APRIL 10, 1816.

The undersigned has the honor to acknowledge the receipt of Mr. Adams's note of the 17th of February, claiming, on behalf of the United States, all such slaves belonging to their citizens as had been carried away by the naval commanders of the British forces from places within the United States, subsequently to the peace between the two countries.

The grounds upon which His Majesty's Government felt themselves compelled to withhold their acquiescence in the claim of the United States, as preferred in Mr. Adams's former note of the 9th of August, have been already fully explained by Lord Bathurst in his communication of the 2d of October. It does not, therefore, appear to the undersigned to be requisite again to discuss at any length the construction of the first article of the treaty of Ghent. Agreeing entirely in the arguments urged by Earl Bathurst on this subject, the undersigned can never admit that construction of the article to be the true one which would apply to the restoration of slaves a different rule from that applicable to private property; or which, admitting that the restoration of private property, slaves inclusive, is to be subjected to some limitations, applies to it a different degree of limitation from that conveyed in the words immediately preceding.

His Majesty's Government have always been ready to admit the most liberal construction of the article in question. They have never pretended to resist the claim of the United States to indemnification for slaves or private property belonging to their citizens, which can be proved to have been in places directed to be restored by the treaty of Ghent, at the date of the exchange of the ratifications, and to have been afterwards removed. But they do, and must ever, deny that the United States can have any claim to property not actually in the places which, by the stipulations of the treaty, were to be restored at the time specified therein; because such a claim is utterly inconsistent with the provisions of the treaty, and is equally unsupported by any thing which passed in the discussion of that treaty, or even by the original projet of that treaty as offered by the American negotiators.

That projet, indeed, required that the places should be restored without carrying away any private property. If it had been, then, intended to provide for the restoration of all private property originally captured in the places, instead of prohibiting its removal, the article would have positively enjoined the restoration. What had been previously removed could not become the subject of the prohibition; for not being in the place to be restored, it could not be carried away. Under this projet, therefore, a removal previous to the ratification of the treaty was admitted to bar the claim of the United States, without reference either to the distance to which the property had been removed, to the actual state of the property, whether on shipboard or on British territory, or to the length of time which had elapsed since its removal.

The undersigned, therefore, considers it impossible to maintain that the insertion of the words "originally captured in the said places which shall remain therein upon the exchange of the ratifications of this treaty," (words which must be admitted, at least, of a restrictive nature,) can have given to the original proposition of the American plenipotentiaries a greater latitude than it originally possessed.

The undersigned trusts that the Government of the United States will, upon these considerations, not be disposed further to urge the general claim to indemnification which was the subject of Mr. Adams's former notes. Animated with a sincere disposition to act towards all Powers with the strictest justice and good faith, His Majesty's Government will be most happy to attend to any representation on the part of the United States which may have for its object the restoration or indemnification for the loss of property of her citizens actually removed from places within the territory of the United States subsequent to the ratification of the treaty of Ghent. But, at the same time, the undersigned cannot consider any property which had been, previous to the ratification of the treaty, removed on shipboard, as property forming a subject of such representation.

The undersigned begs to renew to Mr. Adams the assurances of his high consideration.

CASTLEREAGH.

Extract of a letter from the Secretary of State to Mr. Adams, dated

MAY 21, 1816.

Should the British Government persevere in its construction of the first article of the late treaty of peace, respecting slaves carried off in violation, as we presume, of its obvious import, the President is willing to refer the question to the decision of some friendly Power which you will propose. A reference is suggested, by provisions in the treaty, applicable to anticipated differences in other instances; indeed, where such differences exist, no better mode can be adopted for settling them in a satisfactory manner. In this instance the interest is too important to be neglected. It is impossible that the opinion of the British Government can be more decided than that of the United States. There is no reason, therefore, why the United States should yield to the opinion of Great Britain, more than that Great Britain should yield to that of the United States.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Adams to Lord Castlereagh, dated

SEPTEMBER 17, 1816.

"4th. Slaves carried away from the United States by British officers after the peace."

As the construction given by His Majesty's Government to the first article in the treaty of Ghent, in reference to the slaves carried away from the United States by British officers, after the ratification of the peace, is so directly at variance with the construction which the American Government think alone applicable to it, the undersigned has been further instructed to propose that this question should be submitted to the decision of some friendly sovereign. This reference is suggested by provisions in the treaty of Ghent itself, applicable to the contingency of differences in other instances; and it is conceived that when such differences exist, no better mode can be adopted for settling them in a satisfactory manner.

Viscount Castlereagh to Mr. Adams.

SIR: SEPTEMBER 28, 1816.

I very much regret that the absence from London, at this season of the year, of several of the Prince Regent's ministers will preclude me from returning as early an answer to your note of the 17th as I should wish, under the sense I entertain of the great importance of the several objects to which it invites the attention of this Government.

I have myself obtained the permission of the Prince Regent to make a short excursion to Ireland on my private affairs; but I shall certainly return to London by the middle of November, and shall lose no time, as soon after that period as my colleagues shall be reassembled, to bring the various objects referred to in your note under their deliberation.

I request you will accept the assurance of the high consideration with which I have the honor to be, &c.

CASTLEREAGH.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, Esq., &c.

No. 288.

INAUGURAL ADDRESS OF JAMES MONROE, PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

MARCH 4, 1817.

I should be destitute of feeling, if I was not deeply affected by the strong proof which my fellow-citizens have given me of their confidence, in calling me to the high office whose functions I am about to assume. As the expression of their good opinion of my conduct in the public service, I derive from it a gratification which those who are conscious of having done all that they could to merit it can alone feel. My sensibility is increased by a just estimate of the importance of the trust, and of the nature and extent of its duties, with the proper discharge of which the highest interests of a great and free people are intimately connected. Conscious of my own deficiency, I cannot enter on these duties without great anxiety for the result. From a just responsibility I will never shrink; calculating, with confidence, that, in my best efforts to promote the public welfare, my motives will always be duly appreciated, and my conduct be viewed with that candor and indulgence which I have experienced in other stations.

In commencing the duties of the chief executive office, it has been the practice of the distinguished men who have gone before me to explain the principles which would govern them in their respective administrations. In following their venerated example, my attention is naturally drawn to the great causes which have contributed, in a principal degree, to produce the present happy condition of the United States. They will best explain the nature of our duties, and shed much light on the policy which ought to be pursued in future.

From the commencement of our revolution to the present day almost forty years have elapsed, and from the establishment of this constitution twenty-eight. Through this whole term the Government has been what may emphatically be called self-government; and what has been the effect? To whatever object we turn our attention, whether it relates to our foreign or domestic concerns, we find abundant cause to felicitate ourselves in the excellence of our institutions. During a period fraught with difficulties, and marked by very extraordinary events, the United States have flourished beyond example. Their citizens, individually, have been happy, and the nation prosperous.

Under this constitution our commerce has been wisely regulated with foreign nations, and between the States; new States have been admitted into our Union; our territory has been enlarged, by fair and honorable treaty, and with great advantage to the original States; the States, respectively, protected by the National Government, under a mild parental system, against foreign dangers, and enjoying within their separate spheres, by a wise partition of power, a just proportion of the sovereignty, have improved their police, extended their settlements, and attained a strength and maturity, which are the best proofs of wholesome laws well administered. And if we look to the condition of individuals, what a proud spectacle does it exhibit! On whom has oppression fallen in any quarter of our Union? Who has been deprived of any right of person or property? Who restrained from offering his vows, in the mode which he prefers, to the Divine Author of his being? It is well known that all these blessings have been enjoyed in their fullest extent; and I add, with peculiar satisfaction, that there has been no example of a capital punishment being inflicted on any one for the crime of high treason.

Some, who might admit the competency of our Government to these beneficent duties, might doubt it in trials which put to the test its strength and efficiency as a member of the great community of nations. Here, too, experience has afforded us the most satisfactory proof in its favor. Just as this constitution was put into action, several of the principal States of Europe had become much agitated, and some of them seriously convulsed. Destructive wars ensued, which have of late only been terminated. In the course of these conflicts the United States received great injury from several of the parties. It was their interest to stand aloof from the contest; to demand justice from the party committing the injury; and to cultivate, by a fair and honorable conduct, the friendship of all. War became at length inevitable, and the result has shown that our Government is equal to that, the greatest of trials, under the most unfavorable circumstances. Of the virtue of the people, and of the heroic exploits of the army, the navy, and the militia, I need not speak.

Such, then, is the happy Government under which we live; a Government adequate to every purpose for which the social compact is formed; a Government elective in all its branches, under which every citizen may, by his merit, obtain the highest trust recognised by the constitution; which contains within it no cause of discord; none to put at variance one portion of the community with another; a Government which protects every citizen in the full enjoyment of his rights, and is able to protect the nation against injustice from foreign Powers.

Other considerations of the highest importance admonish us to cherish our union, and to cling to the Government which supports it. Fortunate, as we are, in our political institutions, we have not been less so in other circumstances, on which our prosperity and happiness essentially depend. Situated within the temperate zone, and extending through many degrees of latitude along the Atlantic, the United States enjoy all the varieties of climate, and every production incident to that portion of the globe. Penetrating, internally, to the great lakes, and beyond the sources of the great rivers which communicate through our whole interior, no country was ever happier with respect to its domain. Blessed, too, with a fertile soil, our produce has always been very abundant, leaving, even in years the least favorable, a surplus for the wants of our fellow-men in other countries. Such is our peculiar felicity, that there is not a part of our Union that is not particularly interested in preserving it. The great agricultural interest of the nation prospers under its protection. Local interests are not less fostered by it. Our fellow-citizens of the north, engaged in navigation, find great encouragement in being made the favored carriers of the vast productions of the other portions of the United States; while the inhabitants of these are amply recompensed, in their turn, by the nursery for seamen and naval force thus formed and reared up for the support of our common rights. Our manufactures find a generous encouragement, by the policy which patronises domestic industry, and the surplus of our produce a steady and profitable market, by local wants in less favored parts, at home.

Such, then, being the highly favored condition of our country, it is the interest of every citizen to maintain it. What are the dangers which menace us? If any exist, they ought to be ascertained and guarded against.

In explaining my sentiments on this subject, it may be asked, what raised us to the present happy state? How did we accomplish the revolution? How remedy the defects of the first instrument of our Union, by diffusing into the National Government sufficient power for national purposes, without impairing the just rights of the States, or affecting those of individuals? How sustain and pass with glory through the late war? The Government has been in the hands of the people. To the people, therefore, and to the faithful and able depositaries of their trust, is the credit due. Had the people of the United States been educated in different principles; had they been less intelligent, less independent, or less virtuous, can it be believed that we should have maintained the same steady and consistent career, or been blessed with the same success? While, then, the constituent body retains its present sound and healthful state, every thing will be safe. They will choose competent and faithful representatives for every department. It is only when the people become ignorant and corrupt, when they degenerate into a populace, that they are incapable of exercising the sovereignty. Usurpation is then an easy attainment, and a usurper soon found. The people themselves become the willing instruments of their own debasement and ruin. Let us, then, look to the great cause, and endeavor to preserve it in full force. Let us, by all wise and constitutional measures, promote intelligence among the people, as the best means of preserving our liberties.

Dangers from abroad are not less deserving of attention. Experiencing the fortune of other nations, the United States may be again involved in war, and it may, in that event, be the object of the adverse party to overset our Government, to break our Union, and demolish us as a nation. Our distance from Europe, and the just, moderate, and pacific policy of our Government, may form some security against these dangers; but they ought to be anticipated and guarded against. Many of our citizens are engaged in commerce and navigation, and all of them are, in a certain degree, dependant on their prosperous state. Many are engaged in the fisheries. These interests are exposed to invasion in the wars between other Powers, and we should disregard the faithful admonition of experience if we did not expect it. We must support our rights, or lose our character, and with it, perhaps, our liberties. A people who fail to do it, can scarcely be said to hold a place among independent nations. National honor is national property of the highest value. The sentiment in the mind of every citizen is national strength; it ought, therefore, to be cherished.

To secure us against these dangers, our coast and inland frontiers should be fortified; our army and navy, regulated upon just principles as to the force of each, be kept in perfect order; and our militia be placed on the best practicable footing. To put our extensive coast in such a state of defence as to secure our cities and interior from invasion will be attended with expense, but the work, when finished, will be permanent; and it is fair to presume that a single campaign of invasion, by a naval force superior to our own, aided by a few thousand land troops, would expose us to greater expense, without taking into the estimate the loss of property and distress of our citizens, than would be sufficient for this great work. Our land and naval forces should be moderate, but adequate to the necessary purposes: the former, to garrison and preserve our fortifications, and to meet the first invasions of a foreign foe, and, while constituting the elements of a greater force, to preserve the science as well as all the necessary implements of war in a state to be brought into activity in the event of war; the latter, retained within the limits proper in a state of peace, might aid in maintaining the neutrality of the United States with dignity in the wars of other Powers, and in saving the property of their citizens from spoliation. In time of war, with the enlargement of which the great naval resources of the country render it susceptible, and which should be duly fostered in time of peace, it would contribute essentially, both as an auxiliary of defence and as a powerful engine of annoyance, to diminish the calamities of war, and to bring the war to a speedy and honorable termination.

But it ought always to be held prominently in view, that the safety of these States, and of every thing dear to a free people, must depend in an eminent degree on the militia. Invasions may be made too formidable to be resisted by any land and naval force which it would comport either with the principles of our Government or the circumstances of the United States to maintain. In such cases, recourse must be had to the great body of the people, and in a manner to produce the best effect. It is of the highest importance, therefore, that they be so organized and trained as to be prepared for any emergency. The arrangement should be such as to put at the command of the Government the ardent patriotism and youthful vigor of the country. If formed on equal and just principles, it cannot be oppressive. It is the crisis which makes the pressure, and not the laws, which provide a remedy for it. This arrangement should be formed, too, in time of peace, to be the better prepared for war. With such an organization of such a people, the United States have nothing to dread from foreign invasion. At its approach, an overwhelming force of gallant men might always be put in motion.

Other interests, of high importance, will claim attention; among which the improvement of our country by roads and canals, proceeding always with a constitutional sanction, holds a distinguished place. By thus facilitating the intercourse between the States, we shall add much to the convenience and comfort of our fellow-citizens; much to the ornament of the country; and, what is of greater importance, we shall shorten distances, and, by making each part more accessible to and dependant on the other, we shall bind the Union more closely together. Nature has done so much for us by intersecting the country with so many great rivers, bays, and lakes, approaching from distant points so near to each other, that the inducement to complete the work seems to be peculiarly strong. A more interesting spectacle was perhaps never seen than is exhibited within the limits of the United States—a territory so vast and advantageously situated, containing objects so grand, so useful, so happily connected in all their parts.

Our manufactures will likewise require the systematic and fostering care of the Government. Possessing, as we do, all the raw materials, the fruit of our own soil and industry, we ought not to depend, in the degree we have done, on supplies from other countries. While we are thus dependant, the sudden event of war, unsought and unexpected, cannot fail to plunge us into the most serious difficulties. It is important, too, that the capital which nourishes our manufactures should be domestic, as its influence in that case, instead of exhausting, as it may do in foreign hands, would be felt advantageously on agriculture and every other branch of industry. Equally important is it to provide at home a market for our raw materials, as, by extending the competition, it will enhance the price, and protect the cultivator against the casualties incident to foreign markets.

With the Indian tribes it is our duty to cultivate friendly relations, and to act with kindness and liberality in all our transactions. Equally proper is it to persevere in our efforts to extend to them the advantages of civilization.

The great amount of our revenue, and the flourishing state of the treasury, are a full proof of the competency of the national resources for any emergency, as they are of the willingness of our fellow-citizens to bear the burdens which the public necessities require. The vast amount of vacant lands, the value of which daily augments, forms an additional resource of great extent and duration. These resources, besides accomplishing every other necessary purpose, put it completely in the power of the United States to discharge the national debt at an early period. Peace is the best time for improvement and preparation of every kind; it is in peace that our commerce flourishes most, that taxes are most easily paid, and that the revenue is most productive.

The Executive is charged, officially, in the departments under it, with the disbursement of the public money, and is responsible for the faithful application of it to the purposes for which it is raised. The Legislature is the watchful guardian over the public purse. It is its duty to see that the disbursement has been honestly made. To meet the requisite responsibility, every facility should be afforded to the Executive to enable it to bring the public agents intrusted with the public money strictly and promptly to account. Nothing should be presumed against them; but if, with the requisite facilities, the public money is suffered to lie long and uselessly in their hands, they will not be the only defaulters, nor will the demoralizing effect be confined to them. It will evince a relaxation and want of tone in the administration, which will be felt by the whole community. I shall do all I can to secure economy and fidelity in this important branch of the administration, and I doubt not that the Legislature will perform its duty with equal zeal. A thorough examination should be regularly made, and I will promote it.

It is particularly gratifying to me to enter on the discharge of these duties at a time when the United States are blessed with peace. It is a state most consistent with their prosperity and happiness. It will be my sincere desire to preserve it, so far as depends on the Executive, on just principles, with all nations—claiming nothing unreasonable of any, and rendering to each what is its due.

Equally gratifying is it to witness the increased harmony of opinion which pervades our Union. Discord does not belong to our system. Union is recommended, as well by the free and benign principles of our Government, extending its blessings to every individual, as by the other eminent advantages attending it. The American people have encountered together great dangers, and sustained severe trials with success. They constitute one great family, with a common interest. Experience has enlightened us on some questions of essential inportance to the country. The progress has been slow, dictated by a just reflection, and a faithful regard to every interest connected with it. To promote this harmony, in accord with the principles of our republican Government, and in a manner to give them the most complete effect, and to advance in all other respects the best interests of our Union, will be the object of my constant and zealous exertions.

Never did a Government commence under auspices so favorable, nor ever was success so complete. If we look to the history of other nations, ancient or modern, we find no example of a growth so rapid—so gigantic; of a people so prosperous and happy. In contemplating what we have still to perform, the heart of every citizen must expand with joy when he reflects how near our Government has approached to perfection; that, in respect to it, we have no essential improvement to make; that the great object is, to preserve it in the essential principles and features which characterize it, and that that is to be done by preserving the virtue and enlightening the minds of the people; and, as a security against foreign dangers, to adopt such arrangements as are indispensable to the support of our independence, our rights, and liberties. If we persevere in the career in which we have advanced so far, and in the path already traced, we cannot fail, under the favor of a gracious Providence, to attain the high destiny which seems to await us.

In the administrations of the illustrious men who have preceded me in this high station, with some of whom I have been connected by the closest ties from early life, examples are presented which will always be found highly instructive and useful to their successors. From these I shall endeavor to derive all the advantages which they may afford. Of my immediate predecessor, under whom so important a portion of this great and successful experiment has been made, I shall be pardoned for expressing my earnest wishes that he may long enjoy, in his retirement, the affections of a grateful country—the best reward of exalted talents and the most faithful and meritorious services. Relying on the aid to be derived from the other departments of the Government, I enter on the trust to which I have been called by the suffrages of my fellow-citizens, with my fervent prayers to the Almighty that he will be graciously pleased to continue to us that protection which he has already so conspicuously displayed in our favor.

JAMES MONROE.

15th Congress.] No. 289. [1st Session.

MESSAGE OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES AT THE COMMENCEMENT OF THE FIRST SESSION OF THE FIFTEENTH CONGRESS.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, DECEMBER 2, 1817.

Fellow-citizens of the Senate and of the House of Representatives: DECEMBER 2, 1817.

At no period of our political existence had we so much cause to felicitate ourselves at the prosperous and happy condition of our country. The abundant fruits of the earth have filled it with plenty. An extensive and profitable commerce has greatly augmented our revenue. The public credit has attained an extraordinary elevation. Our preparations for defence, in case of future wars, from which, by the experience of all nations we ought not to expect to be exempted, are advancing, under a well-digested system, with all the despatch which so important a work will admit. Our free Government, founded on the interest and affections of the people, has gained, and is daily gaining, strength. Local jealousies are rapidly yielding to more generous, enlarged, and enlightened views of national policy. For advantages so numerous and highly important, it is our duty to unite in grateful acknowledgments to that Omnipotent Being from whom they are derived, and in unceasing prayer that he will endow us with virtue and strength to maintain and hand them down, in their utmost purity, to our latest posterity.

I have the satisfaction to inform you that an arrangement, which had been commenced by my predecessor, with the British Government, for the reduction of the naval force, by Great Britain and the United States, on the lakes, has been concluded; by which it is provided that neither party shall keep in service on Lake Champlain more than one vessel; on Lake Ontario, more than one; and on Lake Erie, and the upper lakes, more than two; to be armed each with one cannon only; and that all the other armed vessels, of both parties, of which an exact list is interchanged, shall be dismantled. It also agreed that the force retained shall be restricted, in its duty, to the internal purposes of each party; and that the arrangement shall remain in force until six months shall have expired, after notice given by one of the parties to the other of its desire that it should terminate. By this arrangement, useless expense on both sides, and, what is of still greater importance, the danger of collision between armed vessels in those inland waters, which was great, is prevented. I have the satisfaction also to state that the commissioners under the fourth article of the treaty of Ghent, to whom it was referred to decide to which party the several islands in the bay of Passamaquoddy belonged, under the treaty of one thousand seven hundred and eighty-three, have agreed in a report, by which all the islands in the possession of each party before the late war have been decreed to it. The commissioners acting under the other articles of the treaty of Ghent for the settlement of boundaries, have also been engaged in the discharge of their respective duties, but have not yet completed them. The difference which arose between the two Governments under that treaty, respecting the right of the United States to take and cure fish on the coast of the British provinces north of our limits, which had been secured by the treaty of 1783, is still in negotiation. The proposition made by this Government, to extend to the colonies of Great Britain the principle of the convention of London, by which the commerce between the ports of the United States and British ports in Europe had been placed on a footing of equality, has been declined by the British Government. This subject having been thus amicably discussed between the two Governments, and it appearing that the British Government is unwilling to depart from its present regulations, it remains for Congress to decide whether they will make any other regulations, in consequence thereof, for the protection and improvement of our navigation.

The negotiation with Spain, for spoliations on our commerce and the settlement of boundaries, remains essentially in the state it held by the communications that were made to Congress by my predecessor. It has been evidently the policy of the Spanish Government to keep the negotiation suspended; and in this the United States have acquiesced, from an amicable disposition towards Spain, and in the expectation that her Government would, from a sense of justice, finally accede to such an arrangement as would be equal between the parties. A disposition has been lately shown by the Spanish Government to move in the negotiation, which has been met by this Government; and, should the conciliatory and friendly policy which has invariably guided our councils be reciprocated, a just and satisfactory arrangement may be expected. It is proper, however, to remark that no proposition has yet been made from which such a result can be presumed.

It was anticipated at an early stage that the contest between Spain and the colonies would become highly interesting to the United States. It was natural that our citizens should sympathize in events which affected their neighbors. It seemed probable, also, that the prosecution of the conflict along our coast, and in contiguous countries, would occasionally interrupt our commerce, and otherwise affect the persons and property of our citizens. These anticipations have been realized. Such injuries have been received from persons acting under the authority of both the parties, and for which redress has, in most instances, been withheld. Through every stage of the conflict the United States have maintained an impartial neutrality, giving aid to neither of the parties in men, money, ships, or munitions of war. They have regarded the contest, not in the light of an ordinary insurrection or rebellion, but as a civil war between parties nearly equal, having, as to neutral Powers, equal rights. Our ports have been open to both; and every article, the fruit of our soil, or of the industry of our citizens, which either was permitted to take, has been equally free to the other. Should the colonies establish their independence, it is proper now to state that this Government neither seeks nor would accept from them any advantage in commerce or otherwise which will not be equally open to all other nations. The colonies will, in that event, become independent States, free from any obligation to or connexion with us, which it may not then be their interest to form on the basis of a fair reciprocity.

In the summer of the present year, an expedition was set on foot against East Florida, by persons claiming to act under the authority of some of the colonies, who took possession of Amelia island, at the mouth of the St. Mary's river, near the boundary of the State of Georgia. As this province lies eastward of the Mississippi, and is bounded by the United States and the ocean on every side, and has been a subject of negotiation with the Government of Spain as an indemnity for losses by spoliation, or in exchange for territory of equal value westward of the Mississippi, (a fact well known to the world,) it excited surprise that any countenance should be given to this measure by any of the colonies. As it would be difficult to reconcile it with the friendly relations existing between the United States and the colonies, a doubt was entertained whether it had been authorized by them, or any of them. This doubt has gained strength, by the circumstances which have unfolded themselves in the prosecution of the enterprise, which have marked it as a mere private, unauthorized adventure. Projected and commenced with an incompetent force, reliance seems to have been placed on what might be drawn, in defiance of our laws, from within our limits; and of late, as their resources have failed, it has assumed a more marked character of unfriendliness to us; the island being made a channel for the illicit introduction of slaves from Africa into the United States, an asylum for fugitive slaves from the neighboring States, and a port for smuggling of every kind.

A similar establishment was made, at an earlier period, by persons of the same description in the Gulf of Mexico, at a place called Galvezton, within the limits of the United States, as we contend, under the cession of Louisiana. This enterprise has been marked, in a more signal manner, by all the objectionable circumstances which characterized the other, and more particularly by the equipment of privateers which have annoyed our commerce, and by smuggling. These establishments, if ever sanctioned by any authority whatever, which is not believed, have abused their trust, and forfeited all claim to consideration. A just regard for the rights and interests of the United States required that they should be suppressed, and orders have been accordingly issued to that effect. The imperious considerations which produced this measure will be explained to the parties whom it may in any degree concern.

To obtain correct information on every subject in which the United States are interested, to inspire just sentiments in all persons in authority, on either side, of our friendly disposition, so far as it may comport with an impartial neutrality, and to secure proper respect to our commerce in every port, and from every flag, it has been thought proper to send a ship of war, with three distinguished citizens, along the southern coast, with instruction to touch at such ports as they may find most expedient for these purposes. With the existing authorities, with those in the possession of and exercising the sovereignty, must the communication be held; from them alone can redress for past injuries, committed by those persons acting under them, be obtained; by them alone can the commission of the like, in future, be prevented.

Our relations with the other Powers of Europe have experienced no essential change since the last session. In our intercourse with each, due attention continues to be paid to the protection of our commerce, and to every other object in which the United States are interested. A strong hope is entertained, that, by adhering to the maxims of a just, a candid, and friendly policy, we may long preserve amicable relations with all the Powers of Europe, on conditions advantageous and honorable to our country.

With the Barbary States and the Indian tribes our pacific relations have been preserved.

In calling your attention to the internal concerns of our country, the view which they exhibit is peculiarly gratifying. The payments which have been made into the treasury show the very productive state of the public revenue. After satisfying the appropriations made by law for the support of the civil Government, and of the military and naval establishments, embracing suitable provision for fortifications, and for the gradual increase of the navy, paying the interest of the public debt, and extinguishing more than eighteen millions of the principal within the present year, it is estimated that a balance of more than six millions of dollars will remain in the treasury on the 1st day of January next, applicable to the current service of the ensuing year. The payments into the treasury during the year 1818, on account of imposts and tonnage, resulting principally from duties which have accrued in the present year, may be fairly estimated at twenty millions; internal revenues, at two millions five hundred thousand; public lands, at one million five hundred thousand; bank dividends and incidental receipts, at five hundred thousand; making, in the whole, twenty-four millions five hundred thousand dollars.

The annual permanent expenditure for the support of the civil Government, and of the army and navy as now established by law, amounts to eleven millions eight hundred thousand dollars, and for the sinking fund to ten millions; making, in the whole, twenty-one millions eight hundred thousand; leaving an annual excess of revenue beyond the expenditure of two millions seven hundred thousand dollars, exclusive of the balance estimated to be in the treasury on the 1st day of January, 1818.

In the present state of the treasury, the whole of the Louisiana debt may be redeemed in the year 1819; after which, if the public debt continues as it now is, above par, there will be annually about five millions of the sinking fund unexpended until the year 1825, when the loan of 1812 and the stock created by funding treasury notes will be redeemable.

It is also estimated that the Mississippi stock will be discharged during the year 1819, from the proceeds of the public lands assigned to that object; after which the receipts from those lands will annually add to the public revenue the sum of one million five hundred thousand dollars; making the permanent annual revenue amount to twenty-six millions, and leaving an annual excess of revenue, after the year 1819, beyond the permanent authorized expenditure, of more than four millions of dollars.

By the late returns of the Department of War, the militia force of the several States may be estimated at eight hundred thousand men, infantry, artillery, and cavalry. Great part of this force is armed, and measures are taken to arm the whole. An improvement in the organization and discipline of the militia is one of the great objects which claim the unremitted attention of Congress.

The regular force amounts nearly to the number required by law, and is stationed along the Atlantic and inland frontiers.

Of the naval force, it has been necessary to maintain strong squadrons in the Mediterranean and in the Gulf of Mexico.

From several of the Indian tribes, inhabiting the country bordering on Lake Erie, purchases have been made of lands, on conditions very favorable to the United States, and, as it is presumed, not less so to the tribes themselves. By these purchases the Indian title, with moderate reservations, has been extinguished to the whole of the land within the limits of the State of Ohio, and to a part of that in the Michigan Territory and of the State of Indiana. From the Cherokee tribe a tract has been purchased in the State of Georgia, and an arrangement made by which, in exchange for lands beyond the Mississippi, a great part, if not the whole of the land belonging to that tribe eastward of that river, in the States of North Carolina, Georgia, and Tennessee, and in the Alabama Territory, will soon be acquired. By these acquisitions, and others that may reasonably be expected soon to follow, we shall be enabled to extend our settlements from the inhabited parts of the State of Ohio, along Lake Erie, into the Michigan Territory, and to connect our settlements, by degrees, through the State of Indiana and the Illinois Territory, to that of Missouri. A similar and equally advantageous effect will soon be produced to the south, through the whole extent of the States and territory which border on the waters emptying into the Mississippi and the Mobile. In this progress, which the rights of nature demand and nothing can prevent, marking a growth rapid and gigantic, it is our duty to make new efforts for the preservation, improvement, and civilization of the native inhabitants. The hunter state can exist only in the vast uncultivated desert. It yields to the more dense and compact form, and greater force of civilized population; and, of right, it ought to yield, for the earth was given to mankind to support the greatest number of which it is capable, and no tribe or people have a right to withhold from the wants of others more than is necessary for their own support and comfort. It is gratifying to know that the reservations of land made by the treaties with the tribes on Lake Erie were made with a view to individual ownership among them, and to the cultivation of the soil by all, and that an annual stipend has been pledged to supply their other wants. It will merit the consideration of Congress whether other provisions, not stipulated by treaty, ought to be made for these tribes, and for the advancement of the liberal and humane policy of the United States towards all the tribes within our limits, and more particularly for their improvement in the arts of civilized life.

Among the advantages incident to these purchases, and to those which have preceded, the security which may thereby be afforded to our inland frontiers is peculiarly important. With a strong barrier, consisting of our own people thus planted on the lakes, the Mississippi, and the Mobile, with the protection to be derived from the regular forces, Indian hostilities, if they do not altogether cease, will henceforth lose their terror. Fortifications in those quarters, to any extent, will not be necessary, and the expense attending them may be saved. A people accustomed to the use of fire-arms only, as the Indian tribes are, will shun even moderate works which are defended by cannon. Great fortifications will, therefore, be requisite only in future along the coast, and at some points in the interior connected with it. On these will the safety of our towns, and the commerce of our great rivers, from the Bay of Fundy to the Mississippi, depend. On these, therefore, should the utmost attention, skill, and labor be bestowed.

A considerable and rapid augmentation in the value of all the public lands, proceeding from these and other obvious causes, may henceforward be expected. The difficulties attending early emigrations will be dissipated even in the most remote parts. Several new States have been admitted into our Union to the west and south, and Territorial Governments, happily organized, established over every other portion in which there is vacant land for sale. In terminating Indian hostilities, as must soon be done in a formidable shape at least, the emigration, which has heretofore been great, will probably increase, and the demand for land and the augmentation in its value be in like proportion. The great increase of our population throughout the Union will alone produce an important effect, and in no quarter will it be so sensibly felt as in those in contemplation. The public lands are a public stock, which ought to be disposed of to the best advantage for the nation. The nation should, therefore, derive the profit proceeding from the continual rise in their value. Every encouragement should be given to the emigrants, consistent with a fair competition between them; but that competition should operate in the first sale to the advantage of the nation rather than of individuals. Great capitalists will derive all the benefit incident to their superior wealth, under any mode of sale which may be adopted; but if, looking forward to the rise in the value of the public lands, they should have the opportunity of amassing, at a low price, vast bodies in their hands, the profit will accrue to them and not to the public. They would also have the power, in that degree, to control the emigration and settlement in such manner as their opinion of their respective interests might dictate. I submit this subject to the consideration of Congress, that such further provision may be made in the sale of the public lands, with a view to the public interest, should any be deemed expedient, as in their judgment may be best adapted to the object.

When we consider the vast extent of territory within the United States, the great amount and value of its productions, the connexion of its parts, and other circumstances on which their prosperity and happiness depend, we cannot fail to entertain a high sense of the advantage to be derived from the facility which may be afforded in the intercourse between them by means of good roads and canals. Never did a country of such vast extent offer equal inducements to improvements of this kind, nor ever were consequences of such magnitude involved in them. As this subject was acted on by Congress at the last session, and there may be a disposition to revive it at the present, I have brought it into view, for the purpose of communicating my sentiments on a very important circumstance connected with it, with that freedom and candor which a regard for the public interest and a proper respect for Congress require. A difference of opinion has existed from the first formation of our constitution to the present time, among our most enlightened and virtuous citizens, respecting the right of Congress to establish such a system of improvement. Taking into view the trust with which I am now honored, it would be improper, after what has passed, that this discussion should be revived, with an uncertainty of my opinion respecting the right. Disregarding early impressions I have bestowed on the subject all the deliberation which its great importance and a just sense of my duty required; and the result is, a settled conviction in my mind that Congress do not possess the right. It is not contained in any of the specified powers granted to Congress; nor can I consider it incident to, or a necessary mean, viewed on the most liberal scale, for carrying into effect any of the powers which are specifically granted. In communicating this result, I cannot resist the obligation which I feel to suggest to Congress the propriety of recommending to the States the adoption of an amendment to the constitution which shall give to Congress the right in question. In cases of doubtful construction, especially of such vital interest, it comports with the nature and origin of our institutions, and will contribute much to preserve them, to apply to our constituents for an explicit grant of the power. We may confidently rely, that if it appears to their satisfaction that the power is necessary, it will always be granted. In this case I am happy to observe, that experience has afforded the most ample proof of its utility, and that the benign spirit of conciliation and harmony which now manifests itself throughout our Union promises to such a recommendation the most prompt and favorable result. I think proper to suggest, also, in case this measure be adopted, that it be recommended to the States to include in the amendment sought a right in Congress to institute likewise seminaries of learning, for the all-important purpose of diffusing knowledge among our fellow-citizens throughout the United States.

Our manufactories will require the continued attention of Congress. The capital employed in them is considerable, and the knowledge acquired in the machinery and fabric of all the most useful manufactures is of great value. Their preservation, which depends on due encouragement, is connected with the high interests of the nation.

Although the progress of the public buildings has been as favorable as circumstances have permitted, it is to be regretted that the capitol is not yet in a state to receive you. There is good cause to presume that the two wings, the only parts as yet commenced, will be prepared for that purpose at the next session. The time seems now to have arrived when this subject may be deemed worthy the attention of Congress, on a scale adequate to national purposes. The completion of the middle building will be necessary to the convenient accommodation of Congress, of the committees, and various offices belonging to it. It is evident that the other public buildings are altogether insufficient for the accommodation of the several Executive Departments, some of whom are much crowded, and even subjected to the necessity of obtaining it in private buildings, at some distance from the head of the Department, and with inconvenience to the management of the public business. Most nations have taken an interest and a pride in the improvement and ornament of their metropolis, and none were more conspicuous in that respect than the ancient republics. The policy which dictated the establishment of a permanent residence for the National Government, and the spirit in which it was commenced and has been prosecuted, show that such improvement was thought worthy the attention of this nation. Its central position, between the northern and southern extremes of our Union, and its approach to the west, at the head of a great navigable river, which interlocks with the western waters, prove the wisdom of the councils which established it. Nothing appears to be more reasonable and proper than that convenient accommodation should be provided, on a well-digested plan, for the heads of the several Departments, and for the Attorney General; and it is believed that the public ground in the city, applied to those objects, will be found amply sufficient. I submit this subject to the consideration of Congress, that such further provision may be made in it as to them may seem proper.

In contemplating the happy situation of the United States, our attention is drawn, with peculiar interest to the surviving officers and soldiers of our revolutionary army, who so eminently contributed by their services to lay its foundation. Most of those very meritorious citizens have paid the debt of nature and gone to repose. It is believed that, among the survivors, there are some not provided for by existing laws, who are reduced to indigence, and even to real distress. These men have a claim on the gratitude of their country, and it will do honor to their country to provide for them. The lapse of a few years more, and the opportunity will be forever lost: indeed, so long already has been the interval, that the number to be benefited by any provision which may be made will not be great.

It appearing in a satisfactory manner that the revenue arising from imposts and tonnage, and from the sale of the public lands, will be fully adequate to the support of the civil Government, of the present military and naval establishments, (including the annual augmentation of the latter to the extent provided for,) to the payment of the interest on the public debt, and to the extinguishment of it at the times authorized, without the aid of the internal taxes, I consider it my duty to recommend to Congress their repeal. To impose taxes, when the public exigencies require them, is an obligation of the most sacred character, especially with a free people. The faithful fulfilment of it is among the highest proofs of their virtue and capacity for self-government. To dispense with taxes, when it may be done with perfect safety, is equally the duty of their representatives. In this instance we have the satisfaction to know that they were imposed when the demand was imperious, and have been sustained with exemplary fidelity. I have to add, that, however gratifying it may be to me, regarding the prosperous and happy condition of our country, to recommend the repeal of these taxes at this time, I shall nevertheless be attentive to events, and, should any future emergency occur, be not less prompt to suggest such measures and burdens as may then be requisite and proper.

JAMES MONROE.

15th Congress.] No. 290. [1st Session.

SUPPRESSION OF PIRATICAL ESTABLISHMENTS.

REPORTED ON JANUARY 10, 1818.

The Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred so much of the President's message as relates to the illicit introduction of slaves from Amelia island, having carefully taken the matter committed to them into consideration, respectfully report:

That, having applied to the Department of State for information respecting the illicit introduction of slaves into the United States, they were referred by the Secretary of State to the documents transmitted to this House by the President's message of the 15th of December last, consisting of various extracts of papers on the files of the Departments of State, of the Treasury, and of the Navy, relative to the proceedings of certain persons who took possession of Amelia island in the summer of the past year, and also relative to a similar establishment previously made at Galvezton, near the mouth of the river Trinity.

Upon a full investigation of these papers, with a view to the subject committed to them, your committee are of opinion that it is but too notorious that numerous infractions of the law prohibiting the importation of slaves into the United States have been perpetrated with impunity upon our southern frontier; and they are further of opinion that similar infractions would have been repeated, with increasing activity, without the timely interposition of the naval force, under the direction of the Executive of our Government.

In the course of their investigation, your committee have found it difficult to keep separate the special matter given into their charge from topics of a more general nature, which are necessarily interwoven therewith; they therefore crave the indulgence of the House while they present some general views connected with the subject, which have developed themselves in the prosecution of their inquiry.

It would appear, from what can be collected from these papers, that numerous violations of our laws have been latterly committed by a combination of freebooters and smugglers of various nations, who located themselves, in the first instance, upon an uninhabited spot, near the mouth of the river Trinity, within the jurisdictional limits of the United States, as claimed in virtue of the treaty of cession of Louisiana by France. This association of persons organized a system of plunder upon the high seas, directed chiefly against Spanish property, which consisted frequently of slaves from the coast of Africa; but their conduct appears not always to have been regulated by a strict regard to the national character of vessels falling into their hands, when specie, or other valuable articles, formed part of the cargo. Their vessels generally sailed under a pretended Mexican flag, although it does not appear that the establishment at Galvezton was sanctioned by, or connected with, any other Government. The presumption, too, of any authority ever having been given for such an establishment is strongly repelled, as well by its piratical character, as its itinerant nature; for the first position at Galvezton was abandoned on or about the 5th of April last, for one near Matagorda, upon the Spanish territory; and at a later period, this last was abandoned and a transfer made to Amelia island, in East Florida, a post which had been previously seized by persons who appear to have been equally unauthorized, and who were, at the time of the said transfer, upon the point, it is believed, of abandoning their enterprise, from the failure of resources, which they expected to have drawn from within our limits, in defiance of our laws. There exists on the part of these sea rovers an organized system of daring enterprise, supported by force of arms; and it is only by a correspondent system of coercion that they can be met, and constrained to respect the rights of property and the laws of nations. It is deeply to be regretted that practices of such a character, within our immediate neighborhood, and even within our jurisdictional limits, should have prevailed unchecked for so long a time; the more especially as one of their immediate consequences was to give occasion to the illicit introduction of slaves from the coast of Africa into these United States, and thus to revive a traffic repugnant to humanity, and to all sound principles of policy, as well as severely punishable by the laws of the land.

By the seventh section of the act prohibiting the importation of slaves, passed in 1807, the President is fully authorized to employ the naval force to cruise on any part of the United States, or territories thereof, where he may judge attempts will be made to violate the provisions of that act, in order to seize and bring in for condemnation all vessels contravening its provisions, to be proceeded against according to law.

By the joint resolution of the Senate and House of Representatives, of the 15th of January, 1811, and the act of the same date, the President is fully empowered to occupy any part or the whole of the territory lying east of the river Perdido, and south of the State of Georgia, in the event of an attempt to occupy the said territory, or any part thereof, by any foreign Government or Power; and by the same resolution and act he may employ any part of the army and navy of the United States which he may deem necessary for the purpose of taking possession of and occupying the territory aforesaid, and in order to maintain therein the authority of the United States.

Among the avowed projects of the persons who have occupied Amelia island was that of making the conquest of East and West Florida, professedly for the purpose of establishing there an independent Government; and the vacant lands in those provinces have been, from the origin of this undertaking down to the latest period, held out as lures to the cupidity of adventurers, and as resources for defraying the expenses of the expedition. The greater part of West Florida being in the actual possession of the United States, this project involved in it designs of direct hostility against them; and, as the express object of the resolution and act of January 15, 1811, was to authorize the President to prevent the province of East Florida from passing into the hands of any foreign Power, it became the obvious duty of the President to exercise the authority vested in him by that law. It does not appear that among these itinerant establishers of republics and distributers of Florida lands there is a single individual inhabitant of the country where the republic was to be constituted, and whose lands were to be thus bestowed. The project was, therefore, an attempt to occupy that territory by a foreign Power. Where the profession is in such direct opposition to the fact; where the venerable forms by which a free people constitute a frame of government for themselves are prostituted by a horde of foreign freebooters, for purposes of plunder; if, under color of authority from any of the provinces contending for their independence, the Floridas, or either of them, had been permitted to pass into the hands of such a Power, the committee are persuaded it is quite unnecessary to point out to the discernment of the House the pernicious influence which such a destiny of the territories in question must have had upon the security, tranquillity, and commerce of this Union.

It is a matter of public notoriety, that two of the persons who have successively held the command at Amelia island, whether authorized themselves by any Government or not, have issued commissions for privateers, as in the name of the Venezuelan and Mexican Governments, to vessels fitted out in the ports of the United States, and chiefly manned and officered by our own countrymen, for the purpose of capturing the property of nations with which the United States are at peace. One of the objects of the occupation of Amelia island, it appears, was to possess a convenient resort for privateers of this description, equally reprobated by the laws of nations, which recognise them only under the denomination of pirates, and by several of the treaties of the United States with different European Powers, which expressly denominate them as such.* It was against the subjects of Spain, one of the Powers with which the United States have entered into stipulations prohibiting their citizens from taking any commission from any Power with which she may be at war, for arming any ships to act as privateers, that these vessels have been commissioned to cruise; though, as the committee have observed, no flag, not even that of our own country, has proved a protection from them.

The immediate tendency of suffering such armaments, in defiance of our laws, would have been to embroil the United States with all the nations whose commerce with our country was suffering under these depredations, and, if not checked by all the means in the power of the Government would have authorized claims from the subjects of foreign Governments for indemnities at the expense of this nation, for captures by our people in vessels fitted out in our ports, and, as could not fail of being alleged, countenanced by the very neglect of the necessary means of suppressing them.

The possession of Amelia island, as a port of refuge for such privateers, and of illicit traffic in the United States of their prizes, which were frequently, as before stated, slave ships from Africa, was a powerful encouragement and temptation to multiply these violations of our laws, and made it the duty of the Government to use all the means in its power to restore the security of our own commerce, and of that of friendly nations upon our coasts, which could in no other way more effectually be done than by taking from this piratical and smuggling combination their place of refuge.

*See the treaty of peace with France, 1778, art. 21st, United States' Laws, vol. 1, p. 88; with the Netherlands, 1782, art. 19, vol. 1, p. 162; with Sweden, 1783, art. 23, vol. 1, p. 190; with Great Britain, 1794, art. 21, vol. 1, p. 218; with Prussia, 1785, art. 20, vol. 1, p. 238, and 1797, art. 20, p. 256; with Spain, 1795, art. 14, vol. 1, p. 270.

In order, therefore, to give full effect to the intentions of the Legislature, and in pursuance of the provisions of the above-recited resolution and acts, it became necessary, as it appears to the committee, to suppress all establishments of the hostile nature of those above described, made in our vicinity, the objects of which appear to have been the occupation of the Floridas, the spoliation of peaceful commerce upon and near our coasts by piratical privateers, the clandestine importation of goods, and the illicit introduction of slaves within our limits. Such establishments, if suffered to subsist and strengthen, would probably have rendered nugatory all provisions made by law for the exclusion of prohibited persons. The course pursued on this occasion will strongly mark the feelings and intentions of our Government upon the great question of the slave-trade, which is so justly considered by most civilized nations as repugnant to justice and humanity, and which, in our particular case, is not less so to all the dictates of a sound policy.

Your committee anticipate beneficial results from the adoption of these measures by the Executive, in the promotion of the security of our southern frontier and its neighboring seas, and in the diminution of the evasions, latterly so frequent, of our revenue and prohibitory laws. The experience of ten years has, however, evinced the necessity of some new regulations being adopted, in order effectually to put a stop to the further introduction of slaves into the United States. In the act of Congress prohibiting this importation, the policy of giving the whole forfeiture of vessel and goods to the United States, and no part thereof to the informer, may justly be doubted. This is an oversight which should be remedied. The act does, indeed, give a part of the personal penalties to the informer, but these penalties are generally only nominal, as the persons engaged in such traffic are usually poor. The omission of the States to pass acts to meet the act of Congress, and to establish regulations in aid of the same, can only be remedied by Congress legislating directly upon the subject themselves, as it is clearly within the scope of their constitutional power to do.

[The following documents are extracted from those referred to in the aforegoing report.]

Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury to the Secretary of State, dated

NOVEMBER 21, 1817.

The Secretary of the Treasury presents his respects to the Secretary of State, and has the honor of transmitting to him copies of the communications which have been received at this Department concerning the occupation of Galvezton and Amelia island by persons sailing under the various flags of the independent Governments of North and South America, late Spanish provinces.

Extracts of a letter from Beverly Chew, Esq., collector at New Orleans, to Mr. Crawford, dated

AUGUST 1, 1817.

As it is your wish that every attempt to evade the provisions of the existing laws should be communicated to the Department, accompanied by suggestions of the measures necessary to repress the evil, I deem it my duty to state that the most shameful violations of the slave act, as well as our revenue laws, continue to be practised, with impunity, by a motley mixture of freebooters and smugglers, at Galvezton, under the Mexican flag, and being, in reality, little else than the re-establishment of the Barrataria band, removed somewhat more out of the reach of justice; and, unless the officers of the customs are provided with more effectual means for the enforcement of the laws, the treasury must suffer incalculably. To give you a more correct idea of this establishment, it will be necessary to be a little prolix, which I beg you will excuse. Galvezton is a small island or sand-bar, situate in the bay of St. Bernard, on the coast of Texas, about ninety miles west of the Sabine, within the jurisdictional limits claimed by the United States, in virtue of the cession of Louisiana to them by France. The establishment was recently made there by a Commodore Aury, with a few small schooners from Aux Cayes, manned, in a great measure, with refugees from Barrataria and mulattoes. This establishment was reinforced by a few more men from different points of the coast of Louisiana, the most efficient part of them being principally mariners, (Frenchmen or Italians,) who have been hanging loose upon society in and about New Orleans, in greater or smaller numbers, ever since the breaking up of the establishment at Barrataria. Colonel Perry commanded one party of about eighty or ninety men of this new community, who had been enlisted principally as soldiers within our jurisdiction; and Mr. Herarra, coming with a few followers from New Orleans, brought up the rear; and then announced the establishment to the world by a proclamation, attested by a Frenchman by the name of Morin, very recently a bankrupt auctioneer in New Orleans, as Secretary of State. From this new station, fed and drawing all its resources from New Orleans, and keeping up a regular intelligence, through a variety of channels, with their friends here, an active system of plunder was commenced on the high seas, chiefly of Spanish property, but often without much concern as to the national character, particularly when money was in question. The captures made by their numerous cruisers (many owned by citizens of the United States) were condemned by a pretended court of admiralty there as prizes, and the cargoes introduced into this State, principally in a clandestine manner. The vessels thus condemned have generally come here under new names, and with the Mexican flag. Some of them have been detained by the United States naval force for hovering in our waters, and others have been libelled for restitution by the Spanish consul, in behalf of the original owners; and though several trials have come on before the honorable the United States district court for the district of Louisiana, and the claimants have never been able to produce proof of the Government of Galvezton having ever been authorized by the Mexican republic, restitution has been decreed in several instances. There is no evidence of the establishment having been made or sanctioned by, or connected with, a Mexican republic, if one be now existing; and the presumption of such an actual establishment under such an authority is strongly repelled by the illegal and piratical character of the establishment, and its ambulatory nature. It is not only of very recent origin, but is clothed with no character of permanency; for it was abandoned about the 5th of April, and transferred to Matagorda, leaving at Galvezton only an advice boat, to advertise such privateers and prizes which might arrive there of the spot on which they had fixed their new residence. Some days after the abandonment of Galvezton, several privateers arrived there, and among the rest the General Artigas, commanded by one G. Champlin, of New York, with two schooners, her prizes, the Patronila, with one hundred and seventy-four slaves, and the Enrequita, with one hundred and thirteen slaves; and also a Spanish and a Portuguese vessel, and the American schooner Evening Post, of New York, Calvin Williams, master, prizes to the ———, Captain Maurice Nicholas Jolly.

Among the most conspicuous characters who happened to be then at Galvezton were many of the notorious offenders against our laws who had so lately been indulged with a remission of the punishment, who, so far from gratefully availing themselves of the lenity of the Government to return to or commence an orderly and honest life, seem to have regarded its indulgence almost as an encouragement to a renewal of their offences. You will readily perceive I allude to the Barratarians, among whom the Lafittes may be classed foremost, and most actively engaged in the Galvezton trade, and owners of several cruisers under the Mexican flag. Many of our citizens are equally guilty, and are universally known to be owners of the same kind of vessels. A number of these characters being at Galvezton after the abandonment, readily saw the advantages that would result in the re-establishment of a Government at that place; its situation, so immediately in the vicinity of our settlements, being much preferable to Matagorda; their views being entirely confined to introducing their captures into this State. Accordingly, a meeting was called on the 15th of April, and it was resolved to re-establish the Government; and a true copy of their deliberations you have enclosed. I can vouch for the correctness of the copy, having received it from a person of undoubted veracity. And thus, without even the semblance of authority from the Mexican republic, they immediately proceeded to condemn vessels and cargoes as good prizes, and to introduce them into this port, and, among the rest, the cargo of the Evening Post. It was some time before this was known here, great pains having been taken to keep it secret. Since it has been known, I have felt it my duty to report all vessels and cargoes which have arrived here from Galvezton to the district attorney, who has had them arrested under the Spanish treaty; but, owing to the unfortunate absence of the judge, no decision can be had thereon. These steps of the officers of the port have irritated the Barratarian gentlemen and their connexions in a high degree; and representations filled with falsehoods will probably be made against them, particularly on the score of enmity to the patriotic cause. As well might a man be accused of being an enemy to personal liberty who arrests and confines a robber, as that the officers of the port of New Orleans should be accused of being unfriendly to the revolution in the Spanish provinces because they attempted to prevent a lawless establishment at Galvezton from violating the laws. The prizes made by the privateers under the Mexican flag are to a very large amount of merchandise, such as jewelry, laces, silks, linens, britannias, muslins, seersuckers, calicoes, &c.; all of which are repacked in small bales, of convenient size for transportation on mules, and the greatest part introduced clandestinely. Other articles, such as iron, nails, tallow, leather, glass ware, crockery, cordage, beef, &c., are brought here in their prizes. It is stated, and universally believed, that Captain Champlin sold the slaves captured in the Patronila and Enrequita to the Lafittes, Sauvinet, and other speculators in this place, who have or will resell to the planters; and the facility offered to smugglers by the innumerable inlets are too obvious, on a view of the map, to doubt; but they either are or will be all introduced into this State, without the possibility of the officers of the revenue being able to prevent or punish them; more especially as a great portion of the population are disposed to countenance them in violating our laws. A few days ago, information having been given that one of our citizens had gone to the W. with a very considerable sum in specie, to purchase slaves for himself and two other planters, I determined to make an effort to arrest him on his return, and immediately purchased a fine boat on account of the Government, (which had been lately captured by a party I had sent on Lake Ponchartrain, and condemned for a violation of the slave act,) which I have sent under the command of an active, enterprising inspector, with a military guard of twelve men, and am in great hopes of his falling in with and capturing the party. I am persuaded you will approve of my not writing for instructions, at the risk of seeing the laws violated with impunity; and I cannot but hope the Government will see the necessity of giving instructions to the naval force on this station to prevent the re-establishment of Galvezton; otherwise the bay will no longer be safe for any flag. Since they have been denied shelter in Port au Prince, they have no other asylum than Galvezton. On the part of these pirates we have to contend with, we behold an extended and organized system of enterprise, of ingenuity, of indefatigability, and of audacity, favored by a variety of local advantages, and supported always by force of arms; and, unless they be met by correspondent species of resistance, the results of the contest are of very simple calculation.

You will, I trust, see the necessity of either granting a certain number of revenue cutters, of the description I have mentioned, or that the naval force on this station may be enjoined strictly to prevent these privateers from hovering in our waters and violating our laws. It is a fact you may rely on, all the cruises of these privateers commence and end at this port; they enter in distress, comply with the formalities of the law, and if they do not augment their force and renew their crews in port, they do it in our waters, and it is not in my power to prevent it.

Mr. Chew, collector at New Orleans, to Mr. Crawford.

SIR: AUGUST 30, 1817.

In the communication which I had the honor to make you, under date of 1st instant, I gave such information respecting the establishment at Galvezton as I had collected; since then, the depositions of Messrs. J. Ducoing and V. Garros, (ex-judges of admiralty at that place, and now here,) have been taken; and I herewith transmit you copies, which go to substantiate the material fact stated by me, and I make no doubt but you will be satisfied of the correctness of the assertion, that the establishment of Galvezton is nothing more or less than one of privateersmen, without even the shadow of a connexion with a Mexican republic, (if such a republic exists,) and, as such, will not, I presume, be countenanced by the Government of the United States. It has been reported to me, and from a source deserving credit, that the principal part of the force from Matagorda and Soto de la Marina had returned to Galvezton, and that two prizes with slaves have recently arrived—one a schooner, with a full cargo, said to be three hundred, (probably exaggerated;) that a contagious fever having made its appearance among the slaves, the privateersmen, apprehensive of its communicating to the other prize, cut the cables and sent the schooner adrift with the unfortunate beings on board!—the other prize, a ship, with four hundred slaves, was lying there; and they have, altogether, about six hundred and fifty slaves on hand, all of whom are intended to be introduced into this State.

The United States brig Boxer has sent in two small schooners, with thirty slaves on board, captured in our waters; and the deputy collector of the district of Teche writes me that he has seized fifteen, and was in pursuit of a larger number. At this moment I have sent two confidential inspectors to examine three plantations on this river, near Baton Rouge, information having been given me that one hundred had been purchased for the three at Galvezton. This activity has occasioned some alarm, and I am informed (and place complete confidence in it) that the privateersmen and others interested have resolved to remove the slaves to the neighborhood of the Sabine, build barracks, and keep them there during the winter, or till the purchasers appear, and leave the risk of introducing the slaves to the planters, whose eagerness to procure them will induce them to run every hazard. They imagine that, fixing themselves to the west of the Sabine, they will be without the jurisdiction of the United States; but I trust they will find their mistake only when the whole party will be seized.

In addition to the foregoing, I beg leave to refer you to the documents lately forwarded by Commodore Patterson to the honorable Secretary of the Navy, with the memorial of some of the most respectable merchants of this place, praying him to furnish convoy to protect their vessels trading with the Spanish ports from the piratical cruisers, who respect no flag when specie is in question.

I have lately sent an inspector of confidence to examine La Fourche, from the Mississippi to the sea, and he reports it as thickly settled for eighty miles from the river; has eight to ten feet water, and six feet on the bar at the mouth, or entrance into the sea. There is no obstacle whatever to craft entering it from the sea, and ascending to the Mississippi, and trading freely as high up as they please. I mentioned in my last the necessity of appointing an inspector for that place, if you decide not to have revenue cutters on this station. I cannot but repeat, that I am firmly persuaded the measure is more necessary for this than any other district in the United States. Bartholomew Lafon, of this place, who acted as secretary to the meeting of the 15th April, (copy of deliberation forwarded in my last,) is mentioned as the Governor of the new establishment near the Sabine. Lafitte is now purchasing a large quantity of provisions, and the first cargo will soon sail; a copy of the manifest will accompany this, or soon follow. These persons, and a long list of others I could add if necessary, have no other profession, occupation, or mode of livelihood, than privateering and violating our laws, and openly threaten revenge against any officer of the revenue that may molest or impede their pursuits. They are now preparing a memorial to the Department, with the double view to misrepresent the conduct of the officers of the port, and to obtain permission to introduce their illegally-captured property, under the false pretext that they (the memorialists) have made heavy advances; the truth is, the only advances they allude to is the equipment and fitting out privateers, contrary to our laws. The exports from this place to Galvezton and Matagorda have consisted principally of provisions; a cargo of arms was sent some time in the fall of last year, which has long since been given up as lost, and no return whatever can ever be expected from the Mexican Government, from all present appearances. The imports (without taking into consideration the large amount of goods introduced clandestinely) have been very large, as you will observe by the enclosed abstract of duties secured at this office on these importations.

I have felt it my duty to give you this information for your correct understanding the nature of the establishment at Galvezton, and cannot but hope you will be pleased to instruct me implicitly how to act. My conduct has been governed by a sense of duty, and from a conviction of its propriety; if I have erred, I hope it will be ascribed to an honest zeal.

I am, &c. BEVERLY CHEW.

P. S. The brig with provisions and lumber for the winter quarters of the slaves attempted to clear to-day; but, owing to the informality of her papers, it is postponed till Monday. I enclose a list of private armed Mexican and Venezuelan vessels now in port.

List of Mexican armed vessels now in the port of New Orleans, commissioned by Aury.

Bellona, Dewatre, 6 guns, 55 men; commissioned March 4, 1817.
Calibra, Deverge, 1 gun, 30 men; commissioned April 4, 1817.

Eugenia, Lemeson, 3 guns, 60 men; just sailed on a cruise.

Mr. Chew to Mr. Crawford.

SIR: OCTOBER 17, 1817.

My communications of the 1st and 30th of August last, relative to the establishment at Galvezton, and the numerous cruisers under the Mexican flag that infest our waters, will, I trust, have reached your hands. I deem it my duty to trouble you once more upon the same subject, and to enclose copies of additional testimony of Mr. John Ducoing, late judge of admiralty, and of Mr. Raymond Espagnol, late Secretary of State, which will, I trust, satisfactorily prove my assurances of the piratical nature of the establishment, and justify, in your opinion, the officers of this port in the steps taken by them to put an end to it; for such, it appears, has been the effect of the measures adopted here. Late advices from that place state that Aury and Champlin, with their privateers and prizes (said to be thirteen sail) evacuated the place, and, it is believed, they have steered their course for Amelia island. Before their departure, they disposed of about three hundred Africans to the agents of some planters on this river; the remainder they have taken with them. The deputy collector of the district of Teche writes me that a large gang of Africans passed near the church of Attacapas on the night of the 14th ultimo, bound for the Mississippi. He heard of it too late to seize them. I have sent a confidential agent to watch the plantations of Joseph Erwin, James Still, and Christopher Adams; it being reported that the latter had been to Galvezton to purchase slaves for himself and the others. I received, a few days ago, a letter from the person called Commodore Aury, dated at sea, 31st July last, on board the privateer Mexican Congress, (late Calypso, of Baltimore,) enclosing a duplicate of a letter which, it appears, he had thought proper to write to me on the 28th of the same month, (the original of which has never come to hand.) In this letter he gives me a kind of official information that it has been determined to abandon Galvezton, and that he had taken with him the judge of the admiralty, the collector, and all his other constituted authorities; and that whatever may be done at the place, after that date, will be without his approbation or consent, and any clearances or other official acts at that place illegal. I have no doubt, however, but that a new establishment will be soon made there. The advantages are too great to be voluntarily abandoned by persons who have so long enjoyed the profits. Early in September, two vessels, the Carmelite, belonging to B. Lafon, and the Franklin, belonging to J. B. Laforte, (both unregistered vessels, formerly prizes,) cleared at this office for Laguna, but really bound to Galvezton, with provisions and materials for erecting buildings. On their arrival they found the place deserted, and the Franklin has returned to this port with her outward cargo. By her, accounts have been received that the Carmelite was lying there, and that Lafitte (who had been pardoned for the crimes committed at Barrataria) and Lafon had arrived there, with about forty other persons, and, it is believed, intended to form an establishment, and will, no doubt, soon replace the judge and other authorities carried off by Aury. Private armed vessels, under the Mexican flag, and one or two under that of Venezuela, continued to frequent this port, and uniformly report in distress, (one case only excepted,) make protest, and obtain a certificate from the wardens of the port that there is necessity to unlade their armament and heave down. They have been thus admitted to an entry, free of any charge other than fees to the officers of the customs, under the sixtieth section of the collection law. This course seems to have been adopted by my predecessor, and has been followed by me, in compliance with the instructions from the Department of 3d July, 1815. These armed vessels being admitted, great care has been taken not to permit any violation of the acts of 5th June, 1794, and 3d March last, by augmenting their force or enlisting American citizens; but, in defiance of every vigilance on the part of the officers of the customs, they violate the law, not whilst they remain in port, but before they leave our waters. Nothing is easier, when the privateer is completely repaired and ready for sea, than to send both men and guns, if they need them, to Barrataria, or any other convenient place, which the privateer repairs to, and takes them on board, and sails on a cruise with an augmented force, to commit hostilities against the persons and property of a nation with whom the United States are at peace.

It is universally reported, and believed, that many of these vessels (under the Mexican flag, and commissioned by Aury) are owned by persons resident here, and enjoying the privileges of American citizens. At the end of the cruise the same farce is played over again; and it may with truth be said that each cruise commences and ends at this port. Attempts have been made to convict them, but as yet without success. They easily exculpate themselves. Witnesses, on their part, are never difficult to be procured in a place where there are a vast number of people with whom the solemnity of an oath has little weight. This you will believe when I add that two witnesses were produced in the United States district court, in the month of May last, who swore that Galvezton was a considerable and well-built town, with coffee-houses, shops, &c., and that the then constituted authorities (Durier, Ducoing, Espagnol, &c.) had been appointed and commissioned by Aury. The testimony of the two latter, as well as many other persons now here, will fully refute that falsehood.

I hope you will be pleased to give me some instructions relative to the cruisers, that I may act in a way to meet the views of the Executive.

I have the honor to be, &c.

BEVERLY CHEW.

To the Honorable Dominic A. Hall, judge of the district court of the United States in and for the district of Louisiana: The petition of Beverly Chew, collector of the district of Mississippi, and one of the officers of the port of New Orleans, respectfully showeth

The facts set forth in the annexed affidavit, and prays an order pursuant thereto, commissioning some judge or justice of the peace in the city of New Orleans to take the depositions of the said witnesses in the said cause, at such time and place as to your honor shall seem meet.

And, as in duty bound, &c.

BEVERLY CHEW.

Signed and sworn to before me, this 6th day of October, 1817,

JOHN NIXON,
Justice of the peace for the fifth section of New Orleans.

The United States district court, Louisiana district:

The United States, in behalf, &c., vs. cargoes of Juana, Eliza, Carmelita, and Diana.
The same, vs. brigs Diana and Juana, schooners Eliza and Carmelita.
The same, vs. ninety boxes sugar.
The same, vs. sundry goods, &c., part of schooner Mount Vernon's cargo.

City of New Orleans, to wit:

Beverly Chew, collector, one of the officers of the port of New Orleans, being duly sworn, deposes and says: That Raymond Espagnol and John Ducoing, as this deponent is advised and believes, are material witnesses on the part of the prosecution in the above cases, and without the benefit of whose testimony the trial on the said behalf cannot safely be proceeded in; that the said witnesses are, as this deponent is informed and believes, about permanently to depart the United States, and before, in the common course of proceeding, the said causes can be brought to trial; so that, unless a commission issue for taking the depositions of the said witnesses prior to their intended departure from the United States, as aforesaid, the prosecution, he apprehends and believes, will be deprived of the evidence of the said witnesses.

BEVERLY CHEW.

Additional testimony taken in sundry causes depending in the United States district court for the Louisiana district, on behalf of the United States, against sundry vessels and cargoes from Galvezton.

John Ducoing being duly sworn, the deponent further says: That the establishment at Galvezton was composed, as before stated, by persons of various nations, and that the sole view and object of the persons comprising the said establishment was to capture Spanish vessels and property, without any idea of aiding the revolution in Mexico, or that of any other of the Spanish revolted colonies, as far as this deponent knows and believes. And the deponent says, that during the time he exercised the functions of judge at Galvezton, he had no knowledge of or belief in the existence of a Mexican republic, or other Government, independent of the Spanish Government.

The deponent further says, that the Government established on the 15th day of April had no connexion whatever with any other government, state, or people; that Galvezton stands on a small island, or rather a small sand-bar, a few miles long and broad, and was a desert when taken possession of by Aury, known by the name of Snake island, without a port or harbor, and no buildings, except a few huts or cabins, probably three or four, made of boards and sails of vessels.

And further this deponent saith not.

JOHN DUCOING.

Sworn and subscribed before me, this 7th day of October, 1817,

R. CLAIBORNE, Clerk.

Mr. Raymond Espagnol, being duly sworn, says: That, on the 16th day of March last, this deponent went from this place to Galvezton, in the province of Texas, in the brig Devorador, for the purpose of disposing of merchandise. Aury was acting as governor. This deponent accepted of no office or employment under Aury, nor had he any acquaintance with him; never took any oath of allegiance to Aury; that, on the 5th of April last, Aury and General Mina abandoned Galvezton, burned the huts and cabins there were standing, and left no person, authorized by them or otherwise, to form a Government. After their departure, to wit, on the 15th of April, 1817, the persons then at Galvezton consisted of about thirty or forty in number, including sailors, &c., six of whom assembled on board of the schooner Carmelita, (belonging to Mr. Bartholomew Lafon, late of New Orleans, and engineer in the service of the United States,) to wit, Durier, John Ducoing, Pereneau, said B. Lafon, Rousselin, and this deponent, who formed the new Government. The proceedings were drawn up and signed by those present, by which certain persons aforesaid took upon themselves offices, namely:

Durier, governor; John Ducoing, judge of admiralty; this deponent, notary public and secretary; Pereneau, major du place; Rousselin, collector.

At the meeting on the 15th April, there was no paper or document produced, authorizing the same, or giving them power to form a Government.

The deponent further says, that the sole object and view of the persons comprising the establishment at Galvezton was, as far as he knows and believes, to capture Spanish property under what they called the Mexican flag, but without an idea of aiding the revolution in Mexico, or that of any of the Spanish revolted colonies; and further, that during the time that this deponent acted as notary public and secretary to the new Government at Galvezton, he had no knowledge or belief in the existence of a Mexican republic, or any Government in Mexico, independent of the Spanish authorities; further, the deponent says, that the new Government established at Galvezton on the 15th of April, 1817, had no connexion whatever with any other nation, state, or people.

That Galvezton stands on a small sand-bar, a few miles long and broad, and was a desert when taken possession of by Aury, known by the name of Snake island; without a port or harbor, and no buildings, except three or four cabins, built of boards and sails of vessels.

Further, this deponent says, that some time in the month of May last, when some of the merchandise and vessels from Galvezton were libelled by the Spanish consul in behalf of the Spanish owners, application was made to this deponent to appear before the Honorable Judge Hall, and to prove that the authorities appointed by the meeting at Galvezton, on the 5th of April last, were appointed and commissioned by Aury. This application was explicitly stated to be on behalf of those interested in the Galvezton establishment, particularly of Mr. Bartholomew Lafon and Mr. J. Bte. Laporte, the former of whom was known to be indebted to this deponent in a sum of 10 or $1200; this deponent refused informing the person by whom the application had been made; that if the deponent appeared, he would tell the truth, and should prove that the persons forming the Government at Galvezton (after 15th April) were not named by Aury. This deponent was not summoned as a witness, though it was known he was in the city, and has continued since to reside here. The deponent says that this is the true reason why he was not summoned to appear before the judge at the time when Messrs. Rieux and Pereneau appeared.

Extract.—Mr. McIntosh to Mr. Crawford.

DEAR SIR: THE REFUGE, NEAR JEFFERSON, CAMDEN COUNTY, October 30, 1817.

The last letter I had the honor to address you was on the 9th of August; shortly after which the public papers announced that you had left Washington on a visit to Georgia. A few weeks after, I thought it not imprudent to venture out to my swamp plantation on the Sotillo, and since have been very little at St. Mary's. Since General McGregor and the greater part of his officers (some of whom were men of respectable standing in the United States) have left Amelia island, there has not been so much ingenuity made use of in misrepresenting the conduct and intentions of the invaders of East Florida; and the accounts which are published of them are, for the most part, generally correct. The present chief, Commodore Aury, got the command very much against the inclinations of Sheriff Hubbert and Colonel Irwin. When he arrived at Fernandina with his squadron of privateers and prizes, they were entirely without money. He declared "that if he gave them any aid, it must be on the condition of being made commander-in-chief; and that, as General McGregor never had any commission whatever, the flag of the Florida republic must be struck, and that of the Mexican hoisted; and that Fernandina should be considered as a conquest of the Mexican republic, (under which he was commissioned,) without its being necessary that any other part of the province of East Florida should be conquered." Hubbert and Irwin reluctantly agreed to the mortifying condition of resigning the command. They were never friendly with the commodore, and endeavored, but in vain, to gain over by intrigue a part of his men. Their own party considerably increasing shortly after, they were several times on the point of coming to open war with Aury and his followers, and under the pretence that Aury's forces were composed chiefly of brigand negroes. A few days before Mr. Hubbert's death, (who was called Governor, without having any power,) Aury marched to his quarters with a body of armed men, and obliged him to make such concessions as drove him to an act of intemperance, which soon after terminated his existence.

Since the death of this gentleman there has been little or no disturbance among them. But it would appear as if the suspicions of the Frenchman did not die with Hubbert, as none of his privateers have yet left Fernandina.

The parties are designated as the American and French: and I have been assured, by individuals belonging to them both, that each is anxiously looking for reinforcements. Aury has a number of Frenchmen, who were, it is said, officers of Bonaparte. They find it their interest, as well as inclination, to support their countryman. His great dependance, however, is on about one hundred and thirty brigand negroes, a set of desperate bloody dogs.

The American party, which is rather more numerous than the other, consists generally of American, English, and Irish sailors; but now has no declared leader. Irwin wants either spirit or popularity to assume that character. For my own part, I believe that, in point of morals, patriotism, and intentions, they are exactly on a par. Aury's blacks, however, make their neighborhood extremely dangerous to a population like ours; and I fear that if they are not expelled from that place, some unhappy consequences may fall on our country. It is said that they have declared, that if they are in danger of being overpowered, they will call to their aid every negro within their reach. Indeed, I am told that the language of the slaves in Florida is already such as is extremely alarming. The patriots at Fernandina had, about ten days ago, an unexpected and strange reinforcement. Twenty half-pay British officers, by the way of Turk's island, arrived at St. John's river, and, mistaking it for Amelia, a colonel and a couple of others were made prisoners by the Spaniards. The others got safe to Fernandina; but, finding that General Sir Gregor McGregor had abandoned it, they determined immediately on doing so too.

[The following message and documents relating to this subject were communicated to Congress January 13, 1818.]

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States: JANUARY 13, 1818.

I have the satisfaction to inform Congress that the establishment at Amelia island has been suppressed, and without the effusion of blood. The papers which explain this transaction I now lay before Congress.

By the suppression of this establishment and of that of Galvezton, which will soon follow, if it has not already ceased to exist, there is good cause to believe that the consummation of a project fraught with much injury to the United States has been prevented. When we consider the persons engaged in it, being adventurers from different countries, with very few, if any, of the native inhabitants of the Spanish colonies; the territory on which the establishments were made—one on a portion of that claimed by the United States westward of the Mississippi, the other on a part of East Florida, a province in negotiation between the United States and Spain; the claim of their leader, as announced by his proclamation on taking possession of Amelia island, comprising the whole of both the Floridas, without excepting that part of West Florida which is incorporated with the State of Louisiana; their conduct while in the possession of the island, making it instrumental to every species of contraband, and in regard to slaves of the most odious and dangerous character, it may fairly be concluded that, if the enterprise had succeeded on the scale on which it was formed, much annoyance and injury would have resulted from it to the United States.

Other circumstances were thought to be no less deserving of attention. The institution of a Government by foreign adventurers in the island, distinct from the colonial Governments of Buenos Ayres, Venezuela, or Mexico, pretending to sovereignty, and exercising its highest offices, particularly in granting commissions to privateers, were acts which could not fail to draw after them the most serious consequences. It was the duty of the Executive either to extend to this establishment all the advantages of that neutrality which the United States had proclaimed and have observed in favor of the colonies of Spain, who, by the strength of their own population and resources, had declared their independence, and were affording strong proof of their ability to maintain it, or of making the discrimination which circumstances required. Had the first course been pursued, we should not only have sanctioned all the unlawful claims and practices of this pretended Government in regard to the United States, but have countenanced a system of privateering in the Gulf of Mexico and elsewhere, the ill effects of which might, and probably would, have been deeply and very extensively felt. The path of duty was plain from the commencement, but it was painful to enter upon it while the obligation could be resisted. The law of 1811, lately published, and which it is therefore proper now to mention, was considered applicable to the case, from the moment that the proclamation of the chief of the enterprise was seen; and its obligation was daily increased by other considerations of high importance already mentioned, which were deemed sufficiently strong in themselves to dictate the course which has been pursued.

Early intimations having been received of the dangerous purposes of these adventurers, timely precautions were taken, by the establishment of a force near the St. Mary's, to prevent their effect, or it is probable that it would have been more sensibly felt.

To such establishments, made so near to our settlements, in the expectation of deriving aid from them, it is particularly gratifying to find that very little encouragement was given.

The example so conspicuously displayed by our fellow-citizens that their sympathies cannot be perverted to improper purposes, but that a love of country, the influence of moral principles, and a respect for the laws, are predominant with them, is a sure pledge that all the very flattering anticipations which have been formed of the success of our institutions will be realized. This example has proved that, if our relations with foreign Powers are to be changed, it must be done by the constituted authorities, who alone, acting on a high responsibility, are competent to the purpose; and, until such change is thus made, that our fellow-citizens will respect the existing relations by a faithful adherence to the laws which secure them.

Believing that this enterprise, though undertaken by persons some of whom may have held commissions from some of the colonies, was unauthorized by and unknown to the colonial Governments, full confidence is entertained that it will be disclaimed by them, and that effectual measures will be taken to prevent the abuse of their authority, in all cases, to the injury of the United States.

For these injuries, especially those proceeding from Amelia island, Spain would be responsible, if it were not manifest that, although committed in the latter instance through her territory, she was utterly unable to prevent them. Her territory, however, ought not to be made instrumental, through her inability to defend it, to purposes so injurious to the United States. To a country over which she fails to maintain her authority, and which she permits to be converted to the annoyance of her neighbors, her jurisdiction for the time necessarily ceases to exist. The territory of Spain will, nevertheless, be respected, so far as it may be done consistently with the essential interests and safety of the United States. In expelling these adventurers from these posts, it was not intended to make any conquest from Spain, or to injure in any degree the cause of the colonies. Care will be taken that no part of the territory contemplated by the law of 1811 shall be occupied by a foreign Government of any kind, or that injuries of the nature of those complained of shall be repeated; but this, it is expected, will be provided for, with every other interest, in a spirit of amity, in the negotiation now depending with the Government of Spain.

JAMES MONROE.

From the Secretary of War to the President of the United States.

SIR: JANUARY 12, 1818.

I have the honor to transmit copies of the orders which have been given by the acting Secretary of War to Major Bankhead, in relation to taking possession of Amelia island, and copies of the communications which have been made to this Department by that officer, which embrace all the information in my possession.

I have the honor to be, &c.

J. C. CALHOUN.

SIR: UNITED STATES SHIP JOHN ADAMS, OFF AMELIA, December 22, 1817.

We have received orders from our Government to take possession of Amelia island, and to occupy the port of Fernandina with a part of our force, which will be moved over as soon as it will be convenient for your troops to evacuate it.

To avoid unnecessary delay, we think proper at this time to inform you, in the event of your acquiescence in this demand, that you will be at liberty to depart with the forces under your command, and such property as belongs unquestionably to them will be held sacred.

You are to leave the public property found by General McGregor at Fernandina in the same condition it was taken, and the property of the inhabitants of Amelia island must be restored to them, where they have been forcibly dispossessed of it; and no depredations on private property, from this period, will be permitted with impunity.

Should you, contrary to the expectations of the President of the United States, refuse to give us peaceable possession of the island, the consequences of resistance must rest with you.

We have the honor to be, &c.

J. D. HENLEY, Captain in the navy, and Commander-in-chief of the naval forces of the United States, off Amelia.

JAMES BANKHEAD, Major 1st battalion artillery, United States army, and commanding military forces.

General AURY, Commander-in-chief of the forces at Fernandina.

HEAD-QUARTERS, FERNANDINA, ISLAND OF AMELIA,
December 22, 1817, (8th of the Independence.)

GENTLEMEN:

I have had the honor to receive your official letter of this day. The nature of its contents requiring mature deliberation, I have submitted the same to the representatives of the republic, and, as soon as I shall have obtained their opinion, it shall be immediately sent to you.

I can, however, state to you, gentlemen, that no opposition will be made to surrender the island of Amelia on the part of this Government.

I have the honor to remain, &c.

AURY, Commander-in-chief.

Commodore J. D. HENLEY, Major BANKHEAD, &c.
On board the United States ship John Adams.

HEAD-QUARTERS, FERNANDINA, ISLAND OF AMELIA,
December 22, 1817, (8th of the Independence.)

GENTLEMEN:

I have received your official letter of this day, by which, in the name of the Government of the United States, you summon us to evacuate this place with the troops under my command, as possession thereof is to be taken by the forces under your commands, under certain conditions therein specified.

This republic, that of Mexico, nor any other of South America, being at war with the United States, obliges me to state to you that the contents of your letter have greatly surprised this Government and the people of the state. You have, nevertheless, intimated that, in case of our acquiescence to your demand, we shall be permitted to evacuate this is land, which never was nor ever has been a part of the United States. Allow me, gentlemen, to observe to you, that, from the moment we took Fernandina by the force of our arms, we entered into the full possession of all the rights appertaining to our enemy, and that to this day we have supported these rights at the risk of our lives and fortunes. The boundaries of the Floridas and the United States having been fairly settled by the treaty of friendship, limits, and navigation, on the 22d of October, 1795, leaves us at a loss to ascertain your authority to interfere in our internal concerns.

Our surprise increases when we reflect that your communication comes as authorized by the Government of a people who glory in their respect for the rights of nations, whether great or small, and who, no doubt, sympathize and wish success to their southern brethren in the struggle for liberty and independence in which they are engaged, as were the United States forty years ago.

On the other side, you promise to hold sacred such of our property as unquestionably belongs to our citizens. Who is to be the judge in this case? The United States, who can by no means claim any kind of jurisdiction from the source of the river St. Mary's down to the ocean, on this side of the centre of the channel! We entertain too much veneration for your constitution to believe for a moment that you, supposed already in possession of this island, which has never been ceded bythe King of Spain, or by its inhabitants, to the United States, can bring with you a competent tribunal to decide upon this question. The only law you can adduce in your favor is that of force, which is always repugnant to republican Governments and to the principles of a just and impartial nation. The same observation may be applied to your interference with the property of the inhabitants, which we have always respected and considered as sacred.

You order us, also, as if we were subjects of your Government, to leave behind, when Fernandina is evacuated, all the public property that was found at its surrender. This demand is directly contrary to the public rights by which all public property captured by the enemy is avowedly that of the captors, when not otherwise stipulated. Are you acting in the name of the King of Spain or his allies? As we consider the people of the United States as unquestionably the only free people on the surface of the globe, we cannot admit that you have now become the adherents of a tyrant; otherwise, your demand is inadmissible and unjustifiable in the eyes of the world; and if we must yield to it, all the blame rests with you.

Permit me, therefore, gentlemen, to request of you to lay before the President of the United States these remarks, in order that a matter of so serious a tendency may be reconsidered. We have read his excellency's message at the opening of Congress with the utmost concern, and I have concluded that the political situation of this republic has been greatly misrepresented in the United States, through the intrigues of our enemies. We have certainly a right to be heard, for which purpose I shall have the honor of forwarding to your Government the necessary documents. If you are not disposed to let things remain in statu quo until the President's further determination be known, I am authorized to assure you that we respect and esteem too highly the people of the United States to carry matters to extremities.

I have the honor to remain, &c.

AURY, Commander-in-chief.

UNITED STATES SHIP JOHN ADAMS,
OFF AMELIA ISLAND, December 23, 1817.

SIR:

We have had the honor to receive your communication of the 22d instant, and will briefly remark, that, as officers in the service of the United States, we are bound to obey the orders emanating from the authorities of our Government, without any discussion or animadversion on our part as to the correctness of them. We have been ordered by the President of the United States to take possession of Amelia island; and as the President has expressed his solicitude that the effusion of blood may be avoided, if possible, it must be gratifying to us to be informed by you that no resistance will be made to us.

We will again remark, that private property will be sacred, and that our orders extend only to the public property captured by General McGregor at Fernandina.

We propose to land a force to-day, and to hoist the American flag; under that flag, no oppression or unjust measures will ever be witnessed. And we feel assured that there will be no difficulties in the arrangement made by us.

The squadron will immediately sail into the harbor, when the commanding officer of the land forces will wait on the commander-in-chief to make the necessary arrangements for the landing of the troops.

We have the honor to be, &c.

J. D. HENLEY, Captain in the navy, &c.
J. BANKHEAD, Major 1st battalion artillery, &c.

Gen. AURY, Commander-in-chief of the forces at Fernandina.

HEAD-QUARTERS, FERNANDINA, ISLAND OF AMELIA,
December 23, 1817, and 8th of the Independence.

I have had the honor to receive your letter of this date. I am ready to surrender this place to the forces under your command, whenever you may judge proper to come and take possession thereof.

I have the honor to be, &c.

AURY.

SIR: DEPARTMENT OF WAR, July 17, 1817.

Circumstances having made it necessary to occupy, without delay, Point Petre and the St. Mary's river, by a military and naval force, I have to request that you will instruct the officer whom, in pursuance of the order issued through the adjutant general, you may detail to take command at Point Petre, to co-operate with the officer commanding the naval force on that station, in such measures as may be deemed necessary for the preservation of the peace and tranquillity of that section of the country, which there is reason to apprehend may be disturbed in consequence of the contest between the Spanish royalists and patriots for the occupation of the adjacent territory. The officer will also be instructed to use due vigilance to prevent the violation of the revenue laws of the United States, and in particular to prevent the illicit introduction of slaves into the United States; and, in order to do this the more effectually, he will prohibit all vessels freighted with slaves from entering the river St. Mary's.

I have the honor to be, &c.

GEORGE GRAHAM.

The OFFICER commanding at Charleston, S. C.

Extract of a letter from George Graham, acting Secretary of War, to Major James Bankhead, Charleston, South Carolina, dated

NOVEMBER 12, 1817.

I am instructed by the President to direct you to repair immediately to Point Petre, with the effective force under your command, leaving only an officer and a few men as a guard at Forts Moultrie and Johnson. Captain Wilson has been ordered to repair with his company now at Fort Johnson, North Carolina, to Point Petre; and a detachment of new recruits, under the command of Captain Hook, who was on his route to join the 4th infantry, has also been ordered to that place. The troops enumerated above, and those now stationed at Point Petre, will constitute a force of more than two hundred men, of which you will take the command, until the arrival of General Gaines. A remittance of five thousand dollars has been made to your battalion quartermaster, whom you will take with you; and you will make requisitions for the necessary supply of provisions on the contractor's agents. It will be advisable to take from Charleston, a supply of salted meat, and a sufficient quantity of flour and hard bread to serve two hundred and fifty men for thirty days at least.

SIR: DEPARTMENT OF WAR, November 12, 1817.

It appearing to the satisfaction of the President that the persons who have lately taken possession of Amelia island have done it without the sanction of any of the Spanish colonies, or of any organized Government whatever, and for purposes unfriendly to and incompatible with the interests of the United States, he has decided to break up that establishment, and take temporary possession of Amelia island. For this purpose the troops ordered to assemble at Point Petre will co-operate with the naval force which has been ordered to St. Mary's under the command of Captain Henley.

It is the anxious wish of the President that this should be accomplished without the effusion of blood; and he confidently hopes that the force destined for the purpose will be of such an imposing character as to induce those persons who now have the military occupation of the island to abandon it without the exercise of force; but if it should be found to be indispensably necessary, force must be used. You will, therefore, immediately on the arrival of Captain Henley at St. Mary's, and in conjunction with him, despatch an officer to demand the abandonment of the island by those who now exercise authority there, and take such other measures as may be deemed proper to obtain the peaceable possession of it; also for the preservation of the property of those persons who were residents of the island when it was first captured by General McGregor. Should your demand for the evacuation of Amelia be complied with, you will then occupy with a part of your force the position of Fernandina, and take care that the cannon and other implements of war which belonged to the port, when captured by General McGregor, are not taken off.

If peaceable possession of the island, however, cannot be obtained, and it should be the opinion of Captain Henley and yourself that your joint forces are not competent to the prompt and certain reduction of the naval and military forces which may then occupy the harbor and post of Fernandina, you will, in that event, make a requisition on General Floyd, or such other officer as may command that division of the militia of Georgia in which Point Petre is situated, for a force not exceeding five hundred men, to be held in readiness to march at a moment's warning, and await the arrival of General Gaines, who has been ordered to Point Petre, for ulterior measures.

You will take with you from Charleston the necessary military stores, and such heavy cannon as may be required for the reduction of the fort on Amelia island, in the event of resistance.

As no answer has been received to the communication addressed to you from this Department on the 17th July last, it becomes necessary to request that the receipt of this may be acknowledged, and that you also advise this Department regularly of your movements.

I have the honor to be, &c.

GEORGE GRAHAM.

Major JAMES BANKHEAD, commanding at Charleston, S. C.

SIR: FERNANDINA, AMELIA ISLAND, December 24, 1817.

I have the honor to lay before you the correspondence held with General Aury, the late commander of this place, and to inform you that the American flag was raised here yesterday afternoon.

Several days will elapse before General Aury can withdraw his followers; but I have taken every measure to insure tranquillity, by ordering all his black soldiers to be embarked on board one of the ships lying in the port, and by not suffering any person to appear in the town with arms, but his officers; and the moment their vessels are prepared to receive the whole of them, they shall depart.

Most of the inhabitants of this place, at this time, are followers of Aury, and those persons who have been drawn here from motives of speculation, who are, I suspect, of that profligate character generally engaged in the violation or evasion of our revenue laws. I shall, therefore, consult with Commodore Henley, and will enforce such regulations as may be most likely to preserve order, until I receive instructions from the Government.

Until this place is completely evacuated by this band of negroes and privateersmen, I have deemed it prudent to keep the whole of my force here. On their departure I shall move all but one company to Point Petre.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JAS. BANKHEAD,

Major 1st battalion artillery, S. D., commanding detachment U. S. troops.

GEORGE GRAHAM, Esq., acting Secretary of War.

SIR: FERNANDINA, AMELIA ISLAND, December 27, 1817.

I had the honor to forward to the War Department, on the 24th instant, a copy of the correspondence with General Aury, previous to the landing of the troops under my command; and I herewith send a duplicate of the same.

Some difficulty has arisen from a want of competent authority to settle the disputed claims of the residents of this place against the late Government and the followers of Aury, who do not seem disposed to comply with their engagements.

One or two vessels have arrived here with cargoes, which the owners are desirous to land; and it might be improper to permit it, without obtaining security for the duties which the laws of the United States require; and other vessels, loaded in this port, have met with some delay in clearing for their destination; but the counsel of General Gaines, who arrived here last night, will regulate my conduct, and will, in a great measure, relieve my anxiety.

I have been obliged to exercise my authority, as commanding officer at this place, to preserve order; and I am happy to say that nothing unpleasant has occurred. I cannot say when General Aury and his party will sail. Their vessels are much out of order, and their arrangements to that effect progress but slowly. The morning after I landed I ordered all the black and French troops to be embarked on board some of their vessels; but the crews of their privateers, and many others of all nations, whom it is difficult to restrain from violence and excess, are still here.

Until I am honored with your instructions, I hope that the course I may pursue may meet the approbation of the President.

General Gaines leaves this for the western frontier of Georgia the day after to-morrow.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JAS. BANKHEAD,

Major 1st battalion artillery, and commanding this port.

To the honorable the SECRETARY OF WAR.

SIR: NAVY DEPARTMENT, January 13, 1818.

I have the honor to enclose, herewith, copies of orders to Captain John H. Elton and Commodore John D. Henley, in relation to Amelia island; also a letter from the latter officer, communicating information of the surrender of that place to the military and naval force of the United States, together with the correspondence which took place on that occasion.

I have the honor to be, &c.

B. W. CROWNINSHIELD.

To the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

SIR: NAVY DEPARTMENT, July 16, 1817.

Proceed immediately with the United States brig Saranac under your command to the river St. Mary's in Georgia, and inform the military commander of your arrival, and of the objects specially designated to you in these orders.

The recent occupation of Amelia island by an officer in the service of the Spanish revolutionists occasions just apprehensions that, from the vicinity to the coast of Georgia, attempts will be made to introduce slaves into the United States contrary to the existing laws, and further attempts at illicit trade in smuggling goods, in violation of our revenue laws.

You are hereby directed to detain and search every vessel, under whatever flag, which may enter the river St. Mary's, or be found hovering upon the coast under suspicious circumstances, and seize every vessel freighted with slaves, or whose doubtful character and situation shall indicate an intention of smuggling.

In the execution of these orders, you will take special care not to interrupt or detain any vessels sailing with regular papers, and of a national character, upon lawful voyages to or from a port or ports of the United States.

The traffic in slaves is intended to be restrained, and in the performance of this duty you will exercise your sound judgment in regard to all vessels you may visit.

Communicate frequently to this Department every event connected with this service; and if it shall be found necessary, a further naval force will be sent, either to strengthen your command, or to relieve you so as to pursue your original destination. If you find it necessary, upon your arrival at St. Mary's, to employ a good pilot well acquainted with the coast, rivers, and inlets, you are authorized to do so.

I am, very respectfully, &c.

B. W. CROWNINSHIELD.

Captain JOHN H. ELTON,
Commanding United States brig Saranac, New York.

SIR: NAVY DEPARTMENT, November 14, 1817.

Having been appointed to the command of the United States ship John Adams, you are hereby ordered, in conformity to the wishes of the President of the United States, to proceed forthwith to the port of St. Mary's, in Georgia, taking with you the United States brigs Enterprise and Prometheus, and the shooner Lynx, if the two latter have arrived in New York, and are in a state of readiness to accompany you; but you will not procrastinate the departure of the ship John Adams on account of these vessels, as any of them not fully prepared to proceed with you shall be ordered to join you as soon as practicable at St. Mary's, at which place you will find the United States brig Saranac, Captain John H. Elton, and gun-boat No. 168, Lieutenant Commandant R. McCall; both of which vessels will act under your orders.

The object of the President of the United States in ordering this naval force to St. Mary's is to remove from Amelia island the persons who have lately taken possession thereof, and, as it is understood and believed, without authority from the colonies, or any organized Government whatever, and to the great annoyance of the United States. It has therefore been determined that these persons shall be removed from that island, and that possession shall be taken, for the present, by the land and naval forces of the United States.

On your arrival at St. Mary's, you will consult with the officer commanding the military force, who is instructed to co-operate with you in the performance of this service.

It is hoped that these persons will withdraw without bloodshed; and you will, for this purpose, should your relative rank be superior to that of the commanding officer of the land forces, make known to the chief commanding in Amelia the determination of the Government of the United States to take possession of the island; and if the said chief, and the armed forces under his command, will peaceably quit the island, you will permit them so to do, taking special care that no depredations be committed on the inhabitants, whom it will be your duty to protect from violation or injury, either in their persons or property.

Should the force, however, now in command of the island, contrary to all expectations, resist and refuse absolutely to give up and abandon the same, you are, in co-operation with the military force of the United States, to proceed and take possession of the island in the name and by the authority of the United States.

Should you fall in with, on your way to St. Mary's, or find in Amelia, any vessels from the United States, armed and equipped by American citizens, acting as privateers, contrary to the laws of the United States, you will capture such, and send them to Savannah, in Georgia, to be dealt with according to law.

You will detain all prizes, or other vessels having slaves on board, as the presumption is strong that they are intended to be smuggled into the United States. You will report, from time to time, to this Department the operations of the force under your command.

I am, very respectfully, &c.

Commodore J. D. HENLEY. B. W. CROWNINSHIELD.

P. S. These orders are not to be delivered to any person.

SIR: UNITED STATES SHIP JOHN ADAMS, OFF AMELIA, December 24, 1817.

I have the honor to transmit a copy of the correspondence with General Aury, late commander of this place, and to inform you that the American flag was yesterday hoisted at Fernandina, and the island of Amelia taken possession of by the land forces under Major Bankhead, of the United States artillery.

The black troops of General Aury have been embarked on board one of their ships lying in the port, and the remainder of his followers will be sent off the island as soon as the necessary arrangement can be made for the purpose. They are now engaged in watering their ships, and in the course of a week I hope to see all of them over the bar.

Most of the respectable inhabitants of this place retired on its capture by McGregor, and those now here are principally adventurers, who have been attracted by motives of speculation, and, as I suspect, and have every reason to believe, been engaged in the violation of our revenue laws; to prevent which in future, such precautions will be taken as are within my power, and which will, I presume, be adequate to the purpose.

I have not yet been able to examine the ship, and therefore can give you but little further information than was contained in my last communication. The leaks (the principal of which is about two feet under water) still continue, so that we make twenty inches of water per hour—and this lying in port. We are obliged to examine the magazine twice a day, to clear it of the water. I shall land all the powder immediately, to prevent any further damage. The bread, except a very small quantity, is entirely ruined, and unfit for use. I shall order a survey to ascertain the exact quantity of stores damaged, and inform you as early as circumstances will admit.

I shall also inform you by the next mail (which leaves St. Mary's on Saturday next) more particularly of the state of the ship than has heretofore been in my power; the object of the expedition not having been effected rendering it impracticable to examine her thoroughly. I am, however, entirely convinced, in my own mind, that the battery now on the ship is too heavy for her; so much so, that I should deem her unsafe for a long cruise.

This will be sent by an express to Darien, the mail leaving this place but once a week.

I have the honor to be, &c.

J. D. HENLEY.

The Hon. B. W. CROWNINSHIELD, Secretary of the Navy.

SIR: UNITED STATES SHIP JOHN ADAMS, OFF AMELIA, December 30, 1817.

Since my arrival here, I have been so much engaged that I have not had one moment to write to my friends. You, no doubt, however, have some idea of my situation, and, from my official reports, know that the American flag is now flying on Amelia island. As there are many novel cases which must present themselves, I should have been better pleased had my instructions been full; but we are now left to act as circumstances may require, and I am fearful that Aury and his followers will give us much trouble before they quit the island. I am sorry to add that the Americans appear to be much worse than any others. Should we be able to get through this business, so as to meet the approbation of the Department, I shall feel much gratified; but I trust, should I err in any steps that I may take, that it will be considered by the President as an error of judgment; for I do assure you that nothing would be so pleasing to me as to have my conduct here approved by the Executive. I have endeavored to keep as close to the letter of my instructions as possible, and have avoided every difficulty that I possibly could. I regret very much the difficulty of communicating with the Government. We have only one mail per week, and that does not remain in St. Mary's long enough to enable us to answer letters that we may receive by it.

The situation of my ships you are no doubt acquainted with, as I have written several times to the Secretary on that subject. I, however, do not wish to leave this place until every thing is settled, and the Government have established some kind of police for the better government of this place, which, I am in hopes, will take place ere long. I am fearful that Aury expects that the American Government will relinquish Amelia, which impression will retard his departure.

I have the honor to be, sir, &c.

J. D. HENLEY.

SPAIN—IMPRISONMENT OF RICHARD W. MEADE.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, JANUARY 29, 1818.

To the House of Representatives of the United States: JANUARY 29, 1818.

In compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 23d of December last, requesting information relative to the imprisonment and detention in confinement of Richard W. Meade, a citizen of the United States, I now transmit to the House a report from the Secretary of State containing the information required.

JAMES MONROE.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, January 28, 1816.

The Secretary of State, to whom was referred the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 23d of December last, requesting the President to cause to be laid before the House any information he may be able to communicate relative to the imprisonment and detention in confinement of Richard W. Meade, a citizen of the United States, has the honor of submitting to the President the accompanying papers received at the Department on that subject; with a letter addressed to the minister of Spain, residing here, since the resolution of the House, and the answer received from him.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

[Correspondence concerning Richard W. Meade, communicated to the Department of State by Mr. Erving.]

No. 1.

Mr. Erving to Mr. Monroe.

MADRID, September 28, 1816.

SIR:

Perceiving by the public papers that the case of R. W. Meade, a citizen of the United States, for many years established at Cadiz in commerce, and now suffering in prison by order of this Government, has excited considerable sensation in America, it seems to be proper that I should submit to you my correspondence with Mr. Cevallos on this subject.

I have herewith the honor to enclose my note to that minister of August 27th, his reply of September 10th, and my further note of September 16th. To this last I have not yet received an answer.

I have the honor to be, &c.

GEORGE W. ERVING.

No. 2.

Mr. Erving to his excellency Don Pedro Cevallos, First Minister of State, &c.

MADRID, August 27, 1816.

SIR:

It is my duty to recall the attention of His Majesty's Government to the case of Richard W. Meade, a citizen of the United States, who is imprisoned by the authorities at Cadiz, under semblance of law and of His Majesty's authority, but, as must be presumed, against his will, and, as can be substantiated, against his orders issued on the 10th August, 1815.

A particular statement of circumstances of the case was transmitted to your excellency by the secretary of this legation, in a note of July 8th last; it is, therefore, needless that I should now recite them.

I propose to refer to your documents only, each of them of principal importance, and which, taken in their connexion, point out most distinctly and indisputably the illegality of the proceedings against Mr. Meade, and the course which consistency, as well as justice, requires to be now taken for his relief.

The documents to which I refer, and copies of which are herewith enclosed, are, viz:

No. 1. An order of the consulado of Cadiz, dated February 18th, 1814, directing Meade to deposite in the office of the Treasury General of the province a certain sum of money, respecting which a process was then pending in the said consulado.

No. 2. The receipt of the Intendant of the Treasury for the deposite made by Meade, pursuant to the order of the consulado.

No. 3. The reply of the Intendant of the Consulado, when that tribunal inquired as to the nature of the deposite made.

No. 4. A royal decree of August 10, 1815, suspending the further proceedings of the consulado, till the Treasury should be able to collect funds for the purpose of restoring the sum deposited by Meade.

It is not my intention, for it would be altogether useless, to enter into a history of the original transactions upon which, finally, a suit was brought before the consulado of Cadiz against Mr. Meade, and is now continued in the name of Mr. John McDermot.

Meade always held the moneys in question, to be paid over in legal form as the competent authorities should direct.

Your excellency will, I am persuaded, now examine the affair with impartiality, and free from the impressions unfavorable to this American with which it has been attempted to pre-occupy your judgment. If it were my duty, on the other hand, to state what ought to be his personal merits in the view of this Government, I should dwell upon the very extensive and important services which, as a merchant and a capitalist, he rendered to Spain in the crisis of her affairs the most trying and difficult. It ought surely to be known to your excellency that he contributed most essentially to the cause of this country, by giving large credits to its occasional Governments, and that for these services he is not yet reimbursed. But I have not to ask any favor for him. I desire but strict and impartial justice; and I found my claim to his immediate release from prison on the acts of the Government in whose name, and of the very tribunal by which, he is now imprisoned.

By the first two of the enclosed documents, your excellency will perceive that Mr. Meade, submitting to the orders of the consulado, paid the amount of the moneys in suit into the treasury of the province. The payment is said to have been effected in "libramientos," or receipts for libramientos of the Treasury General, or Intendant; credits of Meade with the Treasury, which were payable in specie, and which were to be paid in specie within a few days. The Intendant, therefore, readily gave to Meade the receipt (No. 2) for a deposite in specie, the libramientos being cancelled, and passed to the several accounts to which they belonged. Thus, therefore, every legal and formal requisite being complied with, Meade was exonerated from all responsibility; and, to make his irresponsibility still more perfect, if that were possible, the Intendant wrote to the consulado, (No. 3,) stating expressly that the deposite had been made in specie, and that he would respond to the consulado for specie.

After such conclusive proceedings, it would seem impossible that Mr. Meade could be again questioned by the tribunal in the same matter.

Was the tribunal wrong in ordering him to make the deposite? Sibi imputent—let it answer for its own errors. Was the Intendant culpable in receiving the libramientos as specie? He is then to be censured. But he has expressly made himself responsible to the consulado for specie; let him then be held to that responsibility. These may be questions between the Government and its officers, but it is certainly highly unjust that an individual should be sacrificed to repair their errors. Will it be said that the libramientos delivered to the Treasury, and credited to Meade as cash, and held by the Treasury in deposite, and promised by the Intendant to be paid over as cash, are not, in fact, equivalent to cash? Certainly not. The Government will not pass this condemnation on its own securities. But if the contrary supposition were admissible, even then Mr. Meade remains exempt from all responsibility; for the libramientos in question have been already passed into account, as paid in specie, and have been cancelled by the officer who had the competent authority to do so. Nevertheless, the consulado, which, by its own act, had precluded itself from all further jurisdiction over Mr. Meade in this matter, still persisted in its process against him, and decreed that he should pay over to that tribunal the sum which he had previously deposited, by its own order, in the treasury. Against this injustice, Mr. Meade appealed to the superior tribunal of the province; but its interference was overruled by the tribunal of war at Madrid; and this latter confirmed the sentence of the consulado of Cadiz.

Mr. Meade was then obliged to resort to the sovereign, who issued the decree of August 10, 1815. This decree is, in all its parts, perfectly just. It suspends the proceedings of the consulado against Meade, and acknowledges the validity of the deposite made, by directing as it were funds to be collected for effecting the return of the money by the Intendant, to the end that it might be paid into the consulado; and that, in the mean time, till funds be collected for the purpose of effecting the return of this deposite, the tribunal of commerce shall suspend all proceedings against Meade, &c.

Of this decree neither party can complain; how, then, has it been reversed? If there has been any delay in the payment to be made by the Treasury, that is not Meade's fault; the decree is illimited; it orders all proceedings against him to be suspended till that object be effected.

It is not my purpose to call into question the justice of Mr. McDermot's demand, or to blame any of his proceedings; but what I state with confidence is, that his claim is now properly on the treasury or Intendant. If the consulado or Intendant have, in the course of their proceedings, changed the situation of Mr. McDermot's case for the worse, they have done him wrong, and it is of them that he should complain; but they have acted in virtue of their regular faculties, and have exonerated Mr. Meade; or had their conduct been even illegal, yet Meade cannot be made responsible for it: he had not any control over them, or any means of resisting them.

It was very natural for him to offer the deposite in libramientos, but he did not force the Intendant to receive them; that was his own act. Nor, indeed, does there appear to have been any thing irregular in that act, since payment was due by the treasury on the libramientos. The transaction was then the same, in effect, as though the intendant had paid to Meade the amount of the libramientos in specie, and then received back that specie in deposite; and it was effected in that form also; so that, if there was any fault in the Intendant, it was that of paying Meade what was due to him. But this, I presume, cannot be called a fault, or, if so, the transaction cannot be vitiated by it. The Intendant, then, having informed the consulado that the deposite had been made in specie, and that he was responsible to the consulado for specie, Mr. Meade is of course exempt from all further process; and the royal decree above cited considered him so to be.

But now, sir, a second time this consulado, which, as I have shown, having ordered Mr. Meade to deposite in the treasury, did thus, by its own act, absolve him from its jurisdiction, renews its demand on him for another deposite to the same amount, and, in defiance of His Majesty's decree, on Meade's non-compliance, has thrown him into a dungeon.

Surely there cannot be any law to authorize the imprisonment, as a condemned felon, of a defendant in an action for debt yet pending; much less can it be permitted that any authority should amend its own faults and errors by sacrificing the liberty, property, and domestic happiness of an individual; and still less is it possible that His Majesty should allow the continuance of such proceedings in a case where his own treasury is the depository of the funds in question, which, by his own decree, have been ordered to be paid over in satisfaction of the judgment. It is with entire confidence, therefore, that I request your excellency to lay this representation before the King; not doubting but that he will order that Mr. Meade be immediately released from confinement, and that the royal decree of August 10, 1815, be maintained and observed.

I have, &c.

Don Pedro Cevallos to Mr. Erving, Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States, Madrid.

SIR: PALACE, September 10, 1816.

I have given an account to His Majesty of your note of the 27th of last month, relative to Mr. Richard Meade; and it is His Majesty's pleasure that I should inform you, that as his case is pending before the supreme council of war, he must have recourse to it.

By His Majesty's orders, the council of war presented to His Majesty a report on the affair pending in the tribunals of Spain between the creditors of a commercial house in London, in a state of failure, and Mr. Richard Meade.

It states the restitution of a deposite of upwards of $50,000 in specie, made to Meade by the said house in failure at London, and that he attempted to restore the money demanded of him in credits of the Treasury.

The council reports against Meade, and states that he availed himself of this circumstance with a view to surprise the equity of the sovereign to the very great injury of strict justice, of the interests of the bankrupt house and of its creditors; and afterwards gave it as their opinion (dictamen) that His Majesty ought not, in opposition to the laws, to agree to the petition of Meade, who should deliver up the aforesaid deposite, in like manner, and in the same specie as he had received it, or give full, clear, and sufficient security, to the satisfaction of the tribunal of commerce of Cadiz; and, in default thereof, to be removed to a public prison, to prevent all evasion of the sentence against him.

His Majesty thereupon assented to the opinion (dictamen) of the council, to which Meade is to conform.

Mr. Erving to Mr. Cevallos.

SIR: MADRID, September 16, 1816.

On the 13th instant I received your excellency's note of the 10th instant, in reply to mine of 27th August, respecting the case of R. W. Meade, a citizen of the United States, now detained in a felons' prison at Cadiz. I had required that Mr. Meade should be released from his confinement, because, on a review of the proceedings against him, and reference to the documents enclosed in my note of August 27, I found that those proceedings were unjust, since the object of them was to compel him to pay a sum of money which he had already paid in virtue of a judicial decree; and illegal, as well for that reason as because they were in violation of His Majesty's own decree of August 14, 1815.

Your excellency has not thought proper to revert to these antecedents, but you have been pleased to confine yourself to a simple narrative of what has passed in the council of war subsequent to the date of His Majesty's decree, and upon this ground to refer the party aggrieved to this same council of war. If I understood your excellency's note aright, it states that a posterior decision of the council of war has declared His Majesty's decree of August 14, 1815, to be unjust and illegal, and has advised His Majesty to reverse it, and to put Mr. Meade in prison, until he shall have paid the sum demanded of him; and further, that His Majesty has complied with this extraordinary dictamen; that thus Meade is actually in prison, with the knowledge and consent of His Majesty, who has thought proper to render his own decree a dead letter. These are facts which I could not suppose to have existed, and to which I should have found it very difficult to have given credit, had I not thus received them from your excellency. In truth, they may be considered as determining the perpetual imprisonment of Mr. Meade; for it cannot be imagined, even if he be able to pay, that he will ever consent to pay a second time that sum which he has before deposited in His Majesty's treasury, and for which the treasury has formally made itself responsible.

In this last consulta of the council of war, it is stated that Mr. Meade attempted to restore the money demanded of him in credits of the Treasury, (intenta devolver en papeles de credita contra Tesoreria.) By this phraseology the fact has been concealed from His Majesty of the payment which was actually made by Meade to the Treasurer General, for the amount of which, in specie, the said Treasurer General formally made himself responsible to the consulado.

This fact, I say, was not stated to His Majesty, as it should have been, by the council of war. If your excellency will take the trouble of reverting to my note of the 27th ultimo, you will see that it is therein specially set forth, supported by conclusive documentary proof, and that upon it is very principally founded the reclamation which I have made in favor of Mr. Meade.

This remains, then, in all its former force, and altogether unanswered by your excellency's note. But to simplify the case as much as possible, to disembarrass it of all legal questions and discussions arising out of Mr. McDermot's claim, or belonging to the antecedent proceedings; in fine, that both parties may have justice in a mode comporting with the good faith and consistency of the Government, I now place my demand in another form.

Considering that Mr. Meade, in pursuance of a judicial decision of the consulado of Cadiz, did, on the 19th of February, 1814, pay into the office of the Treasurer General of the province the sum of 1,050,327*v.;*

Considering that the said Treasurer General did acknowledge the said payment to have been made in specie, and did promise to repay specie whenever called upon;

Finally, considering that the funds in question are actually in the royal treasury;

For these reasons, I require that the Treasurer General be ordered immediately to pay over the same funds, in specie, to whomsoever the consulado of Cadiz shall appoint to receive them.

I renew, &c.

SIR: OCTOBER 17, 1816.

Having laid before the King your note of the 16th of September last, relative to Mr. Richard Meade, I have received His Majesty's commands to inform you that the affair of this individual being under the especial cognizance of the supreme council of war, it is to this tribunal that his reclamations must be addressed.

I renew to you, &c.

No. 6.

Mr. Erving to Mr. Cevallos.

SIR: MADRID, October 21, 1816.

In a note of September 16, upon the case of R. W. Meade, an American citizen in prison at Cadiz, I required that the Treasurer General of that district should be ordered to pay over to such person as the consulado of Cadiz should appoint to receive the same the moneys which have been deposited with the said Treasurer General by said Meade, in obedience to a judicial order of the said consulado.

In your excellency's reply of the 17th instant, you are pleased to tell me that the affairs of Mr. Meade being rooted (radicados) in the supreme council of war, to that tribunal he ought to resort.

In this your excellency has reference, I presume, to a certain suit brought against Mr. Meade by Mr. John McDermot; you certainly do not mean to be understood that all affairs whatever of Mr. Meade are to be subjected to the decision of the council of war, nor can I conceive that any such connexion between the suit of Mr. McDermot and the demands of Mr. Meade on His Majesty's treasury can be established as can bring these last within the cognizance of that tribunal.

Permit me to ask whether the supreme council of war has the faculty of ordering the Treasurer General of Andalusia to pay over the funds which Mr. Meade deposited with him to such persons as the consulado of Cadiz may appoint to receive them?

If so, I will request your excellency to lay before that tribunal the demand made in my last note, according to the practice in similar cases; but if the tribunal of war has no such faculty, then the order which I have requested can be given only by the Executive Government. My application for its interference was perfectly correct, and your excellency's reference to the tribunal is, as to any useful object, perfectly nugatory; for Mr. Meade must necessarily be answered that the tribunal has not any control over His Majesty's treasury. I had flattered myself with a hope that, in our conference on the 5th instant, I had succeeded in convincing your excellency that the case between Mr. Meade and Mr. McDermot, and that between Mr. Meade and His Majesty's treasury, were altogether distinct. I do not solicit any act of injustice against Mr. McDermot, and I ought to presume that it is His Majesty's desire to do justice to Mr. Meade. In acceding to my demand in his favor, your excellency will accomplish that desire; and so far from impugning the claims of Mr. McDermot, the effect of the measure will be to satisfy them by payment, and to extinguish all the processes to which they had given rise.

I do trust, then, on reconsidering the case, your excellency will perceive that only two inquiries are necessary, viz: whether Mr. Meade did, by order of the consulado, deposite the funds in question with the Treasurer General; and whether they yet exist in the hands of the Treasurer. Of these facts I have already laid before you indisputable proofs in the papers marked Nos. 1, 2, 3, transmitted to you with my note of August 27, viz: No. 1. The order of the consulado, directing Meade to deposite. No. 2. The receipt of the Treasurer General for the deposite made. No. 3. The acknowledgment of the Treasurer that he holds said deposite in specie, subject to the orders of the consulado. It is for want of these funds now in His Majesty's treasury, that Mr. Meade is in prison; the payment of them to the order of the consulado will quiet all claims, and satisfy all parties, and will not interfere with the jurisdiction, or require the intermediation of any tribunal whatever.

He recurs, then, to the King, whose power to enforce is as indisputable as his disposition to do right; and I, on his part, require only the plainest act of justice when I demand that an express royal order be issued for his immediate liberation from prison, and for the payment of the funds deposited by him in the royal treasury of the province to the consulado of Cadiz, or to such person as it may appoint to receive the same.

SIR: PALACE, November 7, 1816.

I have laid before His Majesty your note of the 21st of last month, in which you insist that the sums deposited by Mr. R. Meade in the royal treasury should be paid over to the tribunal of commerce of Cadiz, or to whomsoever it may authorize to receive them. This affair appertaining to the Ministry of the Treasury, His Majesty has been pleased to determine that your said note be transmitted to the Secretary of that Department, that, through his channel, it may again be submitted to His Majesty's decision.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Erving to the Secretary of State, dated

MADRID, May 12, 1817.

By my despatches Nos. 20, 23, 26, I had the honor to submit to you copies of the first part of my correspondence with the Spanish Secretary of State, on the case of Richard W. Meade. As that gentleman, despairing of the success of my efforts in his favor, desires that the whole of his case may be laid before you, I now transmit copies of all the notes which have passed on it since the month of November.

No. 9.

Mr. Erving to Mr. Pizarro.

SIR: MADRID, December 25, 1816.

On the 7th November your excellency replied to my note of 21st of October, on the case of R. W. Meade, an American citizen in prison at Cadiz, that you had transmitted the same to the Minister of Hacienda, that the royal resolution might be given through that ministry. In consequence, as I presume, of your excellency's communication to the Minister of Hacienda, Mr. Navarrete, the Treasurer General, wrote to the consulado of Cadiz on the 19th November; the answer of that tribunal is dated on the 29th November. It is completely satisfactory and in perfect accord with what I have stated to you on the case. Why a copy of it has not been already transmitted to you, I will not undertake to conjecture; but seeing that this document, as well as others in the cause, do virtually confess that the proceedings against Mr. Meade are of the unjust and violent character which I have attributed to them, and that every unnecessary delay is an augmentation of the injustice, as I ought to believe, and am persuaded, entirely contrary to the disposition of His Majesty—for these reasons I pray your excellency to demand from the Minister of Hacienda a copy of Mr. Navaretti's aforesaid correspondence with the consulado, and to lay it, in conjunction with my representations, before His Majesty.

GEORGE W. ERVING.

No. 10.

Mr. Erving to Mr. Pizarro.

SIR: MADRID, March 14, 1817.

In a note of September 16, 1816, to your excellency's predecessor, I required that the Treasurer General of the district of Cadiz should be ordered to pay, to such person as the consulado of Cadiz should appoint to receive the same, a certain sum of money, which had been deposited with said Treasurer by R. W. Meade, an American citizen, in obedience to an order of said consulado, and for which sum said Meade then was, as he still is, held in prison.

Having been answered by Mr. Cevallos, generally, that the affair of Mr. Meade was before the council of war, I insisted on my former demand, (in a further note of October 21,) showing to the minister that it had no necessary connexion with any process depending before the council of war; and further, that it was not possible for the council to satisfy my reclamation, even if it should be disposed to do so, because it had no faculty to give such orders to His Majesty's Treasurer as I had desired.

In answer to that note, your excellency was pleased to inform me, on the 7th November, that as my demand related to the duties of the Minister of Hacienda, His Majesty had resolved that my note of 21st October should be passed to that minister, to the end that through that department the royal resolution should be given. ("Se pasa la citada nota al señor Secretario de dicho Departimiento para que por su conducto recayga la real resolucion.")

In consequence, I presume, of this measure, the Treasurer General, Señor Navarrete, wrote to the consulado of Cadiz, on the 19th November, requiring that tribunal to inform him particularly as to the aforesaid deposite. The consulado replied to the Treasurer on the 29th November that the deposite had been made by its order; that it had been made "in effective specie," ("en libramientos de plata effectiva;") that it existed at the treasury; and that the Treasurer had made himself responsible to the said consulado for the amount.

I annex to this note a copy of that most important correspondence between the Treasurer and the consulado, and which your excellency was pleased also to procure a copy of from the Minister of Hacienda, pursuant to the request contained in my note of December 25.

This correspondence leaves not the least doubt as to the nature of the deposite, or its actual existence; and I assured myself that it was all that could be desired, and that it must necessarily produce an immediate order for the release of Mr. Meade from prison. I am therefore much surprised to find that the affair, instead of having been despatched, as I understood by your excellency's note of November 7 that it would be, has again fallen back into the hands of the council of war; which tribunal, as before observed, cannot have any control over the operations of His Majesty's treasury.

If the council of war should enter into any inquiry as to the nature of the deposite, can the result, whatever it may be, of that inquiry, be opposed to the complete, plain, unequivocal declaration of the consulado of Cadiz, the very tribunal by order of which the deposite was made, which is most interested to ascertain its nature, and its actual existence? But in no view can it be of the least importance in considering, or should it have the least influence in deciding, upon my reclamation, whether the deposite is, or is not, satisfactory to the council of war; and therefore I will not here enter into its past and present proceedings, nor will I advise Mr. Meade to appear before that tribunal to prove any thing which may relate to the nature of that deposite. It is sufficient that the deposite was made by the order of the consulado; that it was paid into His Majesty's treasury, and is now there. All this is proved by the confession of the consulado itself; and I cannot acknowledge the justice of any plea for holding Mr. Meade in prison, by a decision of another of His Majesty's tribunals, for the very sum thus deposited.

His Majesty's treasury has the money in question. Mr. Meade is suffering in prison under His Majesty's authority! What can be more simple than the course pointed out by justice in this case?

As the representative of the American Government, the natural protector of its citizens against all injustice, I appeal directly to His Catholic Majesty against the injustice of those acting in his name and under his authority; and I request your excellency, as the proper channel of communication, to lay my reclamation before him. And if His Majesty should desire to be more particularly informed of the proceedings of the council of war, and of all the persecutions which this American citizen (who, I cannot but remind your excellency, so much contributed to support the cause of Spain in the most critical epoch of her affairs) has suffered; then if His Majesty will condescend to peruse the last memorial which Mr. Meade addressed to him, he will, I doubt not, see enough to reprehend.

SIR: MADRID, March 24, 1817.

With my note of the 14th instant upon the case of R. W. Meade, an American citizen confined in the castle at Cadiz, I transmitted to your excellency what ought to be considered as the most satisfactory and conclusive evidence relative to the nature and the actual existence of the deposite made by him in the royal treasury of that district, by order of the consulado of Cadiz. It appeared to me that nothing further could be required, and, if your excellency would lay it before His Majesty pursuant to my request, that it must produce an instant order for the release of Mr. Meade; but seeing that the sufferings of this individual still continue, I cannot omit any measure, however superfluous it may appear, which may possibly contribute to his release, heaping proof upon proof of the injustice done to him. It is therefore that I now send to you (herewith enclosed) a certificate, dated 15th March, (regularly authenticated) of Don Antonio Ysarbe, "contador principal de ventas provinciales" of Cadiz, who is the only person authorized to grant certificates relative to the operations of the treasury in that district, and through whose hands all such matters must necessarily pass. This certificate has been granted on the petition of Mr. Meade, which I also take the liberty of enclosing.

I beg your excellency's particular attention to this certificate: it is ample and explicit in every respect, and I am persuaded must convince you that no further research on the points in question can be necessary. I therefore confidently re-urge my request, that your excellency would be pleased to lay my reclamation before the King; and I rely on His Majesty's just dispositions for the immediate release of Mr. Meade.

Immediately that I received your note of the 24th of last March, I directed, by order of the King, my master, the supreme council of war to despatch with all urgency the "consulta" which had been required of it, relative to the affairs of Mr. Richard Meade with the house of Hunter, Raynes, & Co. of London; and I wait for the said consulta to lay the matter before His Majesty, and to obtain his sovereign resolution.

No. 13.

Mr. Erving to Mr. Pizarro.

SIR: MADRID, May 9, 1817.

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your excellency's note of the 12th April, in reply to mine of the 24th of March, relative to the case of Mr. Meade. You are pleased to inform me that on sight of my said note you ordered the council of war to despatch, in all haste, the "consulta" which you had previously asked of it, relative to the affairs "between Don Ricardo Meade and the house of Raynes, Hunter, & Co. of London." I ought to presume that by this order your excellency meant to promote the object of my former representations; but permit me to observe, referring to those representations, that in no part of them have I considered the termination of any process which may be pending before the council of war, between Mr. Meade and the English merchants, as at all essential to my purpose, which has been simply to obtain the release of an American citizen from an unjust imprisonment—an imprisonment which you yourself, in a letter of December 8 to the council of war have declared to be illegal. In that letter your excellency has said that Mr. Meade's case is not sufficiently comprehended within the law under the pretence of which he has been imprisoned: "quien, (Meade,) no esta bastante determinadamente comprendido en el caso de la ley que se cita para su aresto." Independent of this legal point, I have shown to your excellency, in my former notes, that the imprisonment is unjust, because His Majesty's treasury has the very funds which should be paid to satisfy the judgment of the tribunals. It was long since decided that Mr. Meade was a debtor to the English merchants; the funds in question had been deposited in the royal treasury, by order of the competent tribunals; and, it has been proved, by authentic and complete documents, that the deposite exists in the treasury as effective cash. What I have required, then, as a measure of the plainest justice, is, that these funds should be paid by the treasury, to satisfy the judgment. Thus Mr. Meade would be released from prison, of course; and all necessity of legal decision, as to the nature of his imprisonment, would be superseded; and all litigious questions between him and the English creditors would cease. I had certainly succeeded in impressing your excellency with this view of the subject, for, as far back as the 7th November, you informed me that the affair was properly within the Department of Hacienda, and that His Majesty would give his decision through that Department. Under the same impression, doubtless, you wrote to the Minister of Hacienda, on the 4th of December, desiring that a statement of the facts within the cognizance of his Department might be sent to you, to the end that you might submit them to His Majesty, to enable him to decide on the consulta of the council of war, (of November 28,) at that time before him. In the same way your excellency wrote to the council of war, on the 8th of December, requiring that all the original documents which relate to the nature of the deposite made by Mr. Meade should be sent to you. Even in your letter of February the 7th, to the same council of war, by which you return to it the "antecedents," you confine your view principally to the existence and nature of the deposite.

Convinced, then, as your excellency was, that the imprisonment of Meade was illegal, and as to the nature of the deposite, (a point which you considered all-important in the case, having before you the certificates of the officers of Hacienda, as well as of the consulado of Cadiz, proving that it existed in effective specie,) I could not doubt but that you intended to submit the case to His Majesty's decision, as announced in your letter of December 4th to the Minister of Hacienda, and conformably to what I had repeatedly proposed. You have not been pleased to acquaint me with whatever motives you may have had for deviating from this intention; but it does appear that you have required of the council to determine on the legality of the imprisonment, which was its own act—an act of which, in your letter of December 8th, you expressed His Majesty's disapprobation, and the injustice of which has been made still more apparent by the above-mentioned proofs as to the nature of the deposite. It appears, also, that you transmitted to the same council, in the month of February, documents which you demanded from it in the month of December, for the purpose of being laid before the King, but which are now to be enveloped in questions from which they had been, and stood, entirely separated.

In thus sending the affair back to the council, the parties (Meade and McDermot) are made uselessly to litigate about the nature of a deposite which the Government knows to exist, in specie, in its own treasury. Thus, the simple act of justice which I have demanded is procrastinated to an indefinite time, being made dependant upon contentious questions, with which it has no necessary connexion. Your excellency is perfectly convinced, by documentary evidence of indisputable authority, from every department of the Hacienda, that the royal treasury is debtor to Meade for the amount, in specie, of the deposite made by him; that, with or without law, Meade has been twelve months, and still is, in prison, for the same amount due to the English claimants, for whose benefit the said deposite was made, by order of the tribunal which at that time had cognizance of the then pending suit; and it is evident that the repayment of this money would release Meade from prison, at the same time that it would satisfy the English creditors. Allow me, then, to ask, to what useful end is the council of war now employed? To declare the illegality of its own acts? But all investigations of that nature will be rendered unnecessary by the repayment of the money now in the hands of Government. The council can decide to whom, of right, the money deposited belongs; but on this point there is no dispute. The deposite belongs, of right, to the English creditors, represented by McDermot. The council has no control over the treasury. In examining, therefore, into the nature of the deposite, it can have no other guide than the very official documents which have been before your excellency. These are unequivocal and conclusive. It matters not now whether the deposite, in its original form, was, or was not, of a nature to satisfy the demands of the English creditor. We can dispense with an examination of that question also; because, in whatever form the deposite was originally made, it has been now converted, by regular fiscal operations, into effective cash; and in that form exists, and in that form will be readily received by Mr. McDermot. The documents which certify the real nature of the deposite can neither be called in question nor set aside by the council; nor is there any necessity of a judicial investigation to establish the authenticity or validity of them. Upon those grounds, therefore, I renew my demand, in every aspect of it so just, that your excellency would lay this case ministerially before the King, and procure his order for the immediate repayment of the deposite existing in his treasury.

GEORGE W. ERVING.

Petition of Mrs. Meade, and papers communicated by her in relation to Richard W. Meade.

PHILADELPHIA, December 4, 1817.

To his excellency the President of the United States the following case is respectfully submitted:

Richard W. Meade was born in Chester county, in Pennsylvania, in June, 1778. He went to Spain in 1803, to claim restitution of property detained at Buenos Ayres; in which claim he was unsuccessful. He then established a commercial house at Cadiz, where he has ever since resided in the character of an American citizen, and having held, from 1806 till the present year, the station of navy agent of the United States for the port of Cadiz. Mr. Meade has a wife (the undersigned) and nine children, now residing in Philadelphia.

In their late struggles, he rendered essential services to the people of Spain, as repeatedly and publicly acknowledged. In 1812, being in actual advance to the Government of Spain to the amount of near eight hundred thousand dollars, and being satisfied that the Treasurer General, Don Victor Soret, was using the funds which by contract had been appropriated to repay that advance, he appealed to the regency against the conduct of the Treasurer; and, receiving no satisfaction, published a pamphlet containing a statement of his contracts with the Government, and its injustice towards him; in consequence of which publication he was imprisoned for three months, and then released on bail. On an appeal to the Cortes, Mr. Meade obtained an order for the payment of his advances, which order has been but partially complied with, and that under enormous sacrifices, amounting, in many instances, to one-third of the capital, besides several years' interest, for which no allowance has ever been made. Mr. Meade also appealed to the Cortes against the unjust proceedings of the regency in imprisoning him; the Cortes reported the proceedings as illegal and unjust, and decreed the constitutional penalties against the minister who gave, and the judge who executed, the order. The dismissal of the regency by the Cortes, and the subsequent dissolution of the Cortes itself, on the arrival of King Ferdinand, prevented the report of the Cortes against the regency being acted on; and the affair being revived by the supreme council of war, composed of men subservient to the old regency, (who are now all in high offices round the court,) it was lately decreed that Mr. Meade should pay a fine of two thousand ducats for the publication, which they termed a libel on the late regents.

It is to be understood that the affair above related, of the imprisonment in 1812, is altogether distinct from the present confinement of Mr. Meade and its causes, though often erroneously blended with it; it will clearly appear, however, that the rancor produced by the events related has operated with many now in power in stimulating the present persecution, the circumstances leading to which are as follows:

In 1811, Mr. Meade was appointed assignee to the estate of James W. Glass, of Cadiz, declared bankrupt in England, in consequence of his connexion with the house of Hunter, Rainey, & Co. of London, against whom a commission of bankruptcy had issued; the appointment of Mr. Meade was made by the tribunal of commerce of Cadiz, with the approbation of all the creditors in Cadiz, and was confirmed by the assignees in London—the tribunal of commerce having cognizance of all commercial affairs in Spain, and all persons carrying on trade there (even foreigners) being amenable thereto. Mr. Meade gave bonds, accordingly, to take charge of the effects of the estate, and to be responsible solely to the tribunal for the proceeds; being prohibited, under the penalty of the bonds, from disposing of the funds without the sanction of the tribunal.

Having settled the affairs of the estate, and paid all demands thereon, there remained in his hands about fifty-two thousand dollars, which he several times petitioned the tribunal to be permitted to remit to the assignees in London. The delays attending all Spanish proceedings prevented the petitions being acted upon, until Mr. Duncan Hunter, one of the principals of the bankrupt house, was sent to Cadiz; and when on the eve of getting the business settled, Mr. Glass, (escaping from his bail in England,) appeared also in Cadiz, and laid an embargo on the funds, under the pretence of having been illegally included in the bankruptcy. John McDermot was appointed as the agent of Hunter, and Mr. Meade offered to pay to Hunter or McDermot the amount in his hands, on their giving bonds satisfactory to the tribunal of commerce, in lieu of his own. Those persons not being able to procure such sureties as the tribunal would accept, that body suddenly, and of its own accord, decreed that Mr. Meade should, on the following morning, place the money in the King's treasury, until McDermot or Hunter should give the security required; it being declared that all Mr. Meade's property should be embargoed in case of non-payment at the time limited. In pursuance of the said order, Mr. Meade made the deposite on the following morning, and presented to the tribunal the receipt in which the Treasurer acknowledged to have received the sum in question by order of the tribunal, to be held subject to the future disposition of that body. A question having been made, at the instigation of McDermot, whether the sum had been paid into the treasury in specie, or in treasury notes, the intendant answered, to the official inquiry of the tribunal, that "the deposite had been made in due form under his inspection, in effective specie; and that whenever the tribunal should order its payment, His Majesty would pay it in the same coin."

Notwithstanding this, a suit was brought against Mr. Meade by McDermot; and the tribunal, aware that it had done wrong in ordering the deposite, decided that Mr. Meade should pay the money a second time! An appeal was entered from this decree to the superior tribunal, called alzadas, (Mr. Meade having a right to that appeal by the seventh and twentieth articles of the treaty between the United States and Spain.) While the cause was there pending, the plaintiff (through the English minister) procured an order for the removal of the case to the council of war at Madrid, where the sentence was confirmed. Mr. Meade had a right of appeal, but was refused. He petitioned the King, who commanded that he should be heard by the same court; but as Mr. Meade conceived the judges to have evinced a partiality in the case, at Mr. Meade's request, five new judges were added to the five of which the court was before composed. In this state of the case, McDermot presented a petition, stating that Mr. Meade was about to leave Spain, and praying that he should be compelled to pay the money or be put into confinement; and the order was accordingly granted (through the influence of the British minister) by the five primitive judges, though the King had expressly decreed that no measure should be taken in the case of Mr. Meade but with the presence of the new judges. On the 2d of May, 1816, Mr. Meade was seized and imprisoned in the castle of Sta. Catalina, at Cadiz, confined in a dungeon, with a sentinel at his door, and for several months locked up at night.

The minister of the United States, Mr. Erving, has made strong remonstrances to the Spanish Government against these unjust and cruel persecutions of an American citizen; those remonstrances have drawn from the King an order to the council to despatch Mr. Meade's case; but there is at the same time strong reason to believe that, while such an order is given to amuse the American minister, a secret order is given to delay the decision, as the present state of the treasury would render the payment of the money inconvenient, it being apparent that the money must be paid on the liberation of Mr. Meade.

For corroboration of the principal facts of the foregoing statement, and particularly those respecting the deposite, and the circumstances under which it was made, the President is referred to the documents herewith sent, (Nos. 1 to 7.) Copies of those relating to Mr. Erving's correspondence with the Spanish Government have also been transmitted to the Department of State at Washington.

The undersigned, in making this appeal to the President, will not presume to add a single comment, but must await the result in trembling anxiety. She cannot, however, avoid respectfully intimating a hope that, if kindly disposed to act efficiently in a case so interesting to Mr. Meade and his family, the President will adopt some other means of attaining his purpose than through the agency of Mr. Erving; it being now perfectly ascertained that the representations of that gentleman to the Spanish Government, on Mr. Meade's case, are not received with that respect, or attended to with that promptness and desire of accommodation, due to their justice, to his station and conduct, or to the character of the country he represents. On the contrary, his communications have been treated with marked disregard, or answered by trifling equivocations, insomuch as to render his exertions, however well intended and spirited, utterly useless.

By return of post, without fail, you will please state if the deposite exists, as yet, which R. Meade made on the 19th February, 1814, of 1,050,327 reals and 20 maravedis, in virtue of a sentence of the royal tribunal of the consulado of the day prior thereto.

CADIZ, April 29, 1817.

In the moment that I received your official letter of the 22d of the present month, relative to the deposite of R. Meade, I sent a copy of said letter to the Administrator General of the Revenue of the Province, on the 28th of the same month, in consequence of all the archives corresponding to the year in which the said deposite was made existing in his department and under his control; and under this date he answered me as follows:

"GENERAL ADMINISTRATION OF THE RENTS OF THE PROVINCE.

"By the archives of judicial deposites, and corresponding to the year 1814, which exist in this administration, it appears unquestionably that R. Meade deposited, on the 19th February of said year, in virtue of a sentence of the royal tribunal of the consulado of the day before, the sum of 1,050,327 reals of vellon and 20 maravedis; and that no sum has ever been returned, to the present day, on account of said deposite, which I beg leave to state in answer to your official letter of yesterday, in which you transmit me a copy of the letter received by you from the Treasurer General of the 22d of this month.

and which I therefore beg leave to transcribe to you, as an answer to your official letter.

MADRID, November 19, 1816.

In order to answer with due or correct knowledge a certain information or request which has been demanded of me by my superiors, with the least possible delay, you will be pleased to inform me, as early as possible, whether, by order of your tribunal, R. Meade made a deposite in the treasury of royal finances, or in that of the revenue? of what amount said deposite was? if it exists at present? and whether there is any impediment to returning the same to him?

God preserve you many years.

[REPLY.]

CADIZ, November 29, 1816.

Under date of the 19th instant, you were pleased to say to this royal tribunal, that, in order to answer certain information which had been demanded by your superiors, this tribunal should state whether it was true that, by its order, R. Meade had made any deposite in the royal treasury of finance, or that of the revenue? of what amount it consisted? if it existed at present? and if there was any impediment to its being returned to him?

In reply to these questions the consulado begs leave to state that, at the suit of John McDermot, who claimed from R. Meade, for balance of accounts, the sum of 1,050,327 reals of vellon and 16 maravedis. In the course of the proceedings, this tribunal gave its sentence, commanding R. Meade to deposite the aforesaid sum in the royal treasury of the revenue; and this was done in treasury notes of effective cash, which said Meade had to receive from said department; and the deposite was thus made, the Treasurer obliging himself to hold the amount at the disposition of this tribunal. The sum deposited subsists; and though McDermot afterwards pretended that R. Meade should deliver him said sum, without any regard to the deposite, it did not take place, on account of R. Meade having appealed. The said Meade applied to His Majesty, and, through the Minister of Finance, there was issued a royal order, dated 10th August, 1815, in which it was commanded that, in the mean time, that funds could be collected wherewith to return the aforesaid deposite, this tribunal should suspend its proceedings. This tribunal consulted the supreme council of war on this point, and, in virtue of a despatch, (of which the adjoined is a literal copy,) they submitted the auto or proceedings to the supreme council, as commanded by said royal order. The supreme council makes merit of the same in the aforesaid document; and it is the strongest proof that the deposite exists at the disposition of this tribunal, from the circumstance of the auto or suit being still pending in the appeal before the supreme council. This tribunal cannot resolve to whom the sum so deposited is to be returned; and, whilst the suit is dependent upon the appeal, this tribunal cannot regulate its sentence or proceedings.

Mr. Erving to His Excellency Don José Pizarro, First Secretary of State.

SIR: MADRID, June 29, 1817.

My last note to you on the case of R. W. Meade, was on the 9th May; that representation induced your excellency to repeat His Majesty's orders to the council of war, to the end that it might forthwith evacuate the consulta, which has been so long since demanded from it. It was to be expected, in a case of this urgency, where the liberty, fortune, health, and domestic happiness of an innocent man had been wantonly sacrificed, that the tribunal would have hastened to repair the errors which it had fallen into, more particularly as, in the name of my Government, I had demanded the liberty of this individual. It was not, however, till the 26th May that the fiscal's dictamen was given; that document, after a vain attempt to justify the anterior proceeding complained of, concluded in these words*: "Pero en el dice quando existe el deposito como si fuese dinero efectivo segun expone el Tesorero General y quando el consulado asegura que preceptuó á Meade verificase el deposito en tesorería de rentas, parece que habiendo cumplido con ambos extremos no debe continuar por mas tiempo su aresto."

The conclusion which the fiscal has thus arrived at, and the facts on which he has founded it, were as true twelve months ago as they are now. In fine, here is a formal confession of the fiscal himself, according to which there is no ground for continuing the imprisonment of Mr. Meade a single moment; but though the dictamen was given on the 26th May, Mr. Meade has not been released. I therefore pray that your excellency would be pleased to order that the council act in conformity to it, without the least delay.

I renew to your excellency assurances of my most distinguished consideration, &c.

GEORGE W. ERVING.

The Secretary of State to Don Luis de Onis, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary from Spain.

SIR: WASHINGTON, December 26, 1817.

I am directed by the President of the United States to invite your immediate attention, and to urge that of your Government, to the case of Richard W. Meade, a citizen of the United States, who has been confined since the 2d of May, 1816, in the prison of Santa Catalina, at Cadiz.

It has been repeatedly represented to your Government, by the minister of the United States at Madrid, that the imprisonment of this person was under a sentence of a tribunal at Cadiz, condemning him to pay a second time a sum of money which, by virtue of a prior decree of the same tribunal, he had already paid into the royal treasury. This fact has never been denied or contested by your Government. It has been proved to them by the attestations and certificates of their own officers.

It was to have been presumed that, upon the first moment that such a fact was authentically presented to your Government, an order would instantly have issued from it for the discharge of Mr. Meade from his imprisonment. The President regrets that, after so many and such urgent representations in his behalf, by the minister of the United States at Madrid, it should yet be necessary to address this call upon the most common principle of justice to you. I am instructed by him to say that, in renewing this demand for Mr. Meade's immediate liberation, he confidently expects it will not be in vain.

I pray you, sir, to accept, &c.

J. Q. ADAMS.

The Chevalier Don Luis de Onis to the Secretary of State.

SIR: WASHINGTON, December 29, 1817.

I have received your note dated the 26th of this month, in which, by order of the President, you communicate to me what appears to have taken place in Spain, in the case of a lawsuit against Richard W. Meade, a citizen of these States, in order that I should make the necessary representations on this subject to the King, my master, and solicit his release from confinement.

In compliance with the wishes of the President, and yours, sir, I shall, with great pleasure, make this request in favor of Mr. Meade, although I am not informed of the details of the suit instituted against him, nor of those which have produced his confinement.

Confiding in the just intentions of the King, and his high consideration for the United States, I must hope that His Majesty will attend efficaciously to this request, and so use his authority in having justice promptly done to Mr. Meade, that the laws may be observed with the strictest impartiality, and no motive or pretext whatever left to doubt of the immaculate (acendrada) purity which has ever been acknowledged as the particular attribute of the Spanish magistracy.

I renew my respects to you, sir, and pray God to preserve you many years.

LUIS DE ONIS.

[The following reports, on the same subject, were made the 24th of March and 4th of April, 1818.]

IN SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES, March 24, 1818.

The Committee of the Senate on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the petition of sundry citizens of Philadelphia, asking the interposition of Congress in behalf of Richard W. Meade, an American citizen, unjustly and wantonly confined in a dungeon in Spain, by the authority of that Government, have given to the subject the deliberation its importance deserved, and beg leave to submit the following report:

It appears from the documents that R. W. Meade is an American citizen, who went to Spain in the year 1803 on lawful business; that, in the year 1806, such was the confidence of the Government in his integrity, that he was appointed navy agent for the United States at the port of Cadiz; a station which he held until the time of his confinement. Such was the correctness of his deportment, as to have been appointed by the tribunal of commerce at Cadiz, with the consent of all the parties concerned, assignee of a bankrupt, the amount of whose estate involved a high responsibility. He performed the duties thus devolved upon him honestly; and having collected for distribution fifty thousand dollars, he several times petitioned the tribunal to permit him to remit this sum to the creditors of the bankrupt resident in England; the only proper course left him to pursue, inasmuch as he had, when appointed agent of the bankrupt, given his bond to that tribunal conditioned to take charge of the effects of the bankrupt, and to be responsible solely to the tribunal for the proceeds, being prohibited under the penalty of the bonds from disposing of the funds without the sanction of the tribunal. A controversy having arisen between the creditors and

* "But, at present, while the deposite exists as if in effective money, as set forth by the Treasurer General, and while the consulado declares that they ordered Meade to make that deposite in the provincial treasury, it appears that, having complied with both orders, his arrest and imprisonment should not be continued any longer." bankrupt about the distribution, Meade offered the money to either, if they would give a bond, with sureties, to the satisfaction of the tribunal of commerce, by which his own might be cancelled. This they were unable to do. The tribunal, of its own accord, and unexpectedly, decided that Meade should, on the following morning, place the money in the King's treasury until the parties litigant should give the security required; it being declared that all Meade's property should be sequestered in the case of non-payment at the time limited. The money was forthwith paid by Meade into the treasury, in treasury notes equal to specie, and hence acknowledged by the Treasurer that the deposite had been made in due form, under his inspection, in effective specie; and that whenever the tribunal should order its payment, His Majesty would pay it in the same coin.

Notwithstanding this judgment, and the discharge thereof, by the payment aforesaid, Mr. McDermot, the agent for the British creditors, brought suit against Meade in the same court to recover the very sum he had theretofore paid in conformity to its own judgment. The court awarded judgment against Meade a second time for this money. The latter appealed to the superior tribunal, called alzadas. During its pendency, it is charged by Meade that the cause was removed, by the interposition of the British minister, to the council of war; and by the same interposition his arrest and confinement were procured, from which he could be relieved only by a repayment of the money. He has languished in confinement from the 2d of May, 1816, down to the last accounts from Spain. The representative of this nation at that court has repeatedly appealed to His Catholic Majesty for the relief of Meade, and the appeal has been in vain; the court of Spain having refused either to restore the money deposited in its own treasury, by order of its own competent judicial authority, or to release the person of Meade from the long confinement to which he has been doomed. And, finally, the President of the United States, whose peculiar province it is to take cognizance of subjects of this kind, has caused a representation on the subject to be made to the minister of Spain to the United States, demanding his immediate liberation. Nothing but a confidence that this representation will produce the desired result would have restrained your committee from recommending the adoption of measures of severe retribution.

Your committee are of opinion that it is due to the dignity of the United States to adopt, as a fundamental rule of its policy, the principle that one of its citizens, to whatever region of the earth his lawful business may carry him, and who demeans himself as becomes his character, is entitled to the protection of his Government, and that whatever intentional injury may be done him should be retaliated by the employment, if necessary, of the whole force of the nation.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, April 4, 1818.

The committee to whom were referred a resolution of the 12th February, and a memorial from a number of citizens of the United States, residing in the city of Philadelphia, relating to the imprisonment of Richard W. Meade, report:

That, upon an examination of the documents communicated to the House by the President, the following facts appear:

On the 2d day of May, 1816, Richard W. Meade, a native citizen of the United States, who has resided in Cadiz for some years past, was arrested and closely confined in the castle of St. Catalina, which is described by the minister of the United States at the court of Spain as a felons' prison. At the time of the arrest Mr. Meade was the navy agent of the United States at the port of the Cadiz, and acted as consular agent, under an authority derived from Mr. Cathcart, the consul of the United States at that place, and with the approbation of the Spanish authorities; Mr. Cathcart having appointed him to act in his stead, during his absence upon a visit he made to the United States. Mr. Meade does not appear to have ever renounced his character of a citizen of the United States, nor to have accepted from any foreign Power any right or privilege, nor to have contracted any obligation that could for a moment make his citizenship doubtful, or impair the claim he has upon his country for protection.

Soon after his confinement began, George W. Erving, minister of the United States at the court of Spain, interposed to obtain his liberation, and from the 27th August, 1816, to the 9th May, 1817, made repeated and earnest applications to the public functionaries of Spain, claiming his release, as a citizen of the United States unjustly deprived of his liberty. It is chiefly from this correspondence, accompanying the message of the President, that the committee have been able to obtain any knowledge of the causes that led to Mr. Meade's arrest and imprisonment.

Mr. Meade, it seems, had been regularly appointed assignee at Cadiz of the estate of James W. Glass, declared a bankrupt in England, and in that capacity, after faithfully executing his duty, there remained in his hands a sum of about $52,000 belonging to the estate, which there is reason to believe was the subject of controversy between different claimants. There is no complaint or suggestion that Mr. Meade improperly retained this money in his hands, or was prevented from paying it over by any consideration but that of a just regard for his own security, which did not, under the then existing circumstances, permit him to part with the fund; and it seems that he could not under any circumstances pay the money, without the consent and direction of the consulado of Cadiz.

In this state of things, on the 18th February, 1814, the consulado of Cadiz, a tribunal whose jurisdiction over the matter does not appear to be questioned, made a summary order, requiring Mr. Meade, within a limited and very short time, (about twenty-four hours,) to deposite the above-mentioned sum of money in the treasury general of the province. With this order Mr. Meade complied on the following day. The fact of his compliance was vouched at the time by the usual and authentic evidence from the proper officer, and has since been satisfactorily established, in the manner that will hereafter appear.

The consulado, by its own act, in taking the fund from the hands of Mr. Meade, and causing it to be deposited in the public treasury, would seem, upon every just principle, to have liberated him from further accountability. That tribunal, nevertheless, soon after entertained a new proceeding against Mr. Meade, at the instance of a certain John McDermot, the agent of Duncan Hunter, having for its object to compel him to pay to the consulado the same amount which he had been previously ordered to pay, and, under their order, had already paid into the public treasury; that is, in substance, to pay the same sum a second time. The consulado made a decree against him to that effect. From this decree Mr. Meade appealed to the superior tribunal of the province, called the alzadas, "but its interference was overruled by the tribunal of war at Madrid, and this latter confirmed the sentence of the consulado at Cadiz."

On the 4th August, 1815, a royal decree was issued, suspending the further proceedings of the consulado against Mr. Meade, till funds could be collected by the Treasury to restore the deposite made by Mr. Meade.

From the date last mentioned, (4th August, 1815,) it does not appear that any proceedings took place till the 2d May, 1816, when the tribunal of war issued the order under which Mr. Meade was arrested and continues to be imprisoned.

This order was founded upon a suggestion made by McDermot, that Mr. Meade was about to leave the kingdom, and required him to "deliver up the aforesaid deposite, (meaning the money belonging to the bankrupt's estate,) in like manner, and in the same specie, as he had received it, or to give full, clear, and sufficient security, to the satisfaction of the tribunal of commerce at Cadiz; and, in default thereof, to be removed to a public prison, to prevent all evasion of the sentence against him." It is understood that the tribunal would receive nothing as satisfactory security but a deposite of specie.

The proceeding of the tribunal of war is apparently so destitute of all foundation in justice, and so plainly contradictory to the royal decree of the 4th August, 1815, that it becomes necessary to examine, for a moment, the only suggestion, bearing the semblance of a vindication of it, that has been offered on the part of the Spanish authorities.

Don Pedro Cevallos, in his note to Mr. Erving of the 10th September, 1816, alleges "that Mr. Meade attempted to restore, (alluding to the payment into the Treasury) the money demanded of him, in credits of the Treasury." The precise import of this allegation may be understood to be, that Mr. Meade had made the deposite in Government paper, instead of making it in specie.

That Mr. Meade made the deposite in what was equivalent to specie, and was received as such by the officer authorized to receive it, is perfectly clear. The Intendant of the Treasury gave him a receipt for the deposite, made pursuant to the order of the consulado. In answer to an inquiry soon after directed by the consulado, the same officer replied, that the deposite had been made in effective specie, and that he would respond for the specie. The royal order, or decree, of the 4th August, 1815, is founded upon the admission of the same fact. But there is still further evidence, though further evidence would seem to be unnecessary. In November, 1816, the Treasurer General of Spain distinctly put the questions to the consulado, whether the deposite had been made? whether it still existed? and whether there was any impediment to its return? That tribunal, with equal distinctness, replied, that the deposite was made, pursuant to their order, "in Treasury notes of effective cash, which said Meade had to receive from said Department, and the deposite was thus made; the Treasurer obliging himself to hold the amount at the disposition of this tribunal." They state, also, that the deposite still exists at their disposition, and that they cannot resolve to whom it is to be returned. And, again, on the 29th April, 1817, the treasurer of the revenue, or provincial rents of Cadiz, states explicitly to the Treasurer General of Spain, that the deposite had been made, and had not been returned.

With such an accumulation of evidence from sources of unquestionable authenticity, and wholly uncontradicted, to show that the deposite had been made in what was equivalent to specie, and received as specie, and that the Treasury became, and acknowledged itself to be answerable for the amount, it is almost superfluous to add a remark, which the course of the business very naturally presents, tending to the same result. If the order made by the consulado in the first instance had not been complied with, that tribunal would have proceeded to enforce its authority by summary and direct compulsion; in other words, it would have used the means with which it is invested by law to compel Mr. Meade to do exactly what that order required. This would have produced an immediate inquiry whether he had or had not complied, and would have enabled Mr. Meade to justify himself. The resort to an irregular and arbitrary course, which avoids that question, affords the strongest reason to believe that the allegation of Mr. Cevallos was known to be untenable. In fact, that allegation has since been wholly abandoned; for, in the three notes subsequently addressed to Mr. Erving in reply to his urgent remonstrances, one by Mr. Cevallos, and two by his successor, Mr. Pizarro, it is not even alluded to.

It is impossible, however, to avoid remarking the extraordinary character of one of the questions put to the consulado in November, 1816, and the still more extraordinary character of the answer. The inquiry alluded to was, whether there was any impediment to its (the deposite) being returned? The answer is, that, from the circumstances of the suit still pending, this tribunal cannot resolve to whom the sum so deposited is to be returned. Why Mr. Meade should be imprisoned pending that suit, which was to determine to whom the money in the Treasury was to be paid, is a question that seems to admit of no answer that is reconcileable with common justice, more especially as the same document implies that the Treasury was to pay the money as soon as the suit should be decided, and, of course, the object of the suit was not to coerce Mr. Meade to pay, but simply to determine who was to have the money from the Treasury.

There is still another view of this matter which the committee think it proper to submit, and which they deem of itself decisive to establish the flagrant injustice of Mr. Meade's imprisonment. If the deposite was made in paper, it is beyond a doubt that the paper was the evidence of a debt due from the Treasury to Mr. Meade, and the receipt of it amounted to nothing more than a payment of what was justly due to him; in fact, it was the same thing as if the Treasury had paid him the money, and he had immediately after repaid the same money to the Treasury. The Treasury, therefore, had no just cause to complain. It is equally evident that the individual interested in the deposite (Mr. McDermot, or his constituent) had no reason to complain. Whether the deposite was made in specie, or in what was equivalent to specie, or how it was made, could not be material to him, provided it was so made as to give him a right to call upon the Treasury; that is, to make him a creditor of the Treasury for the amount, in case of an eventual decision in his favor. That this was the effect of the deposite made by Mr. Meade, and received by the Treasurer, is not, and cannot be disputed. The Treasurer cancelled the securities deposited, and engaged to respond for the amount in specie.

If the Treasury of Spain had been ready and willing to fulfil this engagement, Mr. Meade's imprisonment could not have continued for a single moment; and it is, therefore, evident that he is kept in confinement simply because it is not convenient for the Treasury to pay the money. And your committee are well assured that the Government of Spain, aware that, let the decision be what it might, the royal Treasury would be called on to pay the money in dispute, has, by a secret exertion of the authority which it possesses over the proceedings of the tribunals, commanded "the business to be prolonged as much as possible."

In every point of view, then, in which the case can be considered, your committee can discover no justification for the imprisonment and sufferings of Mr. Meade. It does not appear that he has violated any civil or social duty which he owed by the laws of Spain, and for which, in the ordinary administration of justice, he might rightly be imprisoned. They are satisfied, too, that the continuance of his imprisonment is dependant upon the pleasure of the Government of Spain, and that his liberation may at any time be effected by that Government.

Your committee hope and believe that the demand made by the President will not be unavailing, but they think it proper, at the same time, on the part of this House, to give assurance of support in the measures that may become necessary, in case this expectation should be disappointed. They, therefore, submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the House is satisfied that the imprisonment of Richard W. Meade is an act of cruel and unjustifiable oppression; that it is the right and duty of the Government of the United States to afford to Mr. Meade its aid and protection; and that this House will support and maintain such measures as the President may hereafter adopt to obtain the release of the said R. W. Meade from confinement, should such measures be proper and necessary.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, FEBRUARY 17, 1818.

To the House of Representatives of the United States: FEBRUARY 12, 1818.

Conformably with a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 6th of this month, I now lay before that House a report received from the Secretary of State, with a copy of the correspondence referred to, and requested by that resolution.

JAMES MONROE.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, February 12, 1818.

The Secretary of State, to whom was referred the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 6th of this month, requesting the President to cause to be laid before that House the correspondence with the Government of Spain, to which a letter of the minister of the United States at the court of Madrid, of the 25th of October, 1816, communicated with a late message of the President to that House, relates, has the honor, herewith, to submit to the President a copy of the correspondence requested.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

The Chevalier Don Luis de Onis to the Secretary of State.

SIR: PHILADELPHIA, September 5, 1815.

Under the date of 30th June, I am advised by Lieutenant General Don Pablo Morillo, captain general of Caraccas, and commander of the expedition which His Majesty has destined to re-establish tranquillity at Carthagena, that, with a view to accelerate this important object, he is about to establish the most rigorous blockade of the ports of the viceroyalty of Santa Fé, including Carthagena, and that, in consequence, every neutral vessel which shall be found, not only in those ports, but on those coasts, shall be made prize of, in order to prevent those who have revolted from His Majesty's authority receiving succors of any kind.

I have thought it proper to communicate this to you, for the information of the President, that the injuries may be avoided which would result to the citizens of this republic, if they continue, as heretofore, to trade with the rebels against the authority of my sovereign.

I renew to you, &c.

LUIS DE ONIS.

Don Luis de Onis to the Secretary of State.

SIR: PHILADELPHIA, March 2, 1816.

Don Pablo Morillo, commander-in-chief of the forces destined by the King, my master, for the pacification of the viceroyalty of Santa Fé, says to me, under date of the 19th of December last, that, after having compelled Carthagena to surrender at discretion, he had found it expedient, for the complete re-establishment of the tranquillity of the viceroyalty, to continue the blockade from Santa Marta to the river Atrato, inclusive; and to give orders that if any vessel be met with further south than the mouths of the Magdalena, or further north than the parallel of Cape Tiburon, on the Mosquito shore, and between the meridians of those points, she would be declared a good prize, whatever documents or destination she might have; but that he had left open to the commerce of neutrals the two ports of Santa Marta and Porto Bello.

I have the honor to give you this notice, as it may be interesting to the merchants of the United States, and to renew the assurances, &c.

LUIS DE ONIS.

Mr. Monroe, Secretary of State, to the Chevalier de Onis, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary, &c.

SIR: MARCH 20, 1816.

I have had the honor to receive your letter of March 2, announcing the continuance of a blockade of the Spanish coast in South America, from Santa Marta to the river Atrato, inclusive of the latter, by the commander-in-chief of His Catholic Majesty's forces; and that if any vessel is met south of the mouths of the Madalena, or north of the parallel of Cape Tiburon, on the Mosquito coast, and between the meridian of those points, she shall be seized and condemned as prize, whatever may be her documents or destination. You state, also, that the ports of Santa Marta and Porto Bello are left open to neutrals.

I have to state that this proclamation of General Morillo is evidently repugnant to the law of nations, for several reasons, particularly the following: that it declares a coast of several hundred miles to be in a state of blockade; and because it authorizes the seizure of neutral vessels at an unjustifiable distance from the coast. No maxim of the law of nations is better established than that a blockade shall be confined to particular ports, and that an adequate force shall be stationed at each to support it. The force should be stationary, and not a cruising squadron, and placed so near the entrance of the harbor or mouth of the river as to make it evidently dangerous for a vessel to enter. I have to add, that a vessel entering the port ought not to be seized, except in returning to it after being warned off by the blockading squadron stationed near it.

I am instructed by the President to state to you these objections to the blockade which has been announced in your letter, that you may communicate them to your Government, and in confidence that you will, in the mean time, interpose your good offices, and prevail on General Morillo to alter his proclamation, and practise under it, in such a manner as to conform, in both respects, to the law of nations.

In stating to you these well-founded objections to the blockade of General Morillo, I have the honor to observe that your motive for communicating it is duly appreciated.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JAMES MONROE.

Don Luis de Onis to the Secretary of State.

PHILADELPHIA, March 25, 1816.

SIR:

I have received your official letter of the 20th of this month, in which you state that the proclamation of General Morillo is repugnant to the laws of nations, as well because it declares a coast of several hundred miles in a state of blockade, authorizing the capture of every neutral vessel at an unlimited distance from the coast, as that it is an established maxim among nations that a blockade should be limited to the ports where there may be a stationary and not a cruising force sufficient to make the entrance of the harbor or river where it may be placed dangerous; and, finally, even in this case, a vessel ought not to be captured when she is about to enter a port, save only when, after having received notice of the blockade, she attempts to infringe it. You are pleased to state to me that the President desires that I will communicate these observations to my Government, and that I would use my good offices, confidentially, with General Morillo, so to modify his blockade as to make it conform to the laws of nations.

I will communicate to His Majesty, in compliance with the wishes of the President, what you have stated to me in your note; and I will with pleasure avail myself of the departure of Mr. Hughes to write to General Morillo, inviting him, in the execution of his blockade, to avoid the injurious effects resulting therefrom to the citizens of this republic, so far as may be compatible with the security and tranquillity of His Majesty's dominions under his command.

I must, however, observe to you, sir, that General Morillo has a naval force disposable and competent, as I conceive, to the object in view; that, on the 3d of February, there sailed from Cadiz a squadron of a ship of the line, two frigates, and several smaller vessels, as a reinforcement; that, on the coast intended to be blockaded by the said general, there are no other ports of entry for merchant vessels than those of Carthagena, Santa Marta, and Porto Bello; and, finally, that the measure taken by him, not being directed against an enemy's country, is not, as stated in your esteemed note, contrary to the laws of public rights. The object of the general's proclamation is to notify the traders of foreign nations that he will maintain the laws for the regulation of the Indies in their full force; the observance of which had been relaxed, in latter times, by the effect of circumstances, though modified, however, in favor of neutrals, by leaving two ports open to their commerce. You are aware that, agreeably to those laws, no foreign vessel was allowed to trade with the dominions of His Majesty on that continent, without a special license, and that vessels found near, or evidently shaping a course towards them, were liable to confiscation as interlopers. Not only that part of the coast lying between Santa Marta and the river Atrato, but the whole coast eastward and southward of those points, from the Oronoco to the territory of this republic, belongs to the Spanish monarchy; and, consequently, any vessel whatever found near it, or standing towards it, can have no other object than to carry on smuggling, or stir up a civil war in the King's dominions: in either case, the laws of nations recommend the seizure of the vessels so employed. Actuated by a constant desire to prevent the misfortunes which such injuries might occasion to the citizens of this republic, I have, on other occasions, suggested a very simple mode of putting an end to them, namely, that the President would be pleased to issue orders that no vessel should be cleared at the custom-houses save for a specified port, according to the general practice of nations. The practice of clearing many vessels for the West Indies, generally, carries with it a suspicion of a design to carry on a contraband trade, or to disturb the public tranquillity in the dominions of the King, my master; and, therefore, the owner who clears out his vessel in this way, and without the certificates of the Spanish consuls, cannot complain if it be detained as suspicious. In fact, what difficulty can a merchant, acting fairly, have to specify the port of Havana, Kingston, Santa Marta, Guaira, Porto Bello, Rio Janeiro, or any other of an independent nation? None, unquestionably; since, in case of not finding a good market at one place, he proceeds to another, with a declaration made at the port he touched at of the motives which obliged him to alter his destination. The wisdom and humanity which eminently distinguish the President and the administration cannot fail to perceive the solidity of these observations, nor to approve of the policy of His Majesty in taking the most suitable and effectual measures to secure his subjects from the civil war which a number of adventurers are endeavoring to kindle in his dominions; and I therefore flatter myself that he will be pleased to take into consideration the expediency of adopting the measure I have had the honor to suggest to you, by preventing the collectors of the customs from clearing out vessels, except for specified ports, and notifying merchants trading with the possessions of the King to conform to the established rules and orders, regulating not only neutrals but Spanish vessels also, that they may avoid the consequences of their non-observance, notwithstanding His Majesty's desire to afford them, within his dominions, all the benefits and advantages compatible with the public safety and his royal interests.

I hope that the explanation which I have thus taken the liberty to make, until I have received the answer of the King, my master, will quiet the anxiety of the President as to the proclamation of General Morillo, and that it will be viewed by him as a continuation of my earnest desire to reinstate the commerce of the two nations, reciprocally, on the most liberal and favorable footing.

I renew my respects, &c.

LUIS DE ONIS.

Extract of a letter from the Secretary of State to Mr. Erving, dated

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, July 20, 1816.

You have been apprized already of a similar measure which was taken in regard to the vessels which had been seized at Carthagena, and the citizens of the United States, who, under various pretexts, had been arrested and imprisoned there. I have the pleasure to state that the application succeeded as to our citizens, though it failed as to the vessels. You will interpose directly with the Spanish Government in favor of the latter; documents respecting which shall be forwarded to you, either by the present or some other early opportunity.

Mr. Erving to his excellency Don Pedro Cevallos, First Minister of State, &c.

SIR: MADRID, September 26, 1816.

I am ordered by my Government to apply to His Majesty, through your excellency, for the restitution of sundry American vessels and cargoes which have been seized and brought into Carthagena, or other places within that command or viceroyalty, under pretext of a pretended blockade, issued by Don Pablo Morillo, in December, 1815.

When that blockade was communicated to the American Government, Mr. Monroe, Secretary of State, in a note of March 20, 1816, addressed to His Majesty's minister at Washington, formally protested against it; and it was hoped that, on proper representations being made by that minister to General Morillo, he would retract his measure, or, if not, that His Majesty, being made acquainted with the remonstrance of the American Government, would immediately send out orders which might produce the same effect, and assure for the future due liberty to the American commerce in those seas.

But it now appears that, as late as the month of June, no alteration had taken place in the measures of Morillo; no attention had been paid to the interference of Don Luis de Onis; and, finally, the commissioner, Mr. Hughes, who was sent by the Government of the United States to Carthagena, for the purpose, amongst others, of reclaiming the property seized, was obliged to return to the United States, on that point altogether unsatisfied. Indeed, the Viceroy of Santa Fé, Don Francisco de Montalvo, gives this commissioner to understand, by a letter of June 9th, whereof the enclosed is a translated copy, that he (the Viceroy) does not pretend to be acquainted with the law of nations; and, at the same time that he goes on executing the arbitrary and illegal decrees of General Morillo, devastating the commerce of the United States, he refers the American Government to His Majesty for redress.

It is therefore that I now find it necessary to write to your excellency upon this disagreeable subject.

It is in vain, sir, to hope that the United States will ever consent to blockades upon the principles of General Morillo; they will acknowledge none to be valid which are not strictly conformable to the well-known principles of public law—principles most clearly defined and quite indisputable, to which the United States have always adhered in their own practice, and to the infringement of which, in any form, in any degree, or under whatever pretext, they have always opposed themselves.

The blockade of General Morillo is repugnant to the law, because it extends over several hundred miles of coast, and to an indefinite distance from the shores; of course it cannot be enforced as a blockade, but remains a bare pretext for spoliation. A blockade by sea, to be acknowledged as valid by the United States, must be confined to particular ports, each having a force stationed before it, sufficient to intercept the entry of vessels; and no vessel shall be seized, even in attempting to enter a port so blockaded, till she has been previously warned away from that port.

I may be excused from dilating on rules so perfectly established, so consonant to justice and to reason, in writing to a person of your excellency's knowledge and experience.

His Majesty, who does not fail, through his minister, Mr. Onis, to assure the United States of his constant disposition to cultivate relations of friendship with them, and to that end to satisfy all their just reclamations, will certainly be sensible to the violent proceedings of which my Government now complains, and, I persuade myself, will not hesitate in ordering that the proclamation of embargo issued by General Morillo be declared null, and that all the American property which may have been taken under it be immediately restored to its owners.

In this confidence, I annex hereto a list of the vessels already known to have been captured.

Renewing to your excellency, &c.

GEORGE W. ERVING.

Schooner Adeline, of Baltimore, at Carthagena; Friend's Hope, of Baltimore, at Carthagena; schooner Count, of Baltimore, at Carthagena; Charles Stewart, of New Orleans, at Santa Martha; Edward Graham, at Santa Margarita; Ghent, of Norfolk, at Puerto Cavello.

N. B. It is believed that the cargoes of several of these vessels have been confiscated without even the form of trial.

Don Pedro Cevallos to George W. Erving, Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States.

SIR: OCTOBER 17, 1816.

Having communicated to the King your note of the 26th ultimo on the subject of the seizure of several American vessels in the port of Carthagena, South America, in consequence of the blockade established on those coasts by General Morillo, and your demand of their restitution, His Majesty has been pleased to determine that information shall be requested (se pida informe) of the court of admiralty on this business.

I renew to you the assurances, &c.

PEDRO CEVALLOS.

Mr. Erving to Mr. Cevallos.

SIR: MADRID, October 25, 1816.

By your excellency's note of the 17th instant, in reply to mine of September 26, respecting the proclamation blockade of General Morillo, and the ravages on the American commerce which are committing under it, I am told that His Majesty has ordered that information shall be taken (se pida informe) of the tribunal of admiralty.

That General Morillo has issued such a proclamation as I have described in my note of September 26, is a fact of universal notoriety. Your excellency has had before you, long since, the correspondence between the American Secretary of State and Mr. Onis on the subject, and I have transmitted to you a copy of the letter of Don Francisco Montalvo, viceroy of Santa Fé, to the American commissioner, Mr. Hughes, in which the existence of the blockade is admitted, and in which the American Government is referred for redress to His Catholic Majesty. It was therefore that, by the orders of my Government, I wrote to you on the subject. With the fact which I have above stated before you, I am wholly at a loss to imagine what kind of information the tribunal of admiralty can afford which may regulate the decision of His Majesty on the subject.

The tribunal cannot deny the existence of the proclamation; it cannot show that the proclamation is legal; it cannot deny that American vessels have been taken under the proclamation; it cannot contest the right of the American Government to demand the restitution of such vessels.

In fine, sir, it is my duty to assure you that any demur or delay in affording the satisfaction demanded, in a case of this principal importance, cannot but be very sensibly felt by the Government of the United States.

I renew, &c.

GEORGE W. ERVING.

Extracts of a letter from Mr. Erving to the Secretary of State, dated

MADRID, December 15, 1816.

I had the honor, by my letter No. 23, (of October 27,) to communicate to you the continuation of my correspondence with Mr. Cevallos on various subjects; and by that of October 31st, (No. 24,) to inform you that he had been dismissed from his employments, and succeeded in them by Don José Pizarro.

I herewith submit to you copies of my correspondence with this new minister.

He has not replied to my note of the 25th October, respecting Morillo's blockade proclamation.

Don Luis de Onis to the Secretary of State.

PHILADELPHIA, October 26, 1816.

SIR:

His excellency the viceroy of the kingdom of New Granada communicates to me, under date of the 2d of September last, that tranquillity being restored throughout the whole kingdom of Santa Fé, and all its provinces having submitted to His Majesty's Government, the commander-in-chief, Don Pablo Morillo, has thought fit to raise the blockade which he had established on those coasts, the causes having ceased which obliged him to impose it; and that, in consequence of this determination, the before-mentioned viceroy has been pleased to open the provinces of that kingdom, and particularly the port of Carthagena, to the commerce of the Powers in amity with His Majesty, under the regulations specified in the printed papers which I have the honor to transmit herewith.

I hope, sir, that you will be pleased to bring this to the knowledge of the President, that he may see the disposition of His Majesty to favor the commerce of this republic in every thing that may be compatible with the security of his dominions, and that comports with his interests.

I renew my respects, &c.

LUIS DE ONIS.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Erving to the Secretary of State, dated

MADRID, March 10, 1817.

On this affair [proclamation of Morillo] I wrote on the 26th September, 1816, and was answered October 17th, that an "informe" should be taken of the almirantazgo; I wrote again on the 25th October, and remain without any answer.

GREAT BRITAIN—DUTIES ON IRON.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, FEBRUARY 17, 1818.

To the House of Representatives of the United States: FEBRUARY 12, 1818.

I lay before the House of Representatives copies of two communications received at the Department of State from the minister of Great Britain, and submit to their consideration the propriety of making such legislative provisions as may be necessary for a compliance with the representations contained in them.

By the express terms of that compact, it was, when ratified by the two Governments, to be in force for the term of four years from the day of its signature. The revocation of all the discriminating duties became, therefore, the obligation of both Governments from that day; and it is conceived that every individual who has been required to pay, and has paid, any of the extra duties revoked by the convention, has a just and lawful claim upon the respective Governments for its return. From various accidents, it has happened that, both here and in Great Britain, the cessation of the extra duties has been fixed to commence at different times. It is desirable that Congress should pass an act providing for the return of all the extra duties incompatible with the terms of the convention which have been levied upon British vessels or merchandise after the 3d of July, 1815. The British Parliament have already set the example of fixing that day for the cessation of the extra duties of export, by their act of 30th of June last; and the minister of the United States in London is instructed to require the extension of the same principle to all the extra duties levied on vessels and merchandise of the United States in the ports of Great Britain since that day. It is not doubted that the British Government will comply with this requisition, and that the act suggested may be passed by Congress, with full confidence that the reciprocal measure will receive the sanction of the British Parliament.

JAMES MONROE.

Mr. Bagot, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary, to Mr. Monroe, Secretary of State.

SIR: WASHINGTON, November 18, 1816.

I have the honor to call your attention to one of the provisions of an act of the United States Congress, passed on the 27th of April last, entitled "An act to regulate the duties on imports and tonnage," which appears to have originated in some misapprehension of the real nature of one of the principal manufactures of Great Britain, and which has had an operation not only very prejudicial to the British manufacturer, but contrary, as it should seem, to the spirit and intent of the second article of the commercial treaty.

* See Nos. 333 and 343, post.

By the second article of the commercial treaty between Great Britain and the United States, it is stipulated "that no higher duties shall be imposed on the importation of any articles, the growth, produce, or manufacture of His Britannic Majesty's territories in Europe, than are or shall be payable on the like articles, being the growth, produce, or manufacture of any other foreign countries."

By the act of the United States to which I have referred, it is, among other things, enacted in the sixth section, that, upon importation into the United States, iron in bars and bolts, except iron manufactured by rolling, shall pay a duty of forty-five cents per hundredweight; and that in bars and bolts, when manufactured by rolling, and anchors, shall pay a duty of one dollar and fifty cents per hundredweight.

It was probably not known that the bar and bolt iron, manufactured in Great Britain, is in the last process rolled; whereas the same article, both in Sweden and Russia, instead of being rolled, is in the same process hammered; but when the iron is manufactured into bar or bolt, whether by rolling or hammering, it is in precisely the same process of manufacture, and is in every respect applicable to the same purposes of use and ulterior manufacture, and consequently is, to all intents, a "like article." But, by the inequality of the duties which have been imposed, it seems to have been imagined that rolled bar and bolt iron is in a stage of manufacture beyond that of hammered iron; and you will observe that this supposition is strengthened by the circumstance of its being classed with anchors, which are in a state of complete and finished manufacture, and are worth thirty-five pounds sterling per ton in the British market, whilst bar and bolt iron is only worth eleven pounds sterling per ton.

It is to be assumed that, whenever duties are imposed on any foreign article in a graduated scale proportioned to its manufactured state, it is intended that the duty should be regulated by that state alone, and not by the process by which it is brought to that state. Iron in a certain state of manufacture is to be charged with a certain duty; the means of bringing it to that state, whether by hammering or rolling, is not to be had in consideration; for, if it were, the effect would be to force each nation to use exactly the same process, and, what certainly never could have been intended, to check and punish the application of ingenuity and improvement.

Considering, therefore, that the bar and bolt iron manufactured in Great Britain is, according to the true spirit and intent of the second article of the treaty of commerce, in every respect a "like article" with that manufactured in Sweden and Russia, it is hoped that such measures will be taken, by the Government of the United States, as will allow of its admission to importation at the same rate of duty, and will place the British manufacturer in that state of equality, in respect to foreign nations, as may accord with the undoubted intention of the late treaty of commerce between the two countries.

I have the honor to be, &c.

CHARLES BAGOT.

Mr. Bagot, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary, to Mr. Adams, Secretary of State.

SIR: WASHINGTON, December 8, 1817.

In my letter to the Secretary of the Department of State of the 9th of July, 1816, I had the honor to point out the difference of the periods at which effect had been given, in the two countries, to the convention of the 3d of July, 1815, and to request that all discriminating duties of a nature similar to those described in His Royal Highness the Prince Regent's order in council of the 17th of August, 1815, which might have been levied between the date of that order and the 22d of the following December, upon goods imported into the United States in British built ships, might be refunded.

No mention having been made, in His Royal Highness's order in council, of alien tonnage duties, they were not adverted to in the application which I had then the honor to make; but, as it was known that they had in fact been remitted by Great Britain, the American Legislature, in strict observance of the spirit and intention of the convention, included them in the act passed on the 3d of last March, authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to cause repayments to be made of certain alien duties. By this act, however, it was only provided that the alien tonnage duties levied upon British ships in American ports, subsequently to the 17th of August, 1815, should be refunded; whereas the same duties, levied upon American ships in British ports, were remitted from the date of the signature of the convention.

In order, therefore, that His Majesty's subjects may partake of the full benefit of the reciprocity intended by the convention, I have the honor to request that remission may also be made of the amount of the alien tonnage duties which may have been levied upon British ships in the ports of the United States, between the 3d of July and the 17th of August, 1815.

I have the honor to be, &c.

CHARLES BAGOT.

KINGDOM OF SICILY.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, MARCH 2, 1818.

To the House of Representatives of the United States: WASHINGTON, February 28, 1818.

I lay before the House a report from the Secretary of State, together with the papers relating to claims of merchants of the United States upon the Government of Naples, in conformity with a resolution of the House of the 30th of January last.

JAMES MONROE.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, February 27, 1818.

The Secretary of State, to whom has been referred the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 30th of January last, requesting such information possessed by the Executive, as may be communicated without injury to the public interest, relative to the claims of merchants of the United States for their property seized and confiscated under the authority of the King of Naples, has the honor of submitting to the President the papers in the possession of this Department concerning that subject.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

Extracts of a letter from Mr. Monroe, Secretary of State, to Mr. Pinkney, special Minister to Naples, dated

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, May 11, 1816.

Being appointed by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to the Emperor of Russia, and in a similar trust to the King of Naples, the duties of the latter mission, which is special, will engage your attention in the first instance. The Washington, a ship of the line, is ordered into the Chesapeake to receive on board and to convey you and your family to Naples. You will be furnished with the usual commission and letter of credence to the King.

A principal object of your mission to Naples is to obtain indemnity for the losses which our citizens sustained by the illegal seizure and confiscation of their property by the Neapolitan Government. You will be furnished with such evidence in support of the claim as is in possession of this Department; and as notice has been given to the collectors in the principal cities of your appointment and its object, that it might be communicated to the parties interested, it is expected that you will receive much further light on the subject directly from them.

The President does not entertain a doubt of the right of the United States to a full indemnity for these losses. They were inflicted by the then Government of the country without the slightest cause. The commerce of the United States was invited into the Neapolitan ports by special decrees, with the promise of protection and encouragement; on the faith of which many ships having entered with valuable cargoes, the whole amount was seized by the Government itself, and converted to public use. For this very extraordinary and unlawful act no plea has been urged, that we have heard of, except that of necessity, which is no argument against indemnity. The injury being inflicted by a Government in full possession of the sovereignty of the country, exercising all its powers, recognised by the nation and by foreign Powers, by treaties and by other formal acts of the highest authority, it is not perceived on what ground an indemnity can be refused. No principle is better established than that the nation is responsible for the acts of its Government, and that a change in the authority does not affect the obligation. In the disordered state of that country for several years past, it has been thought useless to press this claim; but now that affairs appear to be better settled, it would be improper longer to delay it. The President indulges a strong hope that reparation will now be made. In the discharge of this trust, in the manner of the negotiation, and in the provision for the debt, should such be made, you will manifest a spirit of conciliation towards the Government of Naples. Any reasonable accommodation as to the time and the mode of payment which may be desired will be cheerfully allowed.

As you will be well acquainted with the nature of these claims, and the right of the United States to an indemnity—with the principles on which it is founded, and the arguments and facts which support it, it is unnecessary for me to enter further into the subject. The President has full confidence that nothing will be wanting on your part to secure success to the mission. Satisfied that you will discharge its duties with equal ability and discretion, it is thought improper, by too much precision, to impose any restraint on your judgment, either as to the manner or the argument to be used in the negotiation.

Your mission to Naples being special, its object limited, and being likewise anticipated by the Neapolitan Government, it is expected that it may be concluded in a few interviews. It is very important that the United States should be represented at St. Petersburg by a minister of the highest grade employed by them, without any delay which can be avoided. The President desires, therefore, that you will use every effort in your power to terminate the business with Naples as soon as it may be possible, and that you will proceed thence, immediately afterwards, to St. Petersburg.

Extracts of a letter from Mr. Pinkney, Minister at Naples, to Mr. Monroe, Secretary of State, dated

NAPLES, August 29, 1816.

On Saturday, the 27th, I prepared an official note to the Marquis di Circello, announcing my quality of envoy extraordinary to the King.

His answer (appointing Wednesday, the 31st, for our interview) was sent immediately.

My reception on the 31st was extremely friendly, and in the highest degree respectful to the Government of the United States. The regular purpose of my visit was to show my credentials, furnish a copy, and arrange the customary audience. I did not therefore suppose that it presented a suitable opportunity for introducing a very detailed explanation of the objects of my mission; but, in conformity with a desire expressed by the marquis himself, I stated them to him as fully as was necessary to enable him to communicate them to the King.

Although the Marquis di Circello was (as you know) for several years the minister of this court in London, he does not speak a word of English, and does not understand it when it is spoken by others. Our conversation was, therefore, in French. Amidst a good deal of well-managed discourse on his part, which rather related to me than to my mission, he made several observations which had a bearing upon my principal errand. He spoke of the poverty of their public treasury in terms somewhat more strong than I was prepared to expect; of the unprincipled manner in which Monsieur Murat (as he styled him) appropriated to his own use whatever of value he could lay his hands upon, and, in particular, the vessels and merchandise belonging to our citizens; of the prodigality with which he dried up all the usual resources of the country, and dissipated, moreover, all the means which rapacity afforded. He drew no very precise conclusion from those and similar remarks, although I took such notice of them as their tendency prescribed; but, upon the whole, it was evident that the claim which I was charged to make in behalf of our merchants was not likely to be very readily admitted, and that I should only waste my time by talking over its merits from day to day with a minister who could of himself decide nothing, and whose report of my statements and arguments to those who must make or greatly influence the final decision would not be the most advantageous channel by which they might be communicated. In consequence, before the interview was closed, I determined to prefer the claim as soon as possible in an official note, and in the mean time to forbear to urge it in conversation with any other view than to obtain from the Marquis di Circello such intimations as might be useful to me in the preparation of my paper.

On Sunday, the 11th, I had another interview with the Marquis di Circello, to which Mr. King accompanied me. I then adverted to the principal object of my mission, and intimated that I should very soon send him a note upon it. To my surprise, he professed not to understand to what I alluded as the principal object of my mission; but, when I mentioned the spoliations by Murat, he seemed suddenly to remember that I had at least talked to him of them before, and immediately, without giving me time to proceed, remarked that he would relate to me frankly all that the present Government had been able to discover respecting them. He said that Murat's conduct in that affair appeared to be so bad that nothing could be worse, and that it amounted to a downright robbery; that it appeared that the proceeds of the sales had been ordered by Murat into the public treasury, but that a few months afterwards he took them out again, and they knew not what he had done with them. To all this I thought it sufficient to answer, that, whatever might have become of these proceeds, I hoped the King would cause our merchants to be indemnified for the loss of them; but that I had no desire at this interview to do more than inform the Marquis di Circello that I believed it would be as well to present the whole of that subject to him without delay in a note, to which I flattered myself I should have such a reply, in writing, as would be satisfactory to my Government. Without either admitting or denying the responsibility of his Government, he said that such a course would be acceptable to him, and proper in itself, and that his answer should not be unnecessarily postponed. His manner, while this topic was under notice, was kind, and even good humored; although he could not, perhaps did not wish to disguise that it was by no means a pleasant one.

On the 28th instant (yesterday morning) I sent in my note upon Murat's confiscations. The necessity of making some previous inquiries here, upon matters connected with them, had a little retarded the completion of the note, and, after it was ready, I concluded that I should lose nothing by withholding it for a few days, especially as the Marquis di Circello was incapable of attending to business, and had so informed me.

What will be the answer to the note, it is impossible to conjecture with any thing like certainty. It may be such as to make it necessary for me to reply to it; but the President may be assured that my further stay in Naples shall be as short as I can make it.

Mr. Pinkney to the Marquis di Circello.

NAPLES, August 24, 1816.

The undersigned, envoy extraordinary of the United States of America, has already had the honor to mention to his excellency the Marquis di Circello, Secretary of State and Minister for Foreign Affairs of His Majesty the King of the Two Sicilies, the principal objects of his mission; and he now invites his excellency's attention to a more detailed and formal exposition of one of those objects.

The undersigned is sure that the appeal which he is about to make to the well-known justice of His Sicilian Majesty, in the name and by the orders of his Government, will receive a deliberate and candid consideration; and that if it shall appear, as he trusts it will, to be recommended by those principles which it is the interest as well as the duty of all Governments to observe and maintain, the claim involved in it will be admitted, effectually and promptly.

The undersigned did but obey the instructions of the President of the United States when he assured his excellency the Marquis di Circello, at their first interview, that his mission was suggested by such sentiments towards His Sicilian Majesty as could not fail to be approved by him. Those sentiments are apparent in the desire which the President has manifested, through the undersigned, that the commercial relations between the territories of His Majesty and those of the United States should be cherished by reciprocal arrangements, sought in the spirit of enlightened friendship, and with a sincere view to such equal advantages as it is fit for nations to derive from one another. The representations which the undersigned is commanded to make upon the subject of the present note will be seen by His Majesty in the same light. They show the firm reliance of the President upon the disposition of the court of Naples impartially to discuss and ascertain, and faithfully to discharge, its obligations towards foreign states and their citizens; a reliance which the undersigned partakes with his Government, and under the influence of which he proceeds to state the nature and grounds of the reclamation in question.

It cannot but be known to his excellency the Marquis di Circello, that, on the 1st of July, 1809, the Minister for Foreign Affairs of the then Government of Naples addressed to Frederick Degan, Esq., then consul of the United States, an official letter, containing an invitation to all American vessels, having on board the usual certificates of origin, and other regular papers, to come direct to Naples with their cargoes; and that the same minister caused that invitation to be published in every possible mode, in order that it might come to the knowledge of those whom it concerned. It will not be questioned that the promise of security necessarily implied in this measure had every title, in the actual circumstances of Europe, to the confidence of distant and peaceful merchants. The merchants of America, as was to have been expected, did confide. Upon the credit, and under the protection of that promise, they sent to Naples many valuable vessels and cargoes, navigated and documented with scrupulous regularity, and in no respect obnoxious to molestation; but scarcely had they reached the destination to which they had been allured, when they were seized, without distinction, as prizes, or as otherwise forfeited to the Neapolitan Government, upon pretexts the most frivolous and idle. These arbitrary seizures were followed, with a rapacious haste, by summary decrees, confiscating, in the name and for the use of the same Government, the whole of the property which had thus been brought within its grasp; and these decrees, which wanted even the decent affectation of justice, were immediately carried into execution, against all the remonstrances of those whom they oppressed, to enrich the treasury of the state.

The undersigned persuades himself, that it is not in a note addressed to the Marquis di Circello that it is necessary to enlarge upon the singularly atrocious character of this procedure, for which no apology can be devised, and for which none that is intelligible has hitherto been attempted. It was, indeed, an undisguised abuse of power, of which nothing could well enhance the deformity but the studied deception that preceded and prepared it; a deception which, by a sort of treason against society, converted a proffer of hospitality into a snare, and that salutary confidence, without which nations and men must cease to have intercourse, into an engine of plunder.

The right of the innocent victims of this unequalled act of fraud and rapine to demand retribution cannot be doubted. The only question is, from whom are they entitled to demand it? Those who at that moment ruled in Naples, and were in fact, and in the view of the world, the Government of Naples, have passed away before retribution could be obtained, although not before it was required; and, if the right to retribution regards only the persons of those rulers as private and ordinary wrongdoers, the American merchant, whom they deluded and despoiled in the garb and with the instruments and for the purposes of sovereignty, must despair forever of redress.

The undersigned presumes that such is not the view which the present Government will feel itself justified in taking of this interesting subject; he trusts that it will, on the contrary, perceive that the claim which the injured merchant was authorized to prefer against the Government of this country before the recent change, and which,

but for that change, must sooner or later have been successful, is now a valid claim against the Government of the same country, notwithstanding that change: at least the undersigned is not at present aware of any considerations which, applied to the facts that characterize this case, can lead to a different conclusion; and certainly it would be matter for sincere regret that any considerations should be thought sufficient to make the return of His Sicilian Majesty's power fatal to the rights of friendly strangers, to whom no fault can be ascribed.

The general principle, that a civil society may contract obligations through its actual Government, whatever that may be, and that it is not absolved from them by reason simply of a change of government, or of rulers, is universally received as incontrovertible. It is admitted, not merely by writers on public law, as a speculative truth, but by states and statesmen, as a practical rule; and, accordingly, history is full of examples to prove that the undisturbed possessor of sovereign power in any society, whether a rightful possessor or not with reference to other claimants of that power, may not only be the lawful object of allegiance, but by many of his acts, in his quality of sovereign de facto, may bind the society, and those who come after him as rulers, although their title be adversary to, or even better than his own. The Marquis di Circello does not need to be informed that the earlier annals of England, in particular, abound in instructions upon this head.

With regard to just and beneficial contracts entered into by such a sovereign with the merchants of foreign nations, or (which is the same thing) with regard to the detention and confiscation of their property for public uses, and by his authority, in direct violation of a pledge of safety, upon the faith of which that property arrived within the reach of confiscation, this continuing responsibility stands upon the plainest foundations of natural equity.

It will not be pretended that a merchant is called upon to investigate, as he prosecutes his traffic, the title of every sovereign with whose ports, and under the guaranty of whose plighted word, he trades. He is rarely competent. There are few in any station who are competent to an investigation so full of delicacy, so perplexed with facts and principles of a peculiar character, far removed from the common concerns of life. His predicament would be to the last degree calamitous, if, in an honest search after commercial profit, he might not take Governments as he finds them, and, consequently, rely at all times upon the visible, exclusive, acknowledged possession of supreme authority. If he sees all the usual indications of established rule, all the distinguishing concomitants of real, undisputed power, it cannot be that he is, at his peril, to discuss mysterious theories above his capacity, or foreign to his pursuits; and, moreover, to connect the results of those speculations with events of which his knowledge is either imperfect or erroneous. If he sees the obedience of the people, and the acquiescence of neighboring princes, it is impossible that it can be his duty to examine, before he ships his merchandise, whether it be fit that these should acquiesce or those obey. If, in short, he finds nothing to interfere with or qualify the dominion which the head of the society exercises over it and the domain which it occupies, it is the dictate of reason, sanctioned by all experience, that he is bound to look no further.

It can be of no importance to him that, notwithstanding all these appearances announcing lawful rule, the mere right to fill the throne is claimed by, or even resides in, another than the actual occupant. The latent right, (supposing it to exist,) disjoined from and controverted by the fact, is to him nothing while it continues to be latent. It is only the sovereign in possession that it is in his power to know. It is with him only that he can enter into engagements. It is through him only that he can deal with the society. And if it be true that the sovereign in possession is incapable, on account of a conflict of title between him and another, who barely claims, but makes no effort to assert his claim, of pledging the public faith of the society and of the monarch to foreign traders, for commercial and other objects, we are driven to the monstrous conclusion that the society is, in effect and indefinitely, cut off from all communication with the rest of the world. It has, and can have, no organ by which it can become accountable to or make any contract with foreigners by which needful supplies may be invited into its harbors, by which famine may be averted, or redundant productions be made to find a market in the wants of strangers. It is, in a word, an outcast from the bosom of the great community of nations, at the very moment, too, when its existence, in the form which it has assumed, may every where be admitted. And even if the dormant claim to the throne should at last, by a fortunate coincidence of circumstances, become triumphant, and unite itself to the possession, this harsh and palsying theory has no assurance to give, either to the society or to those who may incline to deal with it, that its moral capacity is restored, that it is an outcast no longer, and that it may now, through the protecting will of its new sovereign, do what it could not do before. It contains, of course, no adequate and certain provision against even the perpetuity of the dilemma which it creates. If, therefore, a civil society is not competent, by rules in entire possession of the sovereignty, to enter into all such promises to the members of other societies as necessity or convenience may require, and to remain unanswerable for the breach of them into whatsoever shape the society may ultimately be cast, or into whatsoever hands the government may ultimately fall; if a sovereign entirely in possession is not able, for that reason alone, to incur a just responsibility in his political or corporate character to the citizens of other countries, and to transmit that responsibility even to those who succeed him by displacing him, it will be difficult to show that the moral capacity of a civil society is any thing but a name, or the responsibility of sovereigns any thing but a shadow. And here the undersigned will take the liberty to suggest, that it is scarcely for the interest of sovereigns to inculcate as a maxim that their lost dominions can only be recovered at the expense of the unoffending citizens of states in amity, or, which is equivalent to it, to make that recovery the practical consummation of intermediate injustice, by utterly extinguishing the hope of indemnity, and even the title to demand it.

The undersigned will now, for the sake of perspicuity and precision, recall to the recollection of his excellency the Marquis di Circello the situation of the Government of Murat at the epoch of the confiscations in question. Whatever might be the origin or foundation of that Government, it had for some time been established. It had obtained such obedience as in such times was customary, and had manifested itself, not only by active internal exertions of legislative and executive powers, but by important external transactions with old and indisputably regular Governments. It had been (as long afterwards it continued to be) recognised by the greatest potentates as one of the European family of states, and had interchanged with them ambassadors, and other public ministers and consuls. And Great Britain, by an order in council of the 26th of April, 1809, which modified the system of constructive blockade promulgated by the orders of November, 1807, had excepted the Neapolitan territories, with other portions of Italy, from the operation of that system, that neutrals might no longer be prevented from trading with them.

Such was the state of things when American vessels were tempted into Naples by a reliance upon the passports of its Government, to which perfidy had lent more than ordinary solemnity, upon a declaration, as explicit as it was formal and notorious, that they might come without fear, and might depart in peace. It was under these circumstances that, instead of being permitted to retire with their lawful gains, both they and their cargoes were seized and appropriated in a manner already related. The undersigned may consequently assume, that if ever there was a claim to compensation for broken faith which survived the political power of those whose iniquity produced it, and devolved in full force upon their successors, the present claim is of that description.

As to the demand itself, as it existed against the Government of Murat, the Marquis di Circello will undoubtedly be the first to concede, not only that it is above reproach, but that it rests upon grounds in which the civilized world has a deep and lasting interest. And with regard to the liability of the present Government, as standing in the place of the former, it may be taken as a corollary from that concession; at least until it has been shown that it is the natural fate of obligations, so high and sacred, contracted by a Government in the full and tranquil enjoyment of power, to perish with the first revolution, either in form or rulers, through which it may happen to pass; or (to state the same proposition in different terms) that it is the natural operation of a political revolution in a state, to strip unfortunate traders who have been betrayed and plundered by the former sovereign of all that his rapacity could not reach—the right of reclamation.

The wrong which the Government of Murat inflicted upon American citizens wanted nothing that might give to it atrocity or effect as a robbery introduced by treachery; but, however pernicious or execrable, it was still reparable. It left in the sufferers and their nation a right, which was not likely to be forgotton or abandoned, of seeking and obtaining ample redress, not from Murat simply, (who, individually, was lost in the sovereign,) but from the Government of the country whose power he abused. By what course of argument can it be proved that this incontestable right, from which that Government could never have escaped, has been destroyed by the reaccession of His Sicilian Majesty, after a long interval, to the sovereignty of the same territories?

That such a result cannot in any degree be inferred from the misconduct of the American claimants, is certain; for no misconduct is imputable to them. They were warranted, in every view of the public law of Europe, in holding commercial communication with Naples in the predicament in which they found it, and in trusting to the direct and authentic assurances which the Government of the place affected to throw over them as a shield against every danger. Their shipments were strictly within the terms of those assurances; and nothing was done by the shippers or their agents by which the benefit of them might be lost or impaired.

From what other source can such a result be drawn? Will it be said that the proceeds of these confiscations were not applied to public purposes during the sovereignty of Murat, or that they produced no public advantages with reference to which the present Government ought to be liable? The answer to such a suggestion is, that let the fact be as it may, it can have no influence upon the subject. It is enough that the confiscations themselves, and the promise of safety which they violated, were acts of state, proceeding from him who was then, and for several successive years, the sovereign. The derivative liability of the present Government reposes not upon the good, either public or private, which may have been the fruit of such a revolting exhibition of power, emancipated from all the restraints of principle, but upon the general foundations which the undersigned has already had the honor to expose.

To follow the proceeds of these spoliations into the public treasury, and thence to all the uses to which they were finally made subservient, can be no part of the duty of the American claimant. It is a task which he has no means of performing, and which, if performed by others, could neither strengthen his case nor enfeeble it. And it may confidently be insisted, not only that he has no concern with the particular application of these proceeds, but that, even if he had, he would be authorized to rely upon the presumption that they were applied as public money to public ends, or left in the public coffers. It must be remembered, moreover, that whatever may have been the destiny of these unhallowed spoils, they cannot well have failed to be instrumental in meliorating the condition of the country. They afforded extraordinary pecuniary means, which, as far as they extended, must have saved it from an augmentation of its burdens; or, by relieving the ordinary revenue, made that revenue adequate to various improvements, either of use or beauty, which otherwise it could not have accomplished. The territories, therefore, under the sway of Murat, must be supposed to have returned to His Sicilian Majesty less exhausted, more embellished, and more prosperous, than if the property of American citizens had not in the mean time been sacrificed to cupidity and cunning. It must farther be remembered, that a part of that property was notoriously devoted to the public service. Some of the vessels seized by the orders of Murat were, on account of their excellent construction, converted into vessels of war, and, as such, commissioned by the Government; and the undersigned is informed that they are now in the possession of the officers of His Sicilian Majesty, and used and claimed as belonging to him.

The undersigned, having thus briefly explained to the Marquis di Circello the nature of the claim which the Government of the United States has commanded him to submit to the reflection of the Government of His Sicilian Majesty, forbears at present to multiply arguments in support of it. He feels assured that the equitable disposition of His Majesty renders superfluous the further illustrations of which it is susceptible.

The undersigned has the honor to renew to his excellency the Marquis di Circello the assurances of his distinguished consideration.

WILLIAM PINKNEY.

Mr. Pinkney to Mr. Monroe.

SIR: NAPLES, September 28, 1816.

My exertions have not yet been sufficient (although they have been unremitting) to obtain an answer to my note of the 24th of August; and the season is so far advanced that I fear I have only another week for further exertions. If I do not set out for Russia without delay, I shall subject myself to the hazard of being confined to Italy by rains and bad roads during a great part of the winter. It is my determination, therefore, to press immediately and finally for a categorical reply to my note, although I am persuaded that the marquis is in no situation to give it. He must either reply at once, or show why he cannot.

It has been mentioned to me by those in whom I have confidence, that this Government has been extremely perplexed by the demand contained in my note, and has had it under constant and anxious consideration; that, fearing after much consultation to take the ground suggested for it, as I think in America, of irresponsibility for such acts of Murat's Government as my note sets forth, it has been, and still is, searching for information as to facts; that diligent inquiry, for example, has been made, and is yet making, for the original papers of the different vessels and cargoes for which we require compensation, or for such evidence as might supply their place; and that it is probable that in the end an attempt will be made to encounter at least a part of our demand with proof (good or bad) that our case is not altogether such as we suppose it to be in its circumstances.

I am told their search after the papers of the vessels and cargoes is not likely to be very successful; very few, perhaps none, remain; and it is not easy to conjecture what satisfactory or even plausible substitutes they can procure.

I wrote yesterday a private letter to the Marquis di Circello, urging a prompt answer to my note, and desiring that he would tell me, with a view to preparations for my departure, (which, of course, he knew I could not much longer postpone,) when I might count upon receiving it; but I now think it necessary to demand an interview, with the same object, to take place either to-day or to-morrow. I have the honor to be, &c.

WILLIAM PINKNEY.

Extracts of a letter from Mr. Pinkney, special Minister of the United States at Naples, to Mr. Monroe, Secretary of State, dated

NAPLES, October 5, 1816.

On Sunday, the 29th of last month, I had an interview with the Marquis di Circello, in pursuance of the intention announced in my last. I pressed him for his promised answer to my note of the 24th of August, and insisted that if he could not reply to it immediately, he would name the time within which it was probable he could do so. He said that an immediate answer was really impossible, and that he could not, without running the risk of misleading me, fix any precise time for the giving of such an answer as should be categorical. I asked the reason of this. He observed that the papers relative to the vessels and cargoes, for which we now demanded an equivalent, had, in Murat's time, been scattered about in such a way, that with all the diligence they could use, they had not yet been able to collect them, or such information as might stand in their place; that all proper steps had been taken by the King's Government for obtaining these papers, and whatever else was connected with and material to our claim, and that they hoped that they would soon be successful; that our claim, apparently of large amount, was made upon those who confessedly had no participation in the transactions upon which it was founded; that it was, therefore, manifest, they had all their knowledge of those transactions to gain; that they were sincerely desirous of understanding them thoroughly; that, without all the knowledge of the circumstances of the case which could at this time and by due inquiry be recovered, the King could not decide whether he was or was not answerable to us as we alleged; that a decision would undoubtedly be hastened and made known to me as soon as possible, and, as he believed, within a period of time not by any means distant; but that I must perceive that it was not in his power, without practising disingenuousness, to assure me that this could be done in a few weeks. After some further conversation on this point, I told him that I feared I should be obliged to leave Naples before his answer was prepared; and as he knew that my ulterior destination was St. Petersburg, I informed him, finally, that I had determined to set out for Russia on Saturday, the 5th instant, (this day,) unless, by waiting a week or two more, I could be sure of adjusting the business of my mission. He replied, with his characteristical good breeding, that they should be extremely sorry to lose me, and that they had hoped to have me with them for some time, but that, if my duty elsewhere called me away, he would undertake to send the answer to my note the moment it could be given, wherever I would indicate; that there was no probability that, if I left Naples as soon as I spoke of, or even a week or two later, I should receive the answer here, but that if it could be given so promptly it should. I rejoined that I doubted if, without instructions, it would be well for me to receive the answer after I had left the King's court and territories; that I confidently trusted the answer would admit our claim, (though we had no desire to urge them inconveniently as to the time or mode of payment, or even to push our demand to its utmost extent,) but that however little such a result was to be expected, the answer might contest our demand, or an important portion of it; in which case it was both my duty and inclination to reply to the answer, and to maintain, as I did not fear to be able to do, the grounds of fact and law upon which I had already relied; and that this could not be done with advantage, nor, perhaps, with propriety, unless with the approbation of my Government, after my departure for another station.

The marquis immediately expressed an opinion that I might regularly receive the answer after I had left the Neapolitan dominions; and, in consequence of a question which I put to him in this stage of the conversation, (whether it might not be more in rule to offer to deliver the answer to whom, and to where, the Government of the United States should think fit?) he said, that he should have no objection to any course which I preferred, but that he thought it would be best (as being more respectful to me) that he should undertake to send the answer as I should prescribe, especially as this course essentially included the other. It would have been impossible for me to dispute an opinion referred to so civil a motive, even if the matter had been worth disputing.

I did not think, however, that it was worth more words than had been bestowed upon it; and I therefore left the marquis to take his own way upon it, reserving to myself the power of taking mine in due season.

In the whole of this conversation (of which I have very shortly stated the import) not a word was dropped by the marquis condemning our claim, or intimating that it was likely to be rejected, although much of what I said was calculated to provoke him to do so; but, again, he said nothing which amounted to an admission that the claim would be acknowledged.

Before I went away, I requested (and he promised) that he would write me a note, expressing briefly what had passed between us; and, in the evening of the same day, I received from him a paper (of which a copy is among the enclosures) written and sent in consequence of that request; but, on examining that paper, I found it referred to my unofficial letter, mentioned in my last, and not to our interview; and moreover, it was dated the 27th of September, (perhaps a mistake for the 29th, or possibly my mistake of his figures,) which was antecedent to the interview. I took it for granted, however, that the marquis had understood me to wish that this mode should be adopted; and, as it was of no importance, I did not put him, as at first I thought of doing, to the trouble of changing it. I therefore founded upon it the three notes, (bearing date, two of them the 30th of September, and the other the 1st of October,) of which copies are enclosed. On the 2d instant I received the marquis's answer to my note of the 30th of September, which desired an audience of the King; and I took leave, accordingly, on Friday, the 4th instant, one of the days referred by the marquis's note to my choice, as you will perceive by the copy of it herewith transmitted. The King was polite and kind, and conversed for some time with me on this occasion; but nothing was said by him which had any relation to the objects of my mission.

Having received my passports, my intention is to commence my journey for St. Petersburg in a very few days. Mr. King left me for Russia about a fortnight ago, as my letter of the 18th September informed you he would; and the gentlemen attached to my legation have gone before me to Rome, where I hope to arrive on Thursday or Friday next.

I beg your attention now to a few words upon the course which I have pursued as envoy extraordinary to Naples, and upon the actual position and prospects of the claim which produced it. My stay here has, perhaps, been a little longer than was anticipated when I sailed from America; but, upon a careful examination of my instructions, it appeared to me that I was directed by them to make the attempt to obtain an acknowledgment of our claim upon this Government, as full and complete as possible, without sacrificing to it the interests of my mission to Russia. I have done this. As the claim was of great magnitude in a pecuniary sense, involved important principles, and turned upon facts into which those with whom I had to deal had a right to inquire, I could scarcely hope to bring it to an issue of any kind within less than the two months which have elapsed since my first reception here. With regard to my mission to Russia, I have yet made no sacrifice.

Independently of the explanations which I have had, from time to time, with the Count Morenigo, (the Russian minister here,) with regard to my own anxiety, in conformity with the order of my Government, to be in St. Petersburg without delay, those who have experience of the road assure me that, if I had started sooner, I should have been obliged to wait upon the route for the setting in of the frost, and that I should, therefore, have gained nothing.

On the other hand, certainly I could have no apology for protracting my stay in Naples beyond the time to which I have limited it. My instructions, which are precisely what they ought to be, would not justify it. By remaining here a few weeks more, I should postpone for several months, perhaps, my arrival at St. Petersburg, by losing the best season for quitting Italy.

Of the manner in which my negotiation has been conducted I have little to say. Avoiding extremes of every kind, I have sought to write and speak with politeness, but at the same time explicitly and firmly. My object has been to let the King and his ministers understand that the claim must be settled, and to place it upon such ground as to convince them that we are in earnest in considering them as our debtors. Without being studiously conciliatory, I have forborne all menaces.

They have, indeed, treated me and my errand with so much respect, that it would have been difficult for me, even if it had been wise and honorable, to endeavor to force the claim upon them by arrogance and harshness.

I might, indeed, have contrived to display a more active and zealous importunity than my letters will be found to describe; but it could only have been that teasing importunity, which, wanting dignity, and unauthorized by usage, has nothing to recommend its introduction into transactions like this. No proper opportunity has, I think, been missed, to urge this Government to a favorable decision. As to the footing upon which the claim now stands, and the value of its future prospects, it is obvious that much has been gained. It has been presented, (whether well or ill, I dare not judge.) It has been received in a becoming manner, and entertained for deliberation and inquiry. The way to adjustment has been prepared and smoothed. The great principle on which the demand was rested by the Government of the United States is impliedly conceded, and, at any rate, has been greatly strengthened by the forbearance of this Government, not only in limine, but even to the last moment of my mission, to deny it, with opportunity and every inducement to do so constantly presented to it. It was to have been expected, and was expected, that the court of Naples would resist, at the threshold, a demand which directly, as well as implicitly, asserted its responsibility for the violences and frauds of Murat. It was its true policy to repel such a demand at once, (without reference to details,) if it meant to contest at all the responsibility, upon which the claimants altogether depended, and which formed, in truth, the only dubious part of their case. It was prepared to take that course (as I was well assured) upon my first arrival, yet it has not ventured to take it. On the contrary, it has avowedly busied itself, since the presentation of my note of the 24th of August, in efforts (which cannot be successful) to lay a foundation of fact for distinctions that may give it a chance of escaping from our principle, which finally it declines to question.

The reasons suggested by this Government for a short postponement of its decision are such as I suppose I could not have quarrelled with, without putting myself in the wrong. They are perfectly respectful to the United States, and of real weight in themselves. Their effect is to leave negotiation open, to give encouragement to resume it, and, at the same time that they impart new solidity to our claims, to render an acquiescence on our part in a brief adjournment of it not only consistent with our honor, but a duty. In the mean time, the two Governments are not brought to a disagreeable issue, as (if the claim had been rejected without ceremony, or even with all the ostentation of civility,) they might have been.

In not consenting to receive the answer of this Government after my departure from Naples, I was a good deal influenced by the apprehension that they might possibly give me such an answer when absent as they would not give me if present. I desired, moreover, to insure to my Government a just control over the subject, and to the claimants a clear stage for their own private exertions. I thought that a more convenient resting point could scarcely be had, and that it would be better that I should afford time to advise upon the case to those who had more right than I had to dispose of it in future, than that, adhering to my mission after I had separated myself from those to whom I was accredited, I should risk the loss of every thing by the exercise of a very doubtful authority, under all sorts of disadvantages.

The Marquis di Circello to Mr. Pinkney, dated

NAPLES, September 27, 1816.

The Marquis di Circello, in reply to the private letter of his excellency Mr. Pinkney, in which he is pleased to remind him of his official note of the 24th of August last, has the honor to inform him, that notwithstanding the great anxiety of him (the Marquis di Circello) to give the reply which he owes to the said note, he is not yet able to give it, since it must be the result of a reunion and accurate examination of all the information which the subject of that note requires, and for obtaining which orders have been given. This may probably occupy several weeks more, and it is of course impossible for him yet to fix the epoch at which the said reply may be given as Mr. Pinkney desires. The writer, however, assures his excellency, that in case his situation should not permit him to wait for the said reply, he will make it his duty to forward it wheresoever he may indicate.

In the mean time, he profits of this occasion to have the honor to confirm to his excellency the assurances of his distinguished consideration.

IL MARCHESE DI CIRCELLO.

Mr. Pinkney to the Marquis di Circello, dated

NAPLES, September 30, 1816.

The undersigned, envoy extraordinary of the United States of America, had the honor to receive last night the note of his excellency the Marquis di Circello, bearing date the 27th instant, upon the subject of the note of the undersigned of the 24th of August.

The undersigned certainly regrets that the Government of His Sicilian Majesty has not been able already to honor him with a precise reply to that note; and he regrets still more that, on account of the difficulty of collecting the information supposed to be necessary to a correct decision upon the claim which it preferred, he cannot hope to have such a reply during the time to which he is obliged to limit his present stay in Naples.

He is perfectly sure, however, that the epoch is at hand when His Majesty's Government will be possessed of this information, and when the justice of the claim of the Government of the United States, in behalf of its injured citizens, will be fully perceived and distinctly acknowledged.

The undersigned, in answer to that part of the note of the Marquis di Circello which proposes to send a reply to the note of the undersigned of the 24th of August wheresoever the undersigned may indicate, has the honor to state to the Marquis di Circello, that, upon this point, as well as upon all such ulterior steps as his mission and the subject of it may be calculated to produce, the undersigned will think it his duty to refer himself to his Government, which, at the same time that it will give their due weight to the reasons which are now assigned for a short postponement of the claim in question, will take such measures as it shall think the case requires with regard to the future.

The undersigned takes this occasion to renew to his excellency the Marquis di Circello the assurances of his distinguished consideration.

WM. PINKNEY.

Mr. Pinkney to the Marquis di Circello, dated

NAPLES, September 30, 1816.

The undersigned, envoy extraordinary of the United States of America, being about to leave the court of His Majesty the King of the Two Sicilies, upon the business of his Government, has the honor to request that his excellency the Marquis di Circello will have the goodness to inform him at what time His Majesty will honor him with an audience.

The undersigned avails himself of this opportunity to renew to his excellency the Marquis di Circello the assurances of his most distinguished consideration.

WM. PINKNEY.

Mr. Pinkney to the Marquis di Circello, dated

NAPLES, October 1, 1816.

The undersigned, envoy extraordinary of the United States of America, has the honor to request of his excellency the Marquis di Circello the usual passports for himself, his family, and suite, and their baggage, &c.

It is his present intention to go to St. Petersburg by the way of Vienna; but it is possible that he may abandon that route in favor of the road through Berlin. He wishes to set out at the end of this week.

He begs his excellency the Marquis di Circello to accept the renewed assurances of his distinguished consideration.

The Marquis di Circello to Mr. Pinkney, dated

NAPLES, October 2, 1816.

The undersigned, Secretary of State and Minister for Foreign Affairs, in reply to the official note of the 30th of last month, in which his excellency Mr. Pinkney, envoy extraordinary of the United States of America, has requested an audience of His Majesty the King of the Two Sicilies, hastens to inform him that His Majesty will with pleasure receive him at the royal palace in Naples either to-morrow or next day, (as may be most convenient to his excellency,) at half-past eleven o'clock in the forenoon.

The undersigned renews to his excellency, &c.

IL MARCHESE DI CIRCELLO.

Mr. Pinkney, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States at St. Petersburg, to Mr. Adams, Secretary of State.

SIR: ST. PETERSBURG, February 27, 1817.

Notwithstanding the explicitness of my answer of the 30th of September of the last year to the proposal contained in the note of the Marquis di Circello of the 27th of the same month, I had scarcely quitted Naples when he sent after me his reply to my note of the 24th of August. The obstacles which, while I was present, threatened to retard that reply for many a week, and even for months, disappeared with a marvellous rapidity after I had departed; for the reply passed me on the road to St. Petersburg, and arrived there long before me.

The Neapolitan minister at this court (to whom it was forwarded by the Marquis di Circello, for the purpose of being delivered to me) manifested immediately upon my arrival here a very anxious desire that I should receive it. He even intreated me to do so, with such earnestness as it was not easy to resist. I refused, however, to have any thing to do with his packet, and assigned as my reasons that I had ceased to have any right to meddle with the subjects of my late mission to his Government; that the Marquis di Circello was distinctly told by me, when I found that I must leave Naples without an answer to my note, that I would not continue to correspond with him upon the claim which it preferred, unless I should be instructed to do so by my Government; and that he could not but know, without the help of anybody's information, that it was impossible that I should so soon be in possession of such instructions, even if the President approved of that course, (as it was probable he would not,) for the conclusion of my negotiation.

The duke proposed finally to write me a letter, importing that he had the reply to my note, and that he wished me to take it. I assented to this, and the short correspondence, of which a copy is enclosed, was the consequence.

If I had been perfectly sure that the reply was a favorable one, and required no further discussion, (which, indeed, I did not understand it to be the intention of the Sicilian Government to indulge me in,) I would have received it. The celerity with which it had followed me, however, suggested the opposite presumption; and the duke's desultory conversations with me, as often as I met him, (in which he talked, as the Marquis di Circello was wont to do, of the poverty of his master, &c.) did not weaken that presumption. Certain newspapers, too, professing to speak from authority, had affected to quote the reply as a refusal, which had already been given to me. You will find a republication of one of those articles in the enclosed Conservateur Impartial, and will be satisfied that the Sicilian Government, or its minister at Vienna or St. Petersburg, has dictated the latter part of it.

Upon the whole, having lost my power to deal with the reply as its contents might require, and fearing it was not what it ought to be, I thought it my duty to insist upon the impropriety of sending it at this moment to me, (an impropriety for which the Marquis di Circello could have no motive that I ought to sanction,) and upon that ground to decline to take it. The duke has shown uneasiness at this course, and I am not sorry for it. His Government is a good deal disturbed by our claim, and we hazard nothing (and may gain) by practising upon its anxiety within certain bounds, or even to any extent we think fit.

I have the honor to be, with very distinguished consideration, sir, your most obedient humble servant,

WILLIAM PINKNEY.

To the honorable the SECRETARY OF STATE of the United States.

The Duke of Serra Capriola to Mr. Pinkney.

SIR: ST. PETERSBURG, February 7, (19,) 1817.

I have received from my court a note in answer to that addressed by your excellency to the Marquis di Circello on the 24th of August last, and which it was not possible to deliver you before your departure, on account of the information necessary to be taken relative to the business with which you were charged by your Government.

I have the honor to give you this information, for the purpose of knowing if you are willing to receive it, and take your arrangements for that purpose.

In the meanwhile, be pleased to receive the assurances of the very distinguished consideration with which I have the honor to be, sir,

Your excellency's most humble and most obedient servant,

THE DUKE OF SERRA CAPRIOLA.

Mr. Pinkney's answer to the foregoing.

SIR: ST. PETERSBURG, February 20, 1817, (N. S.)

It would have been particularly agreeable to me to obtain, during the continuance of my functions as the envoy extraordinary of the United States at Naples, while I might regularly have taken and acted upon it, an answer to the note which in that character I addressed to the Marquis di Circello on the 24th of August of the last year, and I certainly spared no efforts for that purpose.

I found it impracticable, however, after the importunity of many weeks, to obtain either an answer, or the designation of any precise time within which I might be authorized to expect one; and, as my ulterior duties here would not suffer me to wait at Naples for the issue of inquiries and deliberations, of which avowedly the term could not be foreseen even by those who were engaged in them, I was compelled to leave unsettled the subject of my note, and to put an end to my mission.

My power to correspond with the Government of the King of the Two Sicilies upon that subject, or otherwise to assume an agency in it, has consequently ceased, and can only be revived by the President of the United States, from whom I derived it originally, and to whom I have rendered an account of the use which I was able to make of it. Whether it will be his pleasure to renew it in any degree, or in what other way he will think it proper to deal with the subject, I have no means of knowing. I know only that he has yet given me no orders upon it, and that there has not been time for such orders.

The Marquis di Circello must be prepared for this answer to your excellency's letter to me of the 19th instant if he does me the honor to preserve any recollection of my note to him of the 30th of September last, of which (as well as of his note to me of the 27th of the same month) I shall be very willing to give you a copy if you desire it.

I have the honor to be, with very distinguished consideration,

Your excellency's most obedient humble servant,

WILLIAM PINKNEY.

To His Excellency the DUKE OF SERRA CAPRIOLA.

The Duke of Serra Capriola to Mr. Pinkney.

SIR: ST. PETERSBURG, February 9, (21,) 1817.

I received yesterday the letter by which your excellency has been pleased to reply to that which I addressed to you on the 7th (19th) of this month, stating the reasons by which you consider yourself no longer authorized to receive the note in answer to it, transmitted to me by the minister of His Majesty the King, my master.

Your excellency will readily conceive how unpleasant and painful it must have been to the King not to have been able to cause an answer to be given to your note of the 24th of August last, during your mission at Naples; but you are aware, sir, that that answer must necessarily have been founded on documents and proofs not easily procured, inasmuch as the transaction in discussion took place under a Government foreign to the existing one. If this delay was painful to the King and to his ministry, how much more will it not be on seeing the answer again impeded. I consider it, therefore, my duty, sir, to engage you to receive the packet I am charged with, at least for the purpose of transmitting it to your Government. By this means you will satisfy the wishes of my Government, and make the President of the United States acquainted with the well-founded arguments which might accelerate the termination of this affair.

Availing myself of the offer you have made me, sir, I have to request you would be pleased to favor me with a copy of the Marquis of Circello's letter, and of your answer of the 30th September. You will thereby greatly oblige me, sir; and, in thus tendering you my acknowledgments for it, I seize the present occasion of renewing to you the assurances of the very distinguished consideration with which

I have the honor to be, sir, your excellency's most humble and most obedient servant,

THE DUKE OF SERRA CAPRIOLA.

Mr. Pinkney's reply to the foregoing.

SIR: ST. PETERSBURG, February 21, 1817, (N. S.)

It would really give me sincere pleasure to be able to conform to the wish which your excellency presses upon me with so much earnestness; but I feel insurmountable repugnance, arising out of what I believe to be a correct sense of my duty, to giving any sanction to the making of a communication to me, as if I were still the accredited envoy of the United States at Naples. I can have no difficulty, however, in consenting to forward to the Secretary of State of the United States any thing which, by order of your court, you may think fit to address to him.

What may be the nature of the packet which has followed me from Naples, I do not know, and do not desire to know, farther than that it is in answer to a note written by me in an official character which I no longer possess. I have the utmost confidence, indeed, that it proposes a fair indemnity to our plundered merchants, not only with reference to that part of the spoil which, not having been sold by Murat, has passed into the hands of His Majesty the King of the Two Sicilies, and is now in his possession, but with reference also to that larger portion of it which was converted into money. But let it propose what it may, it is not to me that it should address itself, at least until my Government is known to have given me such instructions, which it has not yet had time to give, even if it be disposed to adopt that course, as may justify me in receiving it, and in acting upon it as its contents may require.

The copies which you desire are herewith enclosed. They will satisfy you that the Marquis di Circello ought to anticipate the answer which I now repeat to your application.

I have the honor to be, with the most distinguished consideration,

Your excellency's most obedient, humble servant,

WILLIAM PINKNEY.

To His Excellency the DUKE DI SERRA CAPRIOLA.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Gallatin, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States at Paris, to Mr. Monroe, Secretary of State, dated

PARIS, November 19, 1816.

I received, on the 16th instant, a note from the Neapolitan ambassador, enclosing, by order of his court, the copy of an official note, dated 15th October last, and addressed by the Marquis di Circello to Mr. Pinkney, after his departure from Naples. In answer to a verbal inquiry, the ambassador told me that he did not know whether that note had been directed to Mr. Pinkney, at St. Petersburg, or at any other place on the road. He also said that his Government had authorized him to add to that communication to me any further observations which he might deem proper, but that he had abstained from it, knowing that neither he nor myself had any powers on that subject, and wishing, therefore, to avoid an unprofitable discussion.

It may be presumed that the Neapolitan Government delayed that note in order to prevent the possibility of a reply; and that their intention in communicating it to me was to hasten its transmission to you. Copies of the official note itself, and of that of the ambassador to me, are enclosed.

PARIS, November 15, 1816.

The undersigned, ambassador extraordinary of His Majesty the King of the Two Sicilies, has the honor to transmit, by order of his court, to Mr. Gallatin, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the United States of America, a copy of an official note, addressed by the Marquis di Circello, Minister and Secretary of State of his said Majesty, to Mr. Pinkney, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the United States, in answer to his note of the 24th of August last, on the subject of certain American vessels confiscated in 1809 by Murat.

The undersigned avails himself of this occasion to renew to Mr. Gallatin the assurances of his high consideration.

CASTELCICALA.

[TRANSLATION.]

The Marquis of Circello, Minister of Foreign Affairs at Naples, to Mr. Pinkney, special Minister of the United States.

NAPLES, October 15, 1816.

Although the Government of His Majesty the King of the Two Sicilies was, from the first moment, in a situation to judge of the validity of the remonstrance and demands made by his excellency Mr. Pinkney, envoy extraordinary of the United States of America, in his note of the 24th August last, nevertheless, wishing to examine and discuss them under all their aspects of right and of fact, it has waited, accordingly, until all the materials and lights were collected proper to this end.

The many difficulties attending the search after those materials, owing to the change in the order of things during which the facts occurred that have given rise to the demands of Mr. Pinkney, rendered it impossible for the royal Government to reply to the note of his excellency before his departure from Naples.

Now that the papers and appropriate inquiries have shed the strongest light upon the affair in question, the undersigned, Counsellor and Secretary of State, Minister of Foreign Affairs of His Majesty the King of the Two Sicilies, hastens to give, by order of his sovereign, the following reply to Mr. Pinkney, requesting his excellency to be pleased to communicate it to his Government.

All the arguments contained in the note of the 24th August look to the end of making His Majesty's Government responsible for the consequences of the confiscation and sale, whether just or unjust, of several American vessels and cargoes, which took place in Naples while the kingdom was held by Murat.

In support of this pretension, it is assumed that the abuse of power and violation of good faith, by which these arbitrary acts were committed, are of such a nature as to survive the political authority of the author of them, and that, of course, as there accrued a right of reclamation against the Government of Murat, there exists one also against the present Government of the Two Sicilies.

His excellency adds, that although the American claimants have not the means of ascertaining to what uses the produce of the abovementioned sales was applied, yet they may presume that it was expended in works and objects of public utility, or left in the public coffers; and therefore affirms that, under this point of view, likewise, His Majesty's Government is bound to indemnify the victims of the spoliations committed during the ascendency of Murat.

Without undertaking to inquire whether a sort of succession or inheritance, in legitimate and illegitimate Governments, can be maintained upon good grounds, the undersigned will be content to remark that, whatever may be the opinion of publicists as to this point, no one has ever pretended to visit the injustice of the contracts or deeds of usurpers upon the people subjected to their yoke, or upon the legitimate sovereigns.

That theory would, indeed, be a disconsolate one which should extend the power of an enemy not only to the consequences of fact, but even to those of right. The victory which restored the legitimate prince would be fatal to both, if it must have the effect of making him responsible for the acts of injustice and violence which the usurper might have perpetrated against foreign nations.

It avails not to say that these are of the description of obligations and engagements which survive the overthrow of the usurped dominion, as common to the nation over which that dominion was exercised. This would be the place to determine whether we could reasonably qualify, as an obligation, an engagement from Government to Government, or nation to nation, a mere right of reclamation, which, according to the obligation of Mr. Pinkney himself, the United States kept in reserve, to be exercised with Murat, had not his power been subverted.

But the undersigned will simply ask his excellency if that very right is not to be regarded as null, seeing that the continual, strong, vehement demands, officially made by the consul general of the United States at Naples upon the minister of Murat, for the restitution of the confiscated vessels and cargoes, or compensation to the American owners, were rejected, or remained without a reply? However this may be, it is always incontestable that it is not against the actual Government of His Majesty that a right, to which he who created it would not hearken, can be tried, as it were, in the nature of an appeal.

It is among the principles of reason and justice, that a sovereign, who never ceased to be in a state of war with the usurper of his dominions, and who, very far from having afforded grounds for presuming that his rights were waived, as is asserted in the note of the 24th August, carried into effect, in concert with his ally, England, a powerful expedition in the islands of Procida and Ischia, nearest to the capital of his usurped kingdom, in the year 1809, precisely that in which the confiscation of the American ships at Naples took place. It is among the principles of reason and justice, that he should not be, on regaining his dominions in process of the war which had compelled him to absent himself from them, held responsible for the excesses of his enemy.

Let, then, the relations of the usurper with the Powers friendly or allied to France have been what they may, the inferences which the American merchants may have drawn from them, in relation to the prosecution of their trade at Naples, should not be made to recoil upon the treasury of a sovereign who not only did not show any the least acquiescence in the usurpation, but did all that was in his power, and all that circumstances would permit, to vindicate his abused rights. There is still less foundation for the arguments brought forward in the note of the 24th August to prove that the Neapolitan nation was, in some sort, a party to the measures by which the Americans suffered, and therefore liable, in solidum, for the consequences.

If the inhabitants of the kingdom of Naples could only have signified their wishes, these would undoubtedly have been for the maintenance of relations of justice and friendship with the Americans, the only nation which, by means of its neutrality, might provide a vent for the commodities accumulated through so many years in the kingdom, under the operation of the noted continental system of ruinous memory.

But everybody knows that the Neapolitan nation, prostrated by a foreign domination, was but the mournful spectator and first victim of the arbitrary acts which were daily committed: so far, then, from being able to indemnify others, it would be exceedingly fortunate if she could find means of compensating herself for the losses and immense injuries which she sustained during the occupation of the kingdom.

These considerations would be more than sufficient to prove that the claims of the American merchants cannot reach either the actual Government of His Majesty or his people.

But, to make the demonstration complete, and to exhibit the question under all its aspects, the undersigned will admit, for a moment, the absurd hypothesis, that the present Government of Naples stands in the place of that of Murat, and has succeeded to all his obligations.

The demand of Mr. Pinkney would not be, on this account, the less unsustainable, since the confiscation and sale of the American vessels and cargoes were acts which proceeded directly from the power and from the will of Bonaparte. There exists, in fact, in the archives of the Treasury, a report of the minister, Agar, who presided over that Department in 1809, addressed to Murat, who was then at Paris.

The minister relates, in this report, that two American ships had arrived at Naples, one from Salem, the other last from Algiers, laden with colonial produce; and that the necessary orders had been given to put the same under sequestration, conformably to the directions antecedently issued from higher authority, with respect to the other vessels arrived at Naples, before the departure of Murat for Paris.

He proceeds then to point out the great benefit which the treasury would derive from opening the market to the colonial produce lying on board those ships, or in the custom-house of Naples, by the duties which would be collected upon the sale of it, and upon the export of the oils which the Americans would take as return cargoes.

The minister remarks, in fine, that the confiscation itself of the American vessels and cargoes was but an inconsiderable resource, compared with the very great advantage which would have resulted to the treasury from an active American trade, could it have been tolerated in the ports of the kingdom.

Murat did not deem himself authorized to decide in any way, and submitted the report to his brother-in-law, Napoleon, who decreed, in margin, that the vessels and cargoes in question should be confiscated, because the embargo laid in the ports of the United States induced him to believe that the produce must be British property, and its introduction into the continent a breach, therefore, of the two famous Berlin and Milan decrees.

On the disclosure of this decision of Bonaparte in Naples, it was ordered, also, that the proceeds of the sales should not be paid over to the treasury of the state, but that a separate and special account should be opened for them, which was done accordingly. In order to understand well this distinction, and to be able to draw from it the consequences applicable to the case, it is useful to note, that during the military occupation of the kingdom, there existed a treasury, so called, destined to receive the public revenues and defray the public charges; and as, among the latter, the support of the luxurious household of Murat was not the least onerous, accordingly the sums allotted to this purpose were paid into the hands of a particular treasurer, who disposed of them as his master directed.

Besides this particular chest, into which, moreover, all the proceeds of the private domain were emptied, Murat established another, by the name of separate account or fund, (conto a parte,) as a receptacle for the sums arising from the sale of the vessels and cargoes confiscated in 1809 and 1812, and also for the profits of the licenses which, in imitation of England and France, he sold to the vessels entering and leaving the ports of the kingdom. The new fund was always considered as appertaining to the extraordinary and private domain of Murat himself. An irrefragable proof of this may be offered. The first article of one of his decrees, of 25th April, 1812, is conceived in the following terms: "The commission established by our decree of November 30, 1811, for the purpose of liquidating the accounts of our royal household, is, in addition, charged with examining the accounts of the vessels sequestered in our ports, regarded by us as the property of our extraordinary and private domain."

Besides, it is enough to read the account rendered of the cashier of the separate fund, to know that the sums paid into it were dissipated in largesses to the favorites of Murat, in marriage portions to some of his relatives, and in other licentious expenses of Murat and of his wife, especially during their visit at Paris. It appears, moreover, that Murat having anticipated on said fund a sum of two hundred thousand livres on account of the treasury, towards the cost of the expedition with which, during several months, he menaced Sicily with an invasion from Calabria, the Minister of the Finances lost no time in reimbursing the fund with the proceeds of the public taxes.

From the foregoing statement, two important and obvious consequences are to be drawn. The first is, that Murat only lent his name in the confiscation of American ships, as he did merely in all the other measures pursued in Naples during the occupation of the kingdom. This was no mystery, nor could foreign nations be ignorant of it. Still less could they be unacquainted with the extent of the power which Bonaparte usurped, in order to give all possible latitude of effect to his decrees of Milan and Berlin, in the countries over which he exerted his fatal influence.

Obstinate in his fantasies, absolute in his will, he studied only to enlarge the sphere of his favorite plan. A mere remonstrance on this head, if Murat had allowed himself to prefer one, would have cost the latter his crown. Holland furnished an incontestable example of this truth.

Murat, then, let it be repeated, was but the passive instrument of the will of Bonaparte in the confiscation of the American ships; and if this could give birth to responsibility, such responsibility should no longer be imputed to the country over which he reigned, and still less to the Government which has there resumed its lawful authority.

The other, and not less important consequence, is, that the treasury, which was the fund of the state, never enjoyed the proceeds of the confiscations, and that, instead of being employed to alleviate the burdens of the people, or applied to the improvement or embellishment of the country, as is supposed in the note of the 24th of August, those proceeds only served to feed the caprices and the oriental pomp of the family of Murat and his adherents.

After this rapid and faithful exposition of facts, the undersigned will not enter upon the inquiry whether the American merchants would have been entitled to call for indemnify, if the power which commanded and executed the confiscation of their property had, unfortunately, continued to flourish.

He will go no further than to remark to Mr. Pinkney, that such a call could not affect the actual Government of His Majesty, nor his people; and his excellency and his Government are too enlightened and too impartial not to be fully convinced of this, now that they can dwell upon circumstances which perhaps were not previously within their knowledge.

The undersigned renews to Mr. Pinkney, on this occasion, the assurance of his most distinguished consideration.

GREAT BRITAIN—EXECUTION OF THE TREATY OF PEACE.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, MARCH 2, 1818.

To the Senate and House of Representatives: FEBRUARY 25, 1818.

The commissioners of the two Governments under the fourth article of the treaty of Ghent having come to a decision upon the question submitted to them, I lay before Congress copies of that decision, together with copies of the declaration signed and reported by the commissioners to this Government.

JAMES MONROE.

Declaration of the Commissioners under the fourth article of the Treaty of Ghent.

SIR: NEW YORK, November 24, 1817.

The undersigned, commissioners appointed by virtue of the fourth article of the treaty of Ghent, have attended to the duties assigned them, and have decided that Moose island, Dudley island, and Frederick island, in the bay of Passamaquoddy, which is part of the bay of Fundy, do each of them belong to the United States of America; and that all the other islands in the bay of Passamaquoddy, and the island of Grand Menan, in the bay of Fundy, do each of them belong to His Britannic Majesty, in conformity with the true intent of the second article of the treaty of peace of 1783.

The commissioners have the honor to enclose, herewith, their decision.

In making this decision, it became necessary that each of the commissioners should yield a part of his individual opinion; several reasons induced them to adopt this measure, one of which was the impression and belief that the navigable waters of the bay of Passamaquoddy, which, by the treaty of Ghent, is said to be part of the bay of Fundy, are common to both parties, for the purpose of all lawful and direct communication with their own territories and foreign ports.

The undersigned have the honor to be, &c.

JOHN HOLMES.

The Hon. J. Q. ADAMS, &c.

Decision of the Commissioners under the fourth article of the Treaty of Ghent.

By Thomas Barclay and John Holmes, Esquires, commissioners appointed by virtue of the fourth article of the treaty of peace and amity between His Britannic Majesty and the United States of America, concluded at Ghent on the 24th day of December, 1814, to decide to which of the two contracting parties to the said treaty the several islands in the bay of Passamaquoddy, which is part of the bay of Fundy, and the island of Grand Menan, in the said bay of Fundy, do respectively belong, in conformity with the true intent of the second article of the treaty of peace of 1783, between his said Britannic Majesty and the aforesaid United States of America: We, the said Thomas Barclay and John Holmes, commissioners as aforesaid, having been duly sworn impartially to examine and decide upon the said claims, according to such evidence as should be laid before us on the part of His Britannic Majesty and the United States, respectively, have decided, and do decide, that Moose island, Dudley island, and Frederick island, in the bay of Passamaquoddy, which is part of the bay of Fundy, do, and each of them does, belong to the United States of America; and we have also decided, and do decide, that all the other islands, and each and every of them, in the said bay of Passamaquoddy, which is part of the bay of Fundy, and the island of Grand Menan, in the said bay of Fundy, do belong to his said Britannic Majesty, in conformity with the true intent of the said second article of said treaty of 1783.

In faith and testimony whereof, we have set our hands and affixed our seals, at the city of New York, in the State of New York, in the United States of America, this 24th day of November, in the year of our Lord 1817.

GOVERNMENT OF THE NETHERLANDS—COMMERCIAL TREATY.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, MARCH 20, 1818.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States: MARCH 19, 1818.

In the course of the last summer a negotiation was commenced with the Government of the Netherlands, with a view to the revisal and modification of the commercial treaty existing between the two countries adapted to their present circumstances.

The report from the Secretary of State, which I now lay before Congress, will show the obstacles which arose in the progress of the conferences between the respective plenipotentiaries, and which resulted in the agreement between them to refer the subject to the consideration of their respective Governments. As the difficulties appear to be of a nature which may, perhaps, for the present, be more easily removed by reciprocal legislative regulations, formed in the spirit of amity and conciliation, than by conventional stipulations, Congress may think it advisable to leave the subsisting treaty in its present state, and to meet the liberal exemption from discriminating tonnage duties, which has been conceded in the Netherlands to the vessels of the United States, by a similar exemption to the vessels of the Netherlands which have arrived, or may hereafter arrive, in our ports, commencing from the time when the exemption was granted to the vessels of the United States. I would further recommend to the consideration of Congress the expediency of extending the benefit of the same regulation, to commence from the passage of the law, to the vessels of Prussia, Hamburgh, and Bremen; and of making it prospectively general in favor of every nation in whose ports the vessels of the United States are admitted on the same footing as their own.

JAMES MONROE.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, March 17, 1818.

The Secretary of State has the honor of submitting to the consideration of the President the correspondence, herewith enclosed, between the envoys extraordinary of the United States at the court of the Netherlands and the plenipotentiaries appointed by that Government, for the purpose of renewing and extending the commercial treaty already existing between the two countries. The failure of this negotiation is to be attributed principally to two obstacles which arose in the progress of the discussions between the respective plenipotentiaries; one proceeding from an essential principle in the commercial regulations of this country, and the other from a principle of like character in the kingdom of the Netherlands.

The law of March 3, 1815, authorizing a partial repeal of the discriminating duties which operate against foreign shipping, and the merchandise imported in them, required, as a condition of that repeal, the abolition of all discriminating or countervailing duties of any foreign nation to whose advantage it should enure, so far as they operate to the disadvantage of the United States; and, on this condition, the acts of the United States imposing discriminating duties were declared to be repealed only so far as respects the produce or manufacture of the nation to which the foreign ship or vessel might belong. The law, therefore, required a total abolition of discriminating or countervailing duties in the foreign nation operating against the United States, and offered only a partial repeal of our discriminating duties which operated against them in return. From an imperfect view of the provisions of this act, which can be fully understood only by collating it with the general system and the particular provisions of the acts imposing discriminating duties, part of which only it proposed to repeal, the Government of the Netherlands and others appear to have understood it as offering a total repeal of all discriminating duties, as well of tonnage as upon merchandise of every description, without distinction of origin. The power of the President was, however, restricted by the terms of the law. The laws of the Netherlands imposed discriminating duties of tonnage, and on merchandise imported in foreign vessels, but without any distinction with regard to the origin of the merchandise. When, therefore, they revoked their discriminating duties so far as respected the United States, they considered themselves, by the act of Congress of March 3, 1815, entitled to a total repeal of the discriminating duties in the United States operating against them—not only the tonnage duties, but those upon merchandise, whether of the produce or manufacture of the Netherlands or of any other country. This was, however, not warranted by the act of March 3, 1815; nor could it be stipulated by treaty, without involving consequences affecting the commercial relations between the United States and other countries. The revocation of the discriminating duties upon merchandise imported in vessels of the Netherlands would be of little avail if limited to articles the produce or manufacture of that country, the principal part of whose exportations consists of the produce or manufacture of others. But, on the other hand, if that distinction in our navigation and revenue laws should be broken down with respect to one nation, it could be with difficulty, if at all, maintained with regard to any other.

The other difficulty which occurred in the negotiation related to the admission of vessels of the United States into the colonies of the Netherlands, if not upon the same footing as into the ports of the Netherlands in Europe, at least upon that of the most favored nation. To this it was objected by the plenipotentiaries of the Netherlands, that certain favors were granted by them to other nations themselves possessing colonies, for the equivalent of similar favors conceded in return, which could not be conceded to a nation possessing no colonies, and therefore not enabled to concede the equivalent. The same objection having been made by the British Government to the admission of vessels of the United States into their colonies, it appears to deserve attention how far the principle itself is justifiable, and how far the United States ought to acquiesce in it. There are various grounds upon which it appears objectionable: 1st. Because all the other maritime states possessing colonies more or less significant, a classification, however general, in terms which applies by way of exclusion to the United States alone, is manifestly a measure savoring of hostility to them, as much as if it was applied to them by name. 2d. Because the United States, not only by the constant and unparalleled rapid increase of their own population, but by the great enlargement of their territory and the admission of new States, producing almost all the articles of European colonies in this hemisphere, afford to all the commercial nations of Europe an equivalent similar in principle and infinitely more valuable than the mere admission to two or three small islands of the West Indies, which is all that some of the European states can grant for access to the colonies of the others. 3d. The United States have a just claim to a free trade with most of the colonies of the West India islands, founded in the occasional indispensable necessities of the latter. If the United States should exercise their unquestionable right of meeting prohibition with prohibition, the very existence of these islands would be in jeopardy whenever they should be visited by those hurricanes which so frequently happen among them. It would be ungenerous, and scarcely reconcileable to the principles of humanity, should the United States avail themselves of those calamitous occurrences to stop, on their part, the intercourse which, at all other times, is interdicted to them. By the laws of nature, no society can be justifiable in adopting measures towards another state which may compel the latter to retaliate, in self-defence, by measures incompatible with humanity; yet, such is the character of the intercourse permitted by several of the European nations between their colonies in the West Indies and the United States. Thus we have seen, within the last half-year, the exclusion of our vessels from the ports of several West India islands, and their readmission, announced almost in the same gazettes. That readmission, however, is limited to the time indispensable for saving the colony from famine and utter desolation. There is something so glaringly unequal and selfish in these alternatives of arbitrary interdiction and of compulsory intercourse, that it is believed the nations of Europe possessing colonies cannot fail of being ultimately made sensible of it, and of consenting to establish an intercourse upon principles more permanent and more favorably marked with reciprocity.

In the mean time, as the Government of the Netherlands have placed the vessels of the United States arriving in their ports, in regard to tonnage duties, on the same footing with their own, it is believed to be consistent with sound policy to extend the same principle to the vessels of the Netherlands arriving in the ports of the United States. The same liberality may be extended to the vessels of Prussia, Hamburgh, and Bremen, who, by virtue of the like regulations in their respective ports, have claimed the benefit of the proffer made in the law of March 3, 1815. As an act of Congress is necessary for the purpose, perhaps the most expedient course would be to make it general; and, limiting its operation to the tonnage duties or charges upon vessels, to declare that no other or higher duties of that description than are paid by vessels of the United States shall be paid in the ports of the United States by the vessels of any European nation in whose ports no higher or other duties of the same kind are paid by vessels of the United States than by the vessels of such European nation itself. The measure in respect to the Netherlands is of immediate urgency; the regulation in favor of the vessels of the United States there having already been more than a year in force, in the confidence that the corresponding measure on the part of the United States would have been adopted, of course, by virtue of the act of March 3, 1815.

INDEPENDENCE OF THE SPANISH PROVINCES.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, MARCH 25, 1818.

To the House of Representatives of the United States: WASHINGTON, March 25, 1818.

In conformity with the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 5th of December last, I now transmit a report of the Secretary of State, with a copy of the documents which it is thought proper to communicate, relating to the independence and political condition of the provinces of Spanish America.

JAMES MONROE.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, March 25, 1818.

The Secretary of State, to whom has been referred the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 5th December, has the honor of submitting the documents herewith transmitted, as containing the information possessed at this Department requested by that resolution.

In the communications received from Don Manuel H. de Aguirre, there are references to certain conferences between him and the Secretary of State, which appear to require some explanation.

The character in which Mr. Aguirre presented himself was that of a public agent from the Government of La Plata, and of private agent from that of Chili. His commissions from both simply qualified him as agent. But his letter from the Supreme Director (Pueyrredon) to the President of the United States requested that he might be received with the consideration due to his diplomatic character. He had no commission as a public minister of any rank, nor any full power to negotiate as such. Neither the letter of which he was the bearer, nor he himself, at his first interviews with the Secretary of State, suggested that he was authorized to ask the acknowledgment of his Government as independent; a circumstance which derived additional weight from the fact that his predecessor, Don Martin Thompson, had been dismissed by the Director Pueyrredon, for having transcended his powers, of which the letter brought by Mr. Aguirre gave notice to the President.

It was some time after the commencement of the session of Congress that he made this demand, as will be seen by the dates of his written communications to the Department. In the conferences held with him on that subject, among other questions which it naturally suggested were those of the manner in which the acknowledgment of his Government, should it be deemed advisable, might be made; and what were the territories which he considered as forming the state or nation to be recognised. It was observed, that the manner in which the United States had been acknowledged as an independent Power by France was by a treaty concluded with them, as an existing independent Power; and in which each one of the States then composing the Union was distinctly named; that something of the same kind seemed to be necessary in the first acknowledgment of a new Government, that some definite idea might be formed, not of the precise boundaries, but of the general extent of the country thus recognised. He said the Government of which he desired the acknowledgment was the country which had, before the revolution, been the viceroyalty of La Plata. It was then asked whether that did not include Montevideo, and the territory occupied by the Portuguese; the Banda Oriental, understood to be under the government of General Artigas; and several provinces still in the undisputed possession of the Spanish Government? He said it did; but observed that Artigas, though in hostility with the Government of Buenos Ayres, supported, however, the cause of independence against Spain; and that the Portuguese could not ultimately maintain their possession of Montevideo. It was after this that Mr. Aguirre wrote the letter offering to enter into a negotiation for concluding a treaty, though admitting that he had no authority to that effect from his Government. It may be proper to observe, that the mode of recognition by concluding a treaty had not been suggested as the only one practicable or usual, but merely as that which had been adopted by France with the United States, and as offering the most convenient means of designating the extent of the territory acknowledged as a new dominion.

The remark to Mr. Aguirre, that, if Buenos Ayres should be acknowledged as independent, others of the contending provinces would, perhaps, demand the same, had particular reference to the Banda Oriental. The inquiry was, whether General Artigas might not advance a claim of independence for those provinces, conflicting with that of Buenos Ayres, for the whole viceroyalty of La Plata. The Portuguese possession of Montevideo was noticed in reference to a similar question.

It should be added, that these observations were connected with others, stating the reasons upon which the present acknowledgment of the Government of La Plata, in any mode, was deemed by the President inexpedient, in regard as well to their interests as to those of the United States.

MOST EXCELLENT SIR: BUENOS AYRES, January 16, 1816.

The circumstances are well known which have heretofore prevented these provinces from establishing with the United States of America the relations of amity and strict correspondence which reciprocal interest and a common glory ought to have inspired. At length, the obstacles which were opposed to our desires have been overcome, and we have the fortune to be able to send near your excellency a deputy, to implore from your excellency the protection and assistance we require for the defence of a just cause and sacred in its principles, and which is, moreover, ennobled by the heroic example of the United States, over whom your excellency has the glory to preside.

A series of extraordinary events and unexpected changes, which have taken place in our ancient mother country, have constrained us not to make a formal declaration of national independence; nevertheless, our conduct and public papers have sufficiently expressed our resolution. When this letter reaches your excellency, the general Congress of our representatives will have met; and I can assure you, without fear of being mistaken, that one of its first acts will be a solemn declaration of the independence of these provinces of the Spanish monarchy, and all other sovereigns or powers.

In the mean time, our deputy near your excellency will not be invested with a public character, nor will he be disposed to exceed the object of his mission, without an understanding with your excellency and your ministers. That these views may be exactly fulfilled, I have selected a gentleman who, from his personal qualities, will not excite a suspicion that he is sent by the Government invested with so serious and important a commission. He is Colonel Martin Thompson, who, independently of this credential, has the title which we are accustomed to give to our deputies. I hope that your excellency will be pleased to give him full credit, and secure for him all the consideration which, in a like case, we would give and secure to the ministers whom your excellency may think proper to send to these provinces.

The said deputy has it specially in charge to offer to your excellency, in my name, and in that of the provinces under my direction, the profound respect and particular estimation with which we view the very illustrious chief of so powerful a republic. May your excellency deign to receive these expressions, and to give us an occasion to accredit them.

God preserve your life many years.

Declaration of Independence of the Provinces of La Plata, communicated by Mr. Aguirre to the Department of State, 24th December, 1817.

We, the representatives of the United Provinces of Rio de la Plata, in general Congress assembled, invoking the Supreme Being who presides over the universe, and calling on heaven, earth, and mankind to witness the justice of our cause, in the name and in virtue of the authority of the people whom we represent—

Solemnly declare, that it is the unanimous will of the people of these provinces to break asunder all the bonds which unite them with the Kings of Spain; to reinstate themselves in the enjoyment of the rights of which they have been deprived; and to raise themselves to the high rank of a free and independent nation, capable of giving themselves such a government as justice and imperious circumstances may require. Authorized by the United Provinces in general, and by each one of them in particular, to declare and lay them under the obligation to support this independence, we hereby pledge their lives, fortunes, and sacred honor.

Mindful of the respect due to those nations which take an interest in our fate, and conscious of the necessity of declaring the weighty reasons which have impelled us to this act, we resolve that a manifest, setting them forth, be immediately made public.

Given and signed in the hall of our sittings, sealed with the seal of the Congress, and countersigned by our Secretaries, in the city of Tucuman, this ninth day of July, 1816.

MOST EXCELLENT SIR: BUENOS AYRES, January 1, 1817.

Being placed at the head of these provinces by the suffrage of the Congress of its representatives, and having had the honor, on a former occasion, of offering to your excellency the tribute of my respects, and at the same time of transmitting the act of the declaration of our independence of the ancient Government of the King of Spain and his successors, I profit of the present occasion to notify your excellency that I have ordered Colonel Don Martin Thompson, the agent of this Government near the Government of your excellency, to cease to exercise the functions appertaining to his character as such. When first sent to the United States, he went in the character of agent; and of this your excellency was apprized by despatches of the 16th of January of the last year, in which was assigned, as the reason for not having appointed to so important a mission a person of greater consideration and weight, the necessity of obviating all suspicion that might otherwise have arisen concerning its object. It is with much concern that I have learned, by the communications themselves of our said agent, that he has arbitrarily departed from the line of the duties marked out for him, and that, without having duly estimated the honor of conferring with you, he has granted licenses which are in direct contradiction with the said principles. My predecessor rested all his hopes of a favorable issue to the commission given to Mr. Thompson on the generosity and magnanimity of your excellency; and I, who entertain the same sentiments, venture to hope that, suspending for the present the appointment of an agent, we shall receive proofs of your friendly dispositions towards these people; but if your excellency should deem it necessary that a formal agent should be appointed, I shall, upon the first intimation, take a particular pleasure in making choice of a person who may be worthy of the consideration of the illustrious chief to whom he will be sent.

I have the honor to avail myself of this occasion to renew to your excellency the sentiments of respect and high esteem, which it is the boast of the people over whom I preside to entertain for you, and to offer you the like homage in my own name.

May God preserve you many years.

Don J. Martin de Pueyrredon, Supreme Director of the Government of Buenos Ayres, to the President of the United States.

MOST EXCELLENT SIR: PALACE OF THE GOVERNMENT, BUENOS AYRES, March 5, 1817.

The liberal and benevolent principles which distinguish your Government induce me to believe that the recent triumphs of liberty in these United Provinces of South America will be heard with pleasure by your excellency and the happy citizens of your republic. This confidence, and the conformity of the principles which actuate the inhabitants of this hemisphere with those that stimulated the heroic efforts of the United States of the north in the achievement of their independence, encourage me to make known to your excellency the restoration of the opulent kingdom of Chili, by the patriot forces of my Government.

The printed documents which I have the honor to enclose contain accounts of the most memorable events of the last campaign. It was opened by the passage of the formidable mountains of the Andes; and, through the interposition of Providence, our victorious arms have given liberty to a million and a half of the inhabitants of the new world.

I pray your excellency to accept the assurance of my respectful consideration, and my desire to strengthen the bonds of union and mutual interest between the two nations.

God preserve you many years.

Commission of Mr. Aguirre from Chili.

The Supreme Director of the State of Chili, &c.

It being important to the maintenance and advancement of the provinces under my command to have therein all those resources of armament which, being useful to the army as well as to the navy, may protect them from invasion, and wrest them from the hands of the enemies of our liberty, I have, therefore, with a view to accomplish the said object, given and granted full power and authority to Don Manuel de Aguirre, to enter into and set on foot all such negotiations as may be relative to the purchase of vessels of war, including a frigate, completely armed and equipped; also, for the purchase of all descriptions of arms, warlike stores, and supplies, useful to the army; it being understood that the value of the different kinds which he is commissioned to purchase or stipulate for, and the transport thereof to Chili, are to be fully paid for upon due verification of the same, and that, for the fulfilment of this promise, all the interests of the public fund, and of the State of Chili in general, are made responsible.

In testimony whereof, I have ordered the present to be executed. Signed by me, sealed with the arms of this Government, and countersigned by my Minister of State, in the city of Santiago de Chili, this 8th day of March, 1817.

Commission to Don Manuel H. de Aguirre, granted by the Supreme Director of the United Provinces of South America.

The Supreme Director of the United Provinces of South America.

Inasmuch as it is necessary to appoint a person who, in the character of agent of this Government near that of the United States of North America, may promote whatever conduces to the progress of the cause in which these provinces are engaged, to their honor, and the consolidation of the great work of our liberty: therefore, the necessary qualities of probity, capacity, and patriotism, uniting in the Commissary General of War, citizen Don Manuel Hermenegildo de Aguirre, I have appointed him agent of this Government near that of the United States of North America, granting to him the privileges, pre-eminences, and prerogatives which belong to the said title.

In pursuance whereof, I have given the present, signed by me, countersigned by my Secretary of State for the Department of the Government and Foreign Affairs, and sealed with the seal of the national arms. Given at Buenos Ayres, the 28th day of March, 1817.

MOST EXCELLENT SIR: SANTIAGO, IN CHILI, April 1, 1817.

The beautiful kingdom of Chili having been re-established on the 12th of February last by the army of the United Provinces of Rio de la Plata, under the command of the brave General Don José de St. Martin, and the supreme direction of the state being conferred on me by the choice of the people, it becomes my duty to announce to the world the new asylum which these countries offer to the industry and friendship of the citizens of all nations of the globe.

The inhabitants of Chili, having thus reassumed their natural rights, will not hereafter submit to be despoiled of their just prerogatives, nor tolerate the sordid and pernicious policy of the Spanish cabinet. In its numerous population, and the riches of its soil, Chili presents the basis of a solid and durable power, to which the independence of this precious portion of the new world will give the fullest security. The knowledge and resources of the neighboring nation of Peru, which has resolved to support our emancipation, encourage the hope of the future prosperity of these regions, and of the establishment, on liberal grounds, of a commercial and political intercourse with all nations. If the cause of humanity interests the feelings of your excellency, and the identity of the principles of our present contest with those which formerly prompted the United States to assert their independence disposes your Government and people favorably towards our cause, your excellency will always find me most earnestly desirous of promoting the commercial and friendly relations of the two countries, and of removing every obstacle to the establishment of the most perfect harmony and good understanding.

God preserve you many years.

Translation of a letter from the Supreme Director Pueyrredon to the President of the United States, dated

APRIL 28, 1817.

When the interests of sound policy are in accord with the principles of justice, nothing is more easy or more pleasing than the maintenance of harmony and good understanding between Powers which are connected by close relations. This seems to be exactly the case in which the United States and these provinces stand with respect to each other; a flattering situation, which gives the signal of our success, and forms our best apology.

It is on this occasion that citizen Don Manuel Hermenegildo de Aguirre, Commissary General of War, is deputed towards you in the character of the agent of this Government. If his recommendable qualities are the best pledge of the faithful discharge of his commission and of its favorable issue, the upright and generous sentiments of your excellency are not less auspicious to it. The concurrence of these circumstances induces me to hope the most favorable results.

I trust, therefore, that your excellency will be pleased to grant to the said citizen Aguirre all the protection and consideration required by his diplomatic rank and the actual state of our relations. This will be a new tie, by which the United States of the north will more effectually secure the gratitude and affection of the free provinces of the south.

Don José San Martin, General of the army of the Andes, to the President of the United States.

MOST EXCELLENT SIR:

Charged by the Supreme Director of the provinces of South America with the command of the army of the Andes, Heaven crowned my forces with a victory on the 12th of February over the oppressors of the beautiful kingdom of Chili. The sacred rights of nature being restored to the inhabitants of this country by the influence of the national arms and the efficacious impulse of my Government, fortune has opened a favorable field to new enterprises, which secure the power of liberty and the ruin of the enemies of America. Towards securing and consolidating this object, the Supreme Director of the Government of Chili has considered, as a principal instrument, the armament in these States of a squadron destined to the Pacific ocean, which, united to the forces that are preparing in the river La Plata, may co-operate in sustaining the ulterior military operations of the army under my command in South America; and, convinced of the advantages which our actual political situation promises, I have crossed the Andes in order to concert in that capital, among other things, the guaranty of my Government, and, in compliance with the stipulations between the Supreme Director of Chili and its intimate ally, to carry into effect the plan which has been confided to Don Manuel Aguirre. Your excellency, who enjoys the honor of presiding over a free people, who contended and shed their blood in a similar cause to that in which the inhabitants of South America are now engaged, will, I hope, deign to extend to the above-named person such protection as is compatible with the actual relations of your Government; and I have the high satisfaction of assuring your excellency that the arms of the country under my orders will not fail to give consistency and respect to the promises of both Governments.

I am happy in having this agreeable occasion to pay a tribute to your excellency of the homage and profound respect with which I have the honor to be

Your excellency's most humble servant,

JOSÉ DE SAN MARTIN.

The President of the United States of Venezuela to his excellency the President of the Republic of the North, communicating the re-establishment of the Federative Government of the provinces of Costa-Firme, (the Main.)

FEDERAL PALACE, PAMPATAR, PORT OF NEW SPARTA, May 21, 1817.—7th.

MOST EXCELLENT SIR:

The fortune of arms, which decides the fate of empires, and a disastrous combination of circumstances well known to your Government, have interrupted the progress of this republic, established by a proclamation of the 5th June, 1811, and occasioned the capitulation of the 26th July, 1812, entered into between the commander-in-chief of the patriot army, Francisco Miranda, and Don Domingo Monteverde, commander of the Spanish forces, which compact, shamefully violated in the end, has drawn on Venezuela the signal disasters which this country has yet to deplore, and of which you have received information through citizens Scott and Lowry, who were eye-witnesses of those events. This has been followed alternately by prosperous and adverse fortune, which this continent has experienced since the year 1812. To this date nothing more propitious has presented itself than the reinstatement of the Federative Government, which was brought about on the 8th of the present month in the city of San Felipe de Cariaco, within the jurisdiction of the State of Cumana, by the legal proceedings, which your excellency may perceive by reference to the official documents which, in the name of the executive department, I have the honor of forwarding to you. And I have to assure your excellency that, having wrested Venezuela from the hands of the enemies of her liberty and independence in almost every part of the seven provinces of the confederation, she desires nothing more earnestly than to extend her relations with her brethren of North America, identified as they are by nature, and by political and republican principles, with the great family of the south.

Venezuela, at the first period of its emancipation, deputed to your republic two of its citizens, John Vincente Bolivar and Talisfero Orea, both furnished with credentials and competent powers to transact all business, and who had it especially in charge to assure your excellency of the ardent wishes of the people of Venezuela to make such arrangements as would conduce to the happiness of both nations. The state of affairs in Europe at that period retarded the success which Caraccas promised herself by the acknowledgment of her independence by the republic of the north; but a change having taken place, and a sentiment favorable to our cause extended throughout the continent of Colombia, the Government of this people, whom I represent, does not doubt that your excellency, taking into consideration the mutual interests which we propose, will give your concurrence, in as far as depends on yourself, towards the establishment of diplomatic arrangements and stipulations, which citizen Joseph Cortés Madariaga has it in charge to open; and, being assured of the noble qualities attached to your excellency, I flatter myself that our negotiations will be speedily concluded.

The executive department has the honor to tender to your excellency the homage of this republic, and the high consideration and respect with which, in its name, I remain

Your excellency's most obedient servant,

FRSO. XAVIER DE MAYS, President pro tempore.

[TRANSLATION.]

CITY OF SAN FELIPE DE CARIACO, May 8, 1817.

His excellency General Santiago Marino, second in command of the republic, having by note called upon the following persons to assemble in a meeting, namely, his excellency Admiral Luis Brion, commander of the naval forces, the Intendant General Antonio Zea, Joseph Cortés Madariaga, canon of the holy church of Caraccas, Jacobo Xavier Mays, who acted as president of the executive department at the time of the recess of the Congress of Venezuela, Francisco Xavier de Alcala, Diego Valenilla, Diego Antonio Alcala, Manuel Ysaba, Francisco de Paula Naval, Diego Bautista Urbanesa, and Manuel Maneyro, he thus addressed them:

Citizens: Never have I experienced greater satisfaction than on the present occasion, in seeing you truly reunited to deliberate on the most proper measures to be adopted for the safety of our country, under such extraordinary political events which have induced our illustrious compatriot, José Cortés Madariaga, to attend as supreme chief, in whose name, and at whose request, I have the honor of addressing you as second in command.

The above honorable citizen, José Cortés Madariaga, here present, will explain to you his sentiments and reasons; and you will be able to judge for yourselves whether they be not of such weight as to induce you to institute immediately a provisional Government, without calling together deputies, whose election cannot be effected soon enough, in consequence of the state of commotion and war in which our country is placed.

No one can be ignorant that, in all its reverses, our republic has not had a firmer supporter or a warmer friend than our incomparable patriot and citizen General Simon Bolivar, all whose designs have been directed to the re-establishment of the representative Government, which the people had fixed upon as their fundamental constitution, but vested with more energy, force, and unity. This has been his most ardent desire, and the object for which he has twice convoked the congress; the assembling of which, as I have before observed, has been retarded by political machinations and military commotions. But, in consequence of the extraordinary circumstance above alluded to, I have thought proper to do, in the name and at the instance of the supreme chief, what would be done by him if present; and that is, to propose a provisional Government, conformable to the constitution decreed by the Congress of Venezuela. Whilst the deputies to the new congress are reassembling, he will proceed to make such reforms and modifications as may be deemed necessary in our political institutions. It is on this subject I wish to obtain your sentiments and advice, after hearing citizen Cortés.

Citizen Cortés followed, and observed:

That, animated by sentiments of friendship and attachment towards the South Venezuelans, and their noble compatriots, particularly since the year 1812, he should pass over the series of reverses, in the course of which a multitude of persons, of all ages, sexes, and professions, who, by their numbers, virtues, valor, and wisdom, aggrandized the states of the confederacy, had been swept away by the calamities of an exterminating warfare, declared and carried on against us by our enemies; and having heard, through the most respectable channel of the public expression, that the time had arrived when South America should arise, in all its dignity, and declare itself in the face of the world, he had taken a considerable journey, and repaired to this continent from the Windward islands, for the express purpose of imparting to his fellow-citizens the favorable tidings which led him to hope that Venezuela will be included in the common prosperity of South America within the present year; and, by means of its exterior relations, contribute to the inspiring of confidence, and establishing its emancipation on a solid and permanent basis, worthy of this precious portion of the globe. He declared, moreover, that he abstained, through delicacy, from making, on this occasion, certain other reflections of great importance, which he had communicated in his official correspondence with the supreme chief of the republic to General Marino, second in command, and to the admiral of the squadron; and being convinced of their weight and importance, the two latter gentlemen had given proofs of the respect with which they had received his communications. Referring himself to the president as to their contents, he concluded by recommending anew the imperious necessity of the measure, and called for the prompt establishment of the Government.

The admiral next addressed the assembly in the following manner:

Fellow-citizens and brothers:

Nothing has filled with greater pleasure an adopted son of Venezuela than the presence of this respectable assembly, called together by the second in command, who is vested with the powers of the first, on a subject so important to the salvation of our country; his name from this day will be immortalized, having complied with the wishes of the sovereign people of Venezuela, and fulfilled those of our sovereign chief. I felicitate you, brothers, on so wise a step, and I have the satisfaction of announcing to you, for your own, that the sacrifices which I have made to this day in the service of my country, are nothing in comparison to what I pledge myself to consecrate to it henceforward; convinced as I am that a Government, stable and energetic, by supporting our own force, will likewise induce our foreign friends to extend to us the hand of friendship, and contribute to the maintenance of our liberty and independence. They are already well disposed. They are acquainted with the integrity of my principles. They know that I have not shrunk from any fatigues or exertions in the cause of Venezuela; and, with the aid of the squadron under my command, they only wait to co-operate with your virtue, union, and wisdom, in consolidating the republic and increasing its respectability.

All the speakers were of a unanimous opinion on the subject proposed, and demonstrated, with great energy, the necessity of immediately establishing the provisional Government proposed by his excellency; applauding, at the same time, his patriotic determination, and adding, that he would do immortal honor to the republic if he would immediately consent to be installed, and that they should re-establish, as well as circumstances would admit of, the Government of the constitution. They urged, by many important arguments, the political considerations which had rendered this measure indispensable and urgent; and showed, by the most solid reasoning and conclusive references, that the measure was conformable to the unanimous voice of the people, to the upright and well-known wishes of the supreme chief, and to the interests of mankind.

The President then rose, and observed:

Approving as I do of your resolution, and believing it to be conformable to the patriotic views of the supreme chief, and to the sentiments which he has so often expressed in all his proclamations, I declare, in the presence of the Supreme Being and of the people of Venezuela, whom you represent, that the Supreme Congress of the republic is, from this moment, installed; and I resign into your hands the supreme authority, which, by the act passed at Margarita, was conferred, in the first instance, on General Simon Bolivar, and by him on me, acting in his and my own name, in virtue of the republican principles which we both profess, and which equally animate all our friends and companions in arms, who have with so much valor and glory defended the holy cause of liberty and independence. I retire, that you may freely deliberate on what may be most conducive to the safety of the state, requesting you only to hold in mind that my highest ambition is to shed my blood in combating for the independence of my country, and that I do not aspire to or desire any higher honor from the republic than to contribute, in favor of my friends and fellow-citizens, to the establishment of the blessings of liberty.

His excellency, being in the act of withdrawing from the assembly, accompanied by the admiral, intendant, and the canon Cortés, called upon the officer of the guard, and ordered him to place himself at the disposal of the Congress, the senior member of which proceeded to occupy the seat of the President, and, all the members standing, the oath prescribed by the federal constitution, according to the form therein laid down, was administered to them by the citizen and secretary Diego Bautista Urbanesa, qualified for that purpose. They then entered into a discussion on the various points relating to the object for which the assembly was called, and, after deliberating and agreeing unanimously on all of them,

The citizen President read the following act:

CITY OF SAN FELIPE DE CARIACO,

On the 8th day of the month of May, 1817.

We, the representatives of the United States of Venezuela, Francisco Xavier Mays, deputy to the Federal Congress for the State of Cumana, a member of the executive department, and President of the same (in rotation) at the time of its recess at Valencia, on the 9th of May, 1812, Francisco Xavier de Alcala, Manuel Ysaba, Diego Valenilla, Francisco de Paula Naval, Diego Antonio Alcala, Diego Bautista Urbanesa, and Manuel Maneyro,

On mature deliberation, and with a free will, formally decree: That, from this time, we resume the constitutional character and representation, in the full and absolute possession of which we have been reinstated by the distinguished General Santiago Marino, in the name of the supreme chief of the republic, the meritorious citizen Simon Bolivar, and in his own person, as second chief of the state, and, consequently, at this moment holding in his hands the reins of government; and we make known to all the people of the confederacy, and call upon the Supreme Being to witness the purity of our intentions, that, from this date, the Federal Government of the republic is reinstated in its three departments, legislative, executive, and judicial, for the requisite despatch of all business to them respectively appertaining; and we therefore appoint, for the administration of the Executive Government, citizen General Ferdinando del Toro, citizen Francisco Xavier Mays, who were heretofore members of the said department; also, citizens General Simon Bolivar, Francisco Zea, José Cortés Madariaga, and Diego Valenilla; it being understood that the three latter shall exercise the power only ad interim, until the honorable citizens Toro and Bolivar, now absent, shall repair to such city as may be designated for the residence of the Government. To the judicial department we appoint citizens Juan Martinez, José Espana, Gaspar Marcano, and Ramon Cadiz; the latter for the judicial administration. And as, in consequence of the weighty and momentous considerations which have determined our most excellent fellow-citizens, now acting as chiefs ad interim of the republic, to divest themselves of the attributes of administration, and restore them, through the medium of the Government, reinstated by the indefatigable zeal of both for the salvation of the country, which has thus recovered its political rank, it is necessary that a new oath should be administered to the functionaries and authorities, both civil and military, of the departments that have regained their liberty, and successively of those which shall regain it; and to begin forthwith with those of this city, I name and appoint to-morrow morning at nine o'clock for them to take the said oath before us; and that proper orders to all public functionaries, absent in foreign countries, be given to present themselves, within the space of thirty days, in the city of Annunciation, the capital of the State of Margarita, which, under existing circumstances, being most conveniently situated, and of the most easy and free access, we name, for the present, the residence of the Federal Government, with the faculty of removing the same to any other capital on the continent which may appear most convenient. And if it shall be made to appear that the said public functionaries shall, without just and lawful motives, fail to comply with this summons, they shall, by that act itself, be understood as having forfeited their rights of citizenship, and, consequently, every civil and military right in the republic.

We finally implore the mercy of the Most High, in the humble hope that he will vouchsafe to protect us; and we solemnly declare, in his presence, and that of all the people of the earth, that the sole object of our unremitted endeavors is to preserve in the enjoyment of peace and liberty the virtuous remains of the great Venezuelan family, saved, by the special interposition of his adorable goodness, from the savage fury and destruction of despotism; protesting before him, that our determination is sooner to bury ourselves under the ruins of the republic, than to return to the slavery and chains we have endured for three centuries, which, after the bright example of our brethren of Colombia, we have broken forever. And be it known to all, that we, the representatives who have hereunto subscribed, are firmly resolved, and do solemnly promise and engage, by all the most sacred obligations which bind in one, both politically and morally, to seal with our blood this our patriotic resolution.

That this act, together with the requisite exposition of the motives which have produced it, be communicated to General Simon Bolivar; and that he be invited, so soon as his military duties will permit, to come and take possession of a station in which he will not fail to render the republic immortal services, and worthy of his name. That certified copies of this act be transmitted to all the chief officers of the departments, both civil and military; and that the commander-in-chief of the army, and the admiral of the squadron, be notified of the result of the proceedings of the federal assembly, that they may concur with the executive power in taking the oath, and communicating its orders, to the end that the said oath be taken both by the army and navy. That it be publicly proclaimed in this city, and all the towns of the federation, and that, by public festivals and rejoicings, the general joy be manifested on the restoration of the national sovereignty under a formal constitution, which, being tempered and modified agreeably to the lights of the age and the lessons of experience, will be the safeguard of our independence and liberty.

Whereupon the sitting closed, and they signed, namely: Francisco Xavier de Mays, President; Manuel Ysaba, Diego de Valenilla, Francisco Xavier Alcala, Diego Antonio Alcala, Francisco de Paula Naval, Manuel Maneyro, Diego Bautista Urbanesa, secretary, with the power of taking the votes.

In the city of San Felipe de Cariaco, this 9th day of May, 1817, the Federal Congress having thus re-assembled, there appeared before it the citizens, the commander-in-chief of the armies of the republic, and commander of the armed force, Santiago Marino, and Admiral Luis Brion, who, having taken the oath before the president and me, the aforesaid secretary, agreeably to the form prescribed by the federal constitution of Venezuela, recognised and acknowledged the sovereign authority vested in this body, and other authorities derived from it, promising and engaging to obey and support the federative compact expressed and set forth in the said code. In like manner, the citizen Francisco Xavier Mays withdrawing from the presidential chair, and the citizen Francisco Xavier Alcala occupying it in his place, the oath was taken in the same form by the three members who are to enter into the discharge of the executive power, namely, citizen Francisco Xavier Mays, Francisco Antonio Zea, and José Cortés Madariaga, who were thereupon invested with the functions attached to their high office (the two latter in the quality of provisional members) until the appearance of the Generals Bolivar and Toro. And the assembly having verified this act, and taken into consideration the existing circumstances, declared itself in a state of adjournment, to which the following members subscribed their signatures: Francisco Xavier de Mays, Francisco Antonio Zea, José Cortés Madariaga, Santiago Marino, Luis Brion, Francisco Xavier Alcala, Diego Valenilla, Manuel Ysaba, Diego Antonio Alcala, Francisco de Paula Naval, Manuel Maneyro, Diego Bautista Urbanesa, (vocal secretario) secretary authorized to take the votes.

MOST EXCELLENT SIR: HEAD-QUARTERS AT PURIFICATION, September 1, 1817.

I had the honor to communicate, in the first instance, with Mr. Thomas Lloyd Halsey, consul of the United States in these provinces, and I have to congratulate myself on so fortunate an incident. I have tendered to him my respects and all my services; and I will avail myself of this favorable occasion of presenting to your excellency my most cordial respect.

The various events of the revolution have hitherto deprived me of the opportunity of according this duty with my wishes. I pray your excellency to be pleased to accept them, now that I have the honor to offer them to you with the same sincerity that I strive to promote the public weal and the glory of the republic. To their support are all my efforts directed, aided by the sacrifices of thousands of my fellow-citizens. Heaven grant our wishes!

In that event I shall renew to your excellency, still more warmly, the assurance of my cordial regard, and of the high consideration with which

I have the honor to be, most excellent sir, your excellency's most obedient, respectful, and constant servant,

JOSE ARTIGAS.

No. 13.

Mr. Aguirre to the President of the United States of North America.

MOST EXCELLENT SIR: WASHINGTON, October 29, 1817.

Three centuries of colonial oppression by a corrupt, superstitious, and ignorant nation, whose obstinate and iniquitous policy ever has been to vilify the inhabitants of South America, as being destined to vegetate in obscurity and debasement; (such are the expressions of the viceroy Albancos;) the violent system of keeping them in ignorance of all information incompatible with its principles of colonial dependence; the perverse policy of denying to the children of the mother country, and their lawful descendants on the American continent, the rights of citizens in the exercise of a practical equality; the exclusive monopoly of commerce despotically exercised, regulated by the laws solely in favor of the mother country, and maintained by force at the price of the blood of innocent victims, natives of the country; the black ingratitude with which it has conducted itself towards the capital of Buenos Ayres, after having so gallantly and energetically defended the Spanish dominion against the English army under General Beresford in 1806, and the army of 12,000 men of the same nation, commanded by General Whitelock in 1807; finally, the infamous engagement to force them against their consent, to submit to the yoke which the Emperor Napoleon (an instrument, as it were, of divine justice for the chastisement of thrones) imposed upon Spain, to avenge the bloody usurpations of the empires of Mexico and Peru, prepared these people, on the 25th of May, 1810, for their separation from the Spanish nation, already conquered by the French, not to admit the additional circumstance that the inhabitants of these provinces preserved them for the captive King Don Ferdinand VII. and his lawful successors.

On the restoration of the King of Spain to his throne, a sufficient time was afforded to give him the opportunity of correcting his counsels, stating the grievances and injuries he complained of, and finally of proposing an honorable termination of these differences. Although the deputy had not yet arrived at the court of Madrid, the King had already despatched his inexorable and bloody decrees; and the expedition under General Morillo crossed the seas to wage a war of devastation on these countries. The natural right of self-defence imposed the necessity of taking measures to repel force by force. Hostile armies were the worst means which could be employed to bring about an accommodation.

When the deputy of the court of Madrid informed this Government that the King of Spain insisted on leaving no other alternative than the most abject submission, and that he claimed these provinces as the property of his crown, (doubtless to make them victims to Spanish vengeance,) then it was that the sovereign Congress of these provinces having assembled did, in imitation of the example of their brethren and natural friends of North America, unanimously proclaim, in the city of Tucuman, on the 9th day of July, 1816, the solemn act of their civil independence of the Spanish nation, of the King of Spain, his heirs and successors, and did swear, together with the people represented by them, to support their political emancipation at the risk of their lives, fortunes, and honor.

God preserve your excellency many years.

Don Manuel H. de Aguirre to the Secretary of State.

MOST EXCELLENT SIR: CITY OF WASHINGTON, December 16, 1817.

Having had the honor to inform you, in October last, that the United Provinces in South America had declared themselves free and independent states, and to lay before you the reasons which supported that declaration, together with the object and credentials of my mission to the Government of the United States, the respect I owe to the instructions of my constituents, and the due discharge of the trust with which they have honored me, now induce me to demand of this Government the acknowledgment of those provinces as such free and independent states.

By my previous communications, you will have perceived that this declaration was not premature, and that the provinces of Rio de la Plata abstained from making it whilst it could have been attributed to the effect of the difficulties of the mother country. They held so lofty a conception to be among the obligations which they were about to contract on placing themselves in the rank of nations; and, before they cut short the interminable catalogue of vexations and patient sufferings of which Spanish America offers so striking an example, they preferred exhausting all the means of conciliation which prudence could suggest, and proving whether their own conviction of their rights, and of the injuries they had suffered, would rise superior to their ancient habit of submission and obedience, and whether they were able to surmount the obstacles and embarrassments inseparable from their new situation. It was after repeated proofs of this kind, and after uniform results, that the Congress of those provinces declared them sovereign states, on the 9th of July, 1816.

Notwithstanding all these proofs and precautions, the respect due to foreign nations made my Government anxious farther to obtain an attitude which might inspire greater confidence before it asked of them to acknowledge her as worthy of the high rank to which she had raised herself. During the space of six years previous to their declaration of independence, the forces of these provinces had obtained signal successes on the eastern border, having captured the whole of the royal squadron which attacked them; reduced one of the strongest places in our hemisphere, after a memorable siege, and made prisoners of war the strong garrison which defended it; and if victory was not always the inseparable companion of our arms in Peru, it was often so, and enabled us to drive back the satellites of tyranny to a greater distance from our territories.

Almost eighteen months have passed since this declaration; eighteen months, during which the King's forces have had no other object in view than to rivet anew the chains which Spanish America had burst asunder and shaken off! If such an undertaking had been within the power of Spain, she never could have had a more favorable opportunity than at present, when she has had at her disposal, disengaged from any other calls of service, an army numerous and warlike, and the aids of all who interest themselves in perpetuating the monopoly and subjection of our country. It is true that Spain proceeded to fit out an expedition the most brilliant that was ever employed in the subjugation of our continent; but this expedition, although repeatedly reinforced, has scarcely been able to maintain its ground with honor in a single province; consumed as it has been by the dreadful phenomena of nature, and, above all, by a six years' war of the most sanguinary and exasperated character; while the provinces of Rio de la Plata have not only been able, during all that time, to preserve the precious treasure of their liberty, but to bestow it, without foreign aid, on their brethren of Chili, and to force the King's troops to retire towards Peru, which, having been reinforced by fresh detachments, had ventured to show themselves on our territory. It is under such circumstances, it is after having shown and proven the grounds and motives of its declaration, and the means it possesses to support it, that my Government has thought it conformable to the respect due to nations to make it known to them, and to solicit their acknowledgment of its sovereignty.

My Government, considering that of the United States as one of the first of whom it ought to solicit this acknowledgment, believed that the identity of political principles, the consideration of their inhabiting the same hemisphere, and the sympathy so natural to those who have experienced similar evils, would be so many additional reasons in support of its anxiety. There still exist, there still preside over the councils of the nation, many of those who supported and sealed here with their blood the rights of man; their wounds, permit me to say so, are so many powerful advocates here for the Spanish Americans. The recollection that it was these States which first pointed out to us the path of glory, and the evidence that they are enjoying most fully the blessed effects of liberty, inspire me with the conviction that it is for them also to show that they know how to appreciate our efforts, and thereby animate the other provinces which, less fortunate, have not yet been able to put an end to the sanguinary struggle.

I cannot close this communication without requesting you to make known to the President the wishes of the United Provinces in South America; and, also, to represent to him their earnest desire to see firmly established, between these States and those Provinces, relations mutually beneficial, suited to Governments and people whose institutions are so analogous, and all whose interests invite them to promote and maintain a close and permanent friendship.

God preserve you many years.

Don Manuel H. de Aguirre to the Secretary of State.

SIR: DECEMBER 26, 1817.

I had the honor to inform you, on the 16th of this month, that the United Provinces of South America, having declared themselves free and independent, had made a request to be considered as such by these United States; and, as you expressed a desire, in the conference with which you honored me the day before yesterday, to be more fully informed of the grounds on which those provinces formed their request, I now comply with your desire.

In my said note I particularly stated the circumspection with which my Government had proceeded, and the precautions it had taken from a sense of its own honor, and the respect due to other nations, before it required to be considered by them as a sovereign Power. You were pleased to remark on the uncertainty of establishing a new Government, and the hesitation naturally produced by such a request; and you preferred that it should be delayed, or not made until all doubt was removed of the real existence and duration of their sovereignty, and they had given a pledge to foreign nations that there existed no intention to commit them by making this request.

For more than seven years have these provinces carried on, alone, an active and successful war. The evidences of their successes have been witnessed in the capture of the royal squadron, the occupation of Montevideo, the numerous prisoners of war who fertilize our fields, the chastisement of the King's forces in Peru, and the recovery of the provinces of Chili. Meanwhile, our interior organization has been progressively improving. Our people have made an essay in the science of government, and have appointed a congress of representatives, which is engaged in promoting the general weal. A plan of military defence has been formed, in which we were before deficient, and a system of revenue organized that has hitherto been competent to provide for our numerous wants; finally, public opinion is daily gaining ground, unsupported by which the Government would have been unable to undertake the enterprises which have distinguished it.

The strength of our oppressors diminishing with the increase of our means of defence, their hopes declining of longer tyrannizing over us, a regular system of government, the decision of our citizens, a competent revenue, an organized force sufficiently strong for the defence of the country, a squadron afloat, a disposable army in Chili, and a second operating in Peru—all this must surely undeceive our enemies, even if the habit of authority should still flatter them with hopes.

Notwithstanding the professions of neutrality, on the part of the United States, towards the contending parties in Spanish America; notwithstanding the indifference, if I may say so, with which the United States have looked on a country deluged with blood by its tyrants, I would not offend you, sir, by the idea that you consider it necessary that we should offer proofs of the justice of our cause. The few of our sufferings that have come to the knowledge of foreign nations have filled them with horror and indignation; never was the human race so debased elsewhere as we have been; never did men draw their swords in a more sacred cause. But the provinces of Rio de la Plata mean not to exite the sensibility of the United States. They only call upon their justice. The contest in South America can be viewed in no other light than as a civil war; and I have proven to you, sir, the prosperous and respectable attitude of those provinces. Are they, then, to be thought worthy of being ranked among nations? Do their full enjoyment of all the rights of sovereignty for more than seven years, their successes, and present position, give them a right to become one?

The apprehension that this acknowledgment might involve the United States in a war with the chief of the adverse party could not be justly considered by my Government as a sufficient motive to prevent their soliciting it; since, however little of justice or prudence may be found in the councils of the King of Spain, even that would suffice to prove that other nations have distinct and fixed rules whereby to estimate political successes; that, practically, they acknowledge no other sovereign power than that which is so de facto; that they can inquire no further without interfering with the internal concerns of other nations; and that, when a nation is divided into two parties, or the bonds of the political compact between the monarch and the people happen to be otherwise broken, they both have equal rights, and owe the same obligations to neutral nations. It follows, therefore, that the contending parties in Spanish America are not subjected to different rules.

If these rules may sometimes be varied, or admit of any alteration, the exception should always be in favor of the oppressed against the oppressor. It is therefore strongly contended by many of the most celebrated civilians, "that in all revolutions produced by the tyranny of the prince, foreign nations have a right to assist an oppressed people;" a right dictated by justice and generosity. Now it cannot be supposed that the observance of justice ever gave a pretext for war to the party or nation most interested in a different conduct. Since, therefore, my Government has limited its pretensions to the acknowledgment of its real and effective sovereignty, which even our adversary himself would not call in question, it considers itself authorized to take this step, by the practice of nations, by public opinion, and the sanction of eternal justice.

In our late conference, you appeared to find an objection in the occupation of Montevideo by the Portuguese troops. But if credit is to be given to the correspondence between my Government and that of Brazil, the principal motive for this war is the ancient pretension of the King of Brazil to more extensive limits. It will probably be impossible for him to obtain them, as one of our most distinguished commanders, supported by the most ample resources, is now engaged in repelling them; and notwithstanding the double family ties which now connect that sovereign with the King of Spain, our national existence, so far from being seriously threatened by the war in that quarter, [La Banda Oriental,] is strengthened by it. You also remarked, that similar pretensions had been formed by other provinces of Spanish America now contending for their liberties. Would to Heaven that they all could now offer to this Government the same proofs of their effective sovereignty, and equal pledges of their respective preponderating power! Humanity would then have much fewer evils to deplore, and all America would exhibit a united people, only rivalling with each other in the art of improving their civil institutions, and extending the blessings and enjoyment of social order.

When I contemplate the distinguished part the United States may take in realizing this grand enterprise, and consider how much it is in their power to hasten this happy period, only by giving an example of national justice, in acknowledging the independence of those Governments who so gloriously and by so many sacrifices have known how to obtain it, my reason persuades me that the wishes of the United Provinces cannot fail to be speedily accomplished.

I have the honor to renew to you, sir, the assurances of my highest consideration, and pray God to preserve you many years.

Don Manuel H. de Aguirre to the Secretary of State.

SIR: CITY OF WASHINGTON, December 29, 1817.

It is painful to me to trespass on your attention with complaints; but I should be wanting both to the trust committed to me by my Government, and my duty to my country, if, after being informed of the purport and effect of the law passed on the 3d of March last, for the more effectual preservation of the neutral relations of the United States, I did not represent to you that its effects bear hard only on those who are struggling for the independence of Spanish America.

By the law and usages of nations, neutrals are forbidden, if I am not mistaken, to afford any active aid to any of the contending parties; to sanction any law granting or refusing privileges to one, which are not at the same time effectually granted or refused to the other; and, in fine, to change their commercial or other regulations, so as to improve the condition of the one, to the exclusion of the other.

If, on comparing the above-mentioned law with this doctrine, and observing that whether we look to the time of its enactment or the period of its duration, it could only be applicable to the contest now carrying on in South America, we cannot but be surprised that it tends so directly to injure those who are defending themselves against the most horrible tyranny; and not only prohibits the irregularities arising from the deficiency of measures to preserve a strict neutrality, but also prohibits or subjects to bonds, amounting to a prohibition, the exportation of arms and ammunition, or any other mercantile operation which may be considered as calculated to aid, or in any manner to co-operate in, any measure of hostility.

If you permit me, sir, to point out the effect of that law upon those provinces which, although engaged in the same cause with those of the Rio de la Plata, are, notwithstanding, under distinct Governments, I would observe that their state of defence is much inferior to that of the enemy; that some of them, perhaps, have not the means of increasing it, if the nearest neutral nation shuts their markets against them; and that the law which subjects them to the impossibility, or increases the difficulty, of augmenting their means of defence, has a direct tendency to promote their subjugation. The unequal effects of this law are still more evident, if we consider that, while it immediately deprives several of those provinces of the most essential supplies, it allows their enemies to draw supplies from hence, without which their troops could not move a step. It cannot be possible that, in refusing all manner of aid to those who are engaged in our bloody struggle, the United States should so far restrict their commerce as to prohibit the exportation of provisions.

I shall abstain from calling your attention to consequences still more injurious, resulting from such a precedent; but I cannot avoid observing that the fourth section of the law in question is evidently favorable to the King of Spain exclusively, if we attend to the time and circumstances when it passed.

I confidently rely, sir, on your laying before the President the subject of the present complaint, which nothing but the necessity of the case has compelled me to make; and also on your submitting to him, that, in our present struggle, we not only defend the rights of mankind and the best interests of civilized society, but that we are contending for the preservation of our families and for our existence.

God preserve you many years.

SIR: CITY OF WASHINGTON, January 6, 1818.

In the last interview with which you honored me a few days ago, you were pleased to state that the act of the acknowledgment of the independence of the United Provinces in South America ought to be reduced to a formal treaty between the two independent Governments, as was practised in the case of the treaty of amity and commerce between the United States and His Most Christian Majesty, in 1778.

Not considering myself, in truth, sufficiently authorized by my Government to treat with that of the United States, in special terms, I then had the honor to explain to you that my powers did not extend so far; but, keeping in view the spirit and object of my commission, (as appear by the credentials now in your possession,) namely, "to promote as far as may be the honor and consolidation of the cause in which these provinces are now engaged;" and, it appearing evident, on the other hand, to be the intention and desire of the said sovereign congress closely to connect themselves by direct relations of mutual friendship and commerce with these United States, I have not the least hesitation to assure you that I consider myself fully authorized by my Government to enter into a negotiation with that of the United States, on the general basis of a reciprocal amity and commerce.

I have the honor to renew to you the assurances of the highest consideration, &c.

Don Manuel H. de Aguirre to the Secretary of State.

SIR: WASHINGTON CITY, January 16, 1818.

I had the honor, in my interview with you on the 13th of this month, to state to you the light in which the invasion of one of the United Provinces, by the troops of the King of Portugal, was viewed by my Government, thereby violating the neutrality which they had bound themselves to maintain conjointly with my Government. I likewise deemed it fit to inform you, that this act of invasion by a neutral nation, for the purpose of dismembering the integrity of the territory of Spanish America within its lawful limits, was considered by the councils of my Government as an act of hostility between the nations at variance, and that on this principle they had regulated their conduct towards the King of Portugal.

In the same conference, I had the satisfaction to represent to you that the trade and communication between the Provinces of Rio de la Plata and the United States had no other basis than a decree of the Government of those provinces, by which a free trade is granted to foreign nations, in consequence of the imperious circumstances of the mother country in the years 1808 and 1809, and by which that Government reserved the right of limiting its duration, on the termination of the urgency of the case.

In the note which I previously had the honor to address you, I considered it my duty to express the sincere and earnest desire of my Government to establish reciprocal and close relations of amity and commerce with the United States; and you will now permit me to request you, sir, that, in making the President acquainted with these loyal sentiments, you will also inform him that it is equally its desire to establish a solid and lasting friendship, in order that the consequent predilection may have its full effect on the communication and trade between both countries.

Our Lord preserve you many years.

15th Congress.] No. 299. [1st Session.

SPAIN AND THE SEMINOLE INDIANS.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, MARCH 25, 1818.

WASHINGTON, March 25, 1818.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

I now lay before Congress all the information in the possession of the Executive respecting the war with the Seminoles, and the measures which it has been thought proper to adopt for the safety of our fellow-citizens on the frontier exposed to their ravages. The enclosed documents show that the hostilities of this tribe were unprovoked, the offspring of a spirit long cherished and often manifested towards the United States; and that, in the present instance, it was extending itself to other tribes, and daily assuming a more serious aspect. As soon as the nature and object of this combination were perceived, the major general commanding the southern division of the troops of the United States was ordered to the theatre of action, charged with the management of the war, and vested with the powers necessary to give it effect. The season of the year being unfavorable to active operations, and the recesses of the country affording shelter to these savages in case of retreat, may prevent a prompt termination of the war; but it may be fairly presumed that it will not be long before this tribe and its associates receive the punishment which they have provoked and justly merited.

As almost the whole of this tribe inhabits the country within the limits of Florida, Spain was bound, by the treaty of 1795, to restrain them from committing hostilities against the United States. We have seen with regret that her Government has altogether failed to fulfil this obligation; nor are we aware that it has made any effort to that effect. When we consider her utter inability to check, even in the slightest degree, the movements of this tribe, by her very small and incompetent force in Florida, we are not disposed to ascribe the failure to any other cause. The inability, however, of Spain to maintain her authority over the territory and Indians within her limits, and, in consequence, to fulfil the treaty, ought not to expose the United States to other and greater injuries. When the authority of Spain ceases to exist there, the United States have a right to pursue their enemy, on a principle of self-defence. In this instance, the right is more complete and obvious, because we shall perform only what Spain was bound to have performed herself. To the high obligations and privileges of this great and sacred right of self-defence will the movement of our troops be strictly confined. Orders have been given to the general in command not to enter Florida, unless it be in pursuit of the enemy, and, in that case, to respect the Spanish authority wherever it is maintained; and he will be instructed to withdraw his forces from the province as soon as he shall have reduced that tribe to order, and secure our fellow-citizens in that quarter, by satisfactory arrangements, against its unprovoked and savage hostilities in future.

15th Congress.] No. 300. [1st Session.

SPAIN—ILLEGAL ARMAMENTS, AND OCCUPATION OF AMELIA ISLAND.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, MARCH 14, AND TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, MARCH 26, 1818.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States: MARCH 14, 1818.

In compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 16th of December, and of the House of Representatives of the 24th of February last, I lay before Congress a report of the Secretary of State, and the papers referred to in it, respecting the negotiation with the Government of Spain. To explain fully the nature of the differences between the United States and Spain, and the conduct of the parties, it has been found necessary to go back to an early epoch. The recent correspondence, with the documents accompanying it, will give a full view of the whole subject, and place the conduct of the United States, in every stage and under every circumstance, for justice, moderation, and a firm adherence to their rights, on the high and honorable ground which it has invariably sustained.

JAMES MONROE.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, March 14, 1818.

The Secretary of State, to whom have been referred the resolutions of the Senate of 16th of December, and of the House of Representatives of 24th February last, has the honor of submitting to the President the correspondence between this Department and the Spanish minister residing here, since he received the last instructions of his Government to renew the negotiation, which, at the time of the last communication to Congress, was suspended by the insufficiency of his powers. These documents will show the present state of the relations between the two Governments.*

As in the remonstrance by Mr. de Onis, of the 6th of December, against the occupation by the United States of Amelia island, he refers to a previous communication from him, denouncing the expedition of Sir Gregor McGregor against that place, his note of 9th July, being the paper thus referred to, is added to the papers now transmitted. Its date, when compared with that of the occupation of Amelia by McGregor, will show that it was written ten days after that event; and the contents of his note of 6th December will show that measures had been taken by the competent authorities of the United States to arrest McGregor as soon as the unlawfulness of his proceedings within our jurisdiction had been made known to them by legal evidence, although he was beyond the reach of the process before it could be served upon his person. The tardiness of Mr. Onis's remonstrance is of itself a decisive vindication of the magistrates of the United States against any imputation of neglect to enforce the laws; for if the Spanish minister himself had no evidence of the project of McGregor, sufficient to warrant him in addressing a note upon the subject to this Department, until ten days after it had been accomplished, it cannot be supposed that officers whose authority to act commenced only at the moment of the actual violation of the laws, and who could be justified only by clear and explicit evidence of the facts in proof of such violation, should have been apprized of the necessity of their interposition, in time to make it effectual, before the person accused had departed from this country.

As in the recent discussions between Mr. Onis and this Department there is frequent reference to those of the negotiation at Aranjuez in 1805, the correspondence between the extraordinary mission of the United States at that period† and Don Pedro Cevallos, then the Minister of Foreign Affairs in Spain, will be also submitted as soon as may be, to be laid before Congress; together with the correspondence between Don Francisco Pizarro and Mr. Erving, immediately preceding the transmission of new instructions to Mr. Onis, and other correspondence of Mr. Onis with this Department, tending to complete the view of the relations between the two countries.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

To the House of Representatives of the United States: MARCH 25, 1818.

I transmit to the House of Representatives, in compliance with their resolution of March the 20th, such information, not heretofore communicated, as is in the possession of the Executive, relating to the occupation of Amelia island. If any doubt had before existed of the improper conduct of the persons who authorized, and of those who were engaged in, the invasion and previous occupancy of that island, of the unfriendly spirit towards the United States with which it was commenced and prosecuted, and of its injurious effect on their highest interests, particularly by its tendency to compromit them with foreign Powers in all the unwarrantable acts of the adventurers, it is presumed that these documents would remove it. It appears by the letter of Mr. Pazos, agent of Commodore Aury, that the project of seizing the Floridas was formed and executed at a time when it was understood that Spain had resolved to cede them to the United States, and to prevent such cession from taking effect. The whole proceeding, in every stage and circumstance, was unlawful. The commission to General McGregor was granted at Philadelphia, in direct violation of a positive law; and all the measures pursued under it by him, in collecting his force and directing its movements, were equally unlawful. With the conduct of these persons I have always been unwilling to connect any of the Colonial Governments, because I never could believe that they had given their sanction either to the project in its origin, or to the measures which were pursued in the execution of it. These documents confirm the opinion which I have invariably entertained and expressed in their favor.

JAMES MONROE.

Don Luis de Onis to the Secretary of State.

SIR: WASHINGTON, January 2, 1817.

The mischiefs resulting from the toleration of the armament of privateers in the ports of this Union, and of bringing into them, with impunity, the plunder made by these privateers on the Spanish trade, for the purpose of distributing it among those merchants who have no scruple in engaging in these piracies, have risen to such a height, that I should be wanting in my duty if I omitted to call your attention again to this very important subject.

It is notorious that, although the speculative system of fitting out privateers and putting them under a foreign flag, one disavowed by all nations, for the purpose of destroying the Spanish commerce, has been more or less pursued in all the ports of the Union, it is more especially in those of New Orleans and Baltimore where the greatest violations of the respect due to a friendly nation, and, if I may say so, of that due to themselves, have been committed: whole squadrons of pirates having been [fitted] out from thence, in violation of the solemn treaty existing between the two nations, and bringing back to them the fruits of their piracies, without being yet checked in these courses, either by the reclamations I have made, those of His Majesty's consuls, or the decisive and judicious orders issued by the President for that purpose.

The American privateer "Swift," which, as I mentioned to you in my note of the day before yesterday, had captured, under the name of the "Mongore," and the flag of Buenos Ayres, the Spanish polacre "Pastora," just arrived at New Bedford, is now in Baltimore river; and her captain, James Barnes, who has so scandalously violated the laws of nations, the neutrality of this Government, and the existing treaty, has had the effrontery to make a regular entry of his vessel at the custom-house of Baltimore, declaring his cargo to consist of bales and packages containing silks, laces, velvets, and other valuable articles—all, as you may suppose, plundered from the Spaniards.

* For the correspondence relating to indemnities, Florida, and limits, see No. 311, under date of February 22, 1819.
† This correspondence will be found in Foreign Relations, vol. ii. p. 613.

The three-masted schooner called the "Intrepid," lately arrived at New York from Montevideo, is, as His Majesty's consul there informs me, the Spanish vessel called the "Leona," captured off Cadiz by the schooner "Orb," of Baltimore, whose armament I denounced to you at the time, and communicated the positive information I had received that her object was to cruise against the subjects of the King, my master. This pirate (for that is the name by which both nations have agreed to consider a privateer of this description) was armed at Baltimore, manned by subjects of this republic, and commanded by a Portuguese called Almeyda, an American citizen.

The schooner "Leona," now at New York, under the name of the "Intrepid," and ostensibly owned by one Mifflin, at Philadelphia, had on board, when captured, thirty thousand dollars in specie, three hundred boxes of sugar, some grain, with other property belonging to Moreno, De Moro, and others, merchants at Cadiz; and had a cargo of jerked beef and other articles, belonging, as I have heard, to the merchants in Baltimore who furnished the funds for equipping the "Orb."

The consul at New Orleans informs me that the pirate Mitchell, with the vessels under his command, fitted out by different merchants at that port, of whom a Mr. Dupuy is supposed to be the principal, has lately taken several Spanish prizes to Galvezton, and that, from the proceeds of their sales, he has remitted to the said deputies one hundred and five thousand dollars, which he has deposited in the Bank of Louisiana, after deducting the shares of the captain and crew, amounting, as is supposed, altogether, to two hundred thousand dollars. The same consul adds, that two of the prizes, one from Campeachy and the other from Guatemala, were burnt, and their crews landed by that savage monster near Boquilla de Piedras, that they might be, as they actually were, put to death by his great friend Villapinto, a noted rebel ringleader, who, being pursued by the King's troops, had retreated to the seashore to make his escape. Of ninety men, composing these crews, only nine were saved.

The consul at Norfolk informs me of the arrival there of a privateer schooner from Buenos Ayres, one of several fitted out at Baltimore, and wholly owned there; that, from what he has been able to ascertain, among other vessels, she plundered a Spanish ship laden with a cargo of cochineal, indigo, and specie, to the amount of more than two hundred thousand dollars, and proceeded to Baltimore to divide the spoil among the concerned. The said consul, in the discharge of his duty, and the exercise of his rights, addressed an application to the collector of the customs, (copy of which is annexed, and also of the answer of the collector,) by which you will perceive that he declines this just reclamation. I could cite innumerable other cases, as well attested as those I have just stated, but I omit them, as their detail would fatigue you, without tending to demonstrate more effectually that they proceed from non-observance by the officers of this Government of the President's proclamation, and of the treaty of limits and navigation between the two Governments. Although His Majesty has too much confidence in the rectitude of the President to doubt that due compensation will be made for these injuries to his subjects, on the same principles as have been observed by His Majesty, on other occasions, towards the United States, yet I cannot omit requesting, in his royal name, that, in the mean while, the President may be authorized to take the most energetic measures required by the case, to put an end to these practices, and that he would be pleased to cause the vessels I have before mentioned to be confiscated, together with their cargoes, and security to be given by Mr. Dupuy for the amount of his deposite in the Bank of Louisiana, as being the proceeds of the Spanish prizes made by the pirate Mitchell; and that, as a general measure, every privateer coming into these ports under a flag not acknowledged be detained and sequestered, to be made responsible for the depredations committed by it.

I trust that the President will be the more disposed to accede to this request, as, in addition to its justice, it is strictly conformable to his friendly sentiments towards my sovereign, and the humane principles by which he is characterized.

I renew to you my respects, sir, and pray God to preserve you many years.

LUIS DE ONIS.

[Enclosure in Don Luis de Onis's letter of January 2, 1817.]

SIR: SPANISH CONSUL'S OFFICE, NORFOLK, December 16, 1816.

On seeing an armed vessel in this harbor, in front of the town, displaying a flag unknown to me, and, I will venture to say, unknown to the United States, and, at any rate, not recognised by them; and there being no doubt that this vessel is one of those known to be committing great depredations at sea on the Spanish trade, and frequently also on ships of all other nations, not excepting those under the merchant flag of these States, I have thought it my duty to apply to you, to request you to give me some information respecting said armed vessel, her character and nationality, and under what authority she navigates the seas as a public or private ship of war, who commands her, and how she is manned, and in what light you view her in your official capacity?

In making these inquiries of you, I hope that you will only see a desire on my part to acquire information upon a question of vast importance to the commerce of Spain, as it affects materially the safety of her merchant ships: whether or not those sea plunderers are to find an asylum in the ports of the United States, which would so greatly increase the means of carrying on their spoliations. I am confident that it is not the wish of this Government to afford any sort of protection to a set of men (for the most part foreigners to the country they pretend to serve) who avail themselves of the dissensions which unfortunately prevail between Spain and some of her colonies, to exercise their merciless rapacity upon the inoffensive merchant, not only of Spain, but in many instances of other countries; and I am too well acquainted with your own character to suppose that you would be inclined to favor them. Indeed, the intentions and good disposition of this Government towards Spain are rendered manifest in the President's proclamation of the 1st September, 1815; and it is there forbidden to American citizens to take any part in the contentions between Spain and some of her distant possessions; and it is enjoined on all officers, civil and military, under the Government, to be vigilant in searching out and bringing to punishment all such citizens as shall act contrary to the intent of said proclamation: and there being a report in town that many of those composing the crew of the vessel in question are Americans, I have thought it necessary to call your attention to this point, not doubting that you will consider it as meriting your particular examination. I will conclude by availing myself of this opportunity to assure you of the great respect with which I remain, &c.

ANTONIO ARGOTE VILLALOBOS.

CHARLES K. MALLORY, Esq.,
Collector of Norfolk and Portsmouth.

[ANSWER.]

SIR: COLLECTOR'S OFFICE, NORFOLK, December 16, 1816.

I have had the honor to receive your note of this morning. In respect to the vessel which is the subject of it, I deem it only necessary to remark, that she is recognised in this office in no other character than that of any other foreign vessel arriving in our waters from a foreign port; that my duty does not require of me to request her flag, so far as to make it a criterion or condition of her admission into this port; and that I shall take care, in this, as in other cases, to see that the laws of the United States and other regulations of the Government, so far as they come within the sphere of my authority, be duly observed.

I reciprocate the sentiments of respect you express for me, and am, &c.

CHARLES K. MALLORY.

Don ANTONIO ARGOTE VILLALOBOS.

Don Luis de Onis to the Secretary of State.

SIR: WASHINGTON, January 15, 1817.

On the 1st instant I informed you of the arrival, at New Bedford, of the Spanish polacre "Pastora," captured by the American privateer "Swift," under the name of the "Mongore," and the flag of Buenos Ayres, commanded by a Captain Barnes, a citizen of these States. Two days afterwards I addressed to you another note, stating the arrival, in the river and port of Baltimore, of the said privateer, with the booty piratically plundered from the subjects of the King, my master; and requesting that you would be pleased to obtain of the President such orders as would most effectually insure the confiscation both of the vessel and of the privateer, that they might be made answerable for the damages justly claimed by the owners of the property. Although I am persuaded that it is the multiplicity of business that has prevented your answering my notes, yet I cannot doubt that the President will have given the orders I requested in them. Notwithstanding this, and the application made by His Majesty's consul at Baltimore, in the discharge of his duty, to the attorney for that district, (a copy of which is annexed,) I regret to announce to you that the collector and the aforesaid attorney have thought fit to allow the said pirate to depart; and that, after having ascertained that fact, the said attorney wrote a note to His Majesty's consul, (copy of which is enclosed,) inviting him to call at his house to confer with him on the subject of his note.

It is not my wish to trespass on your attention with the reflections that are naturally produced by such notorious proceedings, nor pointedly to notice the incivility of the attorney for that State towards a consul of my nation; my only object is to bring to your view what has occurred in the case of the vessel that, by submitting it to the President, he may be convinced that the injuries sustained by the King's subjects in these ports, by the violation of the existing treaty between the two nations, which has the force of a law, are daily augmenting, and that, the more they are diffused, the more difficult will it be hereafter to adjust the indemnities due to His Majesty's subjects.

I trust, sir, that you will only see in the step I now take a continued proof of my desire to restore that good understanding and sincere sense of justice between the two countries which form the basis of real harmony in every society, and that you will therefore be induced to give this subject all the attention due to its importance.

I beg leave to renew the assurances of my perfect respect, and pray God to preserve you many years.

LUIS DE ONIS.

Don Luis de Onis to the Secretary of State.

SIR: WASHINGTON, January 16, 1817.

I have just received information, from the King's consul at New Orleans, of the capture, within sight of the Balize of that port, and at little more than musket-shot from the land, of the Spanish schooner "Hipolita," Captain Don Buenaventura March, by the pirate "Jupiter," under the Margarita flag. To enable you fully to judge of the atrociousness of this capture, manifestly in violation of the territory of the United States, I have the honor to enclose the declaration of the captain of the said schooner, made before His Majesty's consul at the aforesaid port; by which it appears he was at anchor in the Pass of the Mississippi, and with Pratigue, from the Balize, on board, when he was boarded by the aforesaid pirate, and so inhumanly treated by him as to be left weltering in his blood on the deck.

It would be superfluous to affect your sensibility by a detail of the multiplied injuries and outrages incessantly sustained by His Majesty's subjects in these ports; they have already been admitted by the President in his message to Congress, recommending the adoption of such measures as in their wisdom may appear best calculated to repress them; thereby offering to the King, my master, a pledge that his excellency admits the necessity of indemnifying them as far as possible. It is, however, with great regret that I have to remark on the delay in carrying such urgent measures into execution, and that the injuries complained of have not been prevented by a due observance of the laws of nations and of the existing treaty, which, by the constitution, has the force of a law in all the courts, in consequence of its ratification by the President and the Senate.

I pray you, sir, to accept the assurances of my perfect consideration.

God preserve you many years.

LUIS DE ONIS.

Don Luis de Onis to the Secretary of State.

SIR: WASHINGTON, January 16, 1817.

I have just learned, with the greatest satisfaction, that the marshal of Baltimore has despatched a boat, with a picket of soldiers, in pursuit of the pirate Mongore, which has been brought back to that port, in conformity to the orders which I had flattered myself would have been issued by the President. I shall lose no time in giving an account to His Majesty of the friendly dispositions manifested by this Government; and add the hope that this evidence of it will be the forerunner of sentiments calculated to remove every shadow of misunderstanding between the two Governments.

I offer you, sir, the renewed assurances, &c., and pray God to preserve you many years.

LUIS DE ONIS.

Mr. Onis to the Secretary of State.

SIR: FEBRUARY 10, 1817.

In addition to the schooner Hipolita, which I informed you, in my note of the 16th of last month, had been captured by the pirate Jupiter, in the pass of the Balize of New Orleans, at anchor, within musket-shot of the land, I have just received official notice of the capture, by the same pirate, of the Spanish brig called "Reyna de los Angeles," proceeding from Campeachy. This vessel was also at anchor in the Balize, very near the land, and with the pilot on board to ascend the river; but no consideration was sufficient to restrain that pirate in his injustice. I am informed that Commodore Patterson, in consequence of the reclamation made by the consul of His Majesty in the said port, has depatched a vessel in pursuit of her, and there are appearances that he will succeed in rescuing the prizes, and placing them at the disposition of their owners; but you cannot but know that, if the perpetration of this crime go unpunished, as has been the case on other occasions, or if their escape be permitted, as has happened in Baltimore with the captain and crew of the pirate Mongore, neither the vassals of His Majesty will be able to obtain the evidence which might be drawn from their declarations, in order to reclaim their property, nor the crimes discovered that they may have committed, nor the number of these robbers be diminished, who so highly compromit the neutrality of the Government, robbing, indiscriminately, the vessels of all nations, confident that all the harm that can happen to them is, that they should be deprived of some of the proceeds of their piracies.

In proof of the solidity of these assertions, I ought to add that, at the time these captures took place at New Orleans, in violation of the territory of this republic, General Hubbert, the chief of a band of robbers, armed and equipped in the province of Louisiana, who had occupied Galvezton, had arrived at New Orleans to solicit provisions and munitions for that establishment. Not only have they been sent under the American flag, but the agent (Mr. de Souvinet) has bought a brig with the products of the robberies of these pirates, which are now deposited in the Bank of Louisiana, amounting to $180,000, as you will see by the annexed paragraph of the Gazette of New Orleans; and this vessel is preparing to carry more provisions and munitions to that establishment, and to take back to the United States the spoils of the Spaniards, which are not considered secure in that place.

In the port of Baltimore, the brig Peace, (Paz,) mounting sixteen guns, commanded by Captain Stafford, well known for having before commanded the privateer schooner Maria, which was confiscated in Port au Prince, has been lately bought for the purpose of cruising against the Spanish commerce. According to information which I have received, the brig called the Fourth of July has gone out of that port with the same object, commanded by Captain Watkins, and armed by order of the famous Thomas Taylor, commissioner of Buenos Ayres: finally, schooner Romp, whose outrages and piracies are of public notoriety, has again sailed for Norfolk, with the design of equipping there, to proceed again on her cruise.

I consider it my duty to make you acquainted with all these acts, which are in manifest contravention of the treaty existing between the two nations, to the end that the President, giving them the consideration which they deserve, may issue the orders that may appear to him best adapted to restrain them, until Congress determines to destroy them at the root, whereby the commerce of all nations may be secure.

I renew, &c. LUIS DE ONIS.

Mr. Onis to the Secretary of State.

SIR: WASHINGTON, February 11, 1817.

When I had the honor to communicate to you that, in virtue of the orders which the President had sent to the marshal at Baltimore, the pirate Mongore had been detained and embargoed in that port, I had a right to believe that the marshal, as well as the attorney of the United States, would have caused the captain and crew to be immediately arrested, to take from them the declarations which public vengeance and the interests of Spain, as well as of this Government, required, to ascertain the names of the vessels plundered by that pirate, the depository of the effects, and the fate of the Spanish crews.

You may consider what was my surprise on receiving positive information that the marshal has liberated the captain and crew of that pirate; that he has not proceeded to take from them any declaration; and has even permitted that the Mongore should go to sea again, under bond, to commit her piracies. The said vessel is yet in the river, stopped by the ice, and her captain (Barnes) very tranquil in his house, occupied in taking out of it, publicly, the effects plundered by him, which, it is calculated, exceed eighty thousand dollars in value, without any impediment being put to his proceedings by the authorities at Baltimore.

It is extremely painful to me to interrupt your attention so often, on such unpleasant subjects; but I should be wanting in my duty if I should delay to inform this Government of the manner in which the orders of the President are eluded in Baltimore, in order to heap injury upon injury on a friendly nation, and promote the revolution of its provinces. In vain will it be alleged, in order to cover this proceeding, that the laws are not sufficient to pursue, without a positive evidence, those citizens who commit hostilities against Spain. The treaty which exists between the two nations is a law of the republic; and no tribunal can decline its observance. The proofs of its infraction cannot be more manifest or decisive. The Spanish schooner captured by this same vessel, which is permitted to go out to sea, is now in a port of this Union; the effects on board of the one and the other belonging to the King's vassals. The seamen, the log-book of the respective vessels, and the captain himself, ought to give all the evidence that justice requires to decide. If these are not examined, on the equivocal pretext that they cannot be found, or that there is no evidence for proceeding against them, the consequence will be the continuation of an organized piracy for the robbery of all nations, that public vengeance will remain unsatisfied, and humanity exposed to all the horrors of such highway robbers.

I cannot do less than repeat my solicitation to the President, in the name of the King, my master, that the corsair Mongore may be secured; that the effects found on board may be deposited, as well as those which may have been already discharged from her; that the papers on board be examined, as well as the journals, crew, and captain; and that it be proposed to make all the investigations that would, under similar circumstances, be made in Spain, if a like case should occur to the United States, in order to remedy the damages and prevent their repetition.

I flatter myself that you cannot fail to find my solicitude just, and that the President will accede the more cheerfully to it, as it is agreeable to the sentiments of humanity and impartiality which characterize him, and to the desire which he has manifested to me to strengthen the bonds of friendship with my sovereign.

I renew, &c.

LUIS DE ONIS.

The Minister of Spain to the Secretary of State.

SIR: WASHINGTON, February 12, 1817.

After my official letters of the 10th and 11th of this month were written, I received advice from Baltimore that Captain John Chase was now there, and that it was understood that he had left the command of the privateer Potosi, (alias the Spartan, of Baltimore,) and likewise that there were in that city more than thirty officers and sailors who had belonged to the said privateer, and who had come there for the purpose of claiming from the said Chase their portion of the prize money from the Spanish ship "Ciencia," of which they had taken possession at sea, in the manner you will see detailed in the declarations of four of the sailors of the said privateer, copies of which are enclosed.

This, without doubt, is a case which merits all your attention, as it is proven, in the most positive manner, that a certain number of American citizens had armed and equipped a vessel in Baltimore, had gone to sea in her, and had committed an act of hostility against Spain, contrary to the laws of nations, and in violation of the fourteenth and of other articles of the treaty existing between the two nations; thus compromitting the dignity of the United States, who cannot but disapprove such conduct, and violating the rights of the King, my master.

The consul of His Majesty in Baltimore has, without loss of time, proceeded judicially against the before-mentioned John Chase, by soliciting his arrest; and at the same time is taking measures to attach, in the hands of Mr. Didier, merchant, of Baltimore, twenty odd thousand dollars, which it is known he has received from the said prize; but I see at once that all the efforts of the consul will be in vain, unless this Government interpose all their authority, by giving the proper orders for vindicating their own dignity, which has been compromitted by the atrocious conduct of these bad citizens. I do not deem it necessary to repeat to you the many observations I have had the honor to make to you, upon various occasions, on occurrences of this kind; and I therefore limit myself to asking of you to communicate this case to the President, who, I ought to expect, will take such measures as he may think best adapted to the correction of this disorder, and for doing justice to the aggrieved party.

I renew to you my respects, and pray God to preserve you many years.

LUIS DE ONIS.

Don Luis de Onis to the Secretary of State.

SIR: WASHINGTON, February 22, 1817.

In confirmation of what I had the honor to state in my note to you of the 12th instant, I now enclose a list of the articles which Mr. Henry Didier, a merchant of Baltimore, has landed there, under the usual forms of the custom-house, from on board the American schooner "Remittance," Captain James Rogers, from Aux Cayes; they being the same which had been plundered from the Spanish ship "Ciencia" by the privateer "Potosi," Captain James Chase, by whom they were transhipped on board the said schooner, and consigned to the above-mentioned Didier.

In consideration of these proofs, I trust that you will be pleased to obtain from the President the necessary order to effect the delivery or security of this property, for the benefit of its lawful owners; and that you will have the goodness to advise me of the same for my Government.

I renew to you my respects, and pray God to preserve you many years.

LUIS DE ONIS.

Don Luis de Onis to the Secretary of State.

SIR: WASHINGTON, February 28, 1817.

The session of Congress being within two days of closing, and the Senate not having given its assent to the bill passed by the House of Representatives for the purpose of putting a stop to the armaments making in different parts of the Union, in violation of the laws of nations and of the treaty existing between His Catholic Majesty and this republic, I have considered it my duty to represent to you the injuries resulting from this delay to Spain, and likewise to all the nations of Europe; to the end that, if the President sees fit, he may be pleased to cause this subject to be taken into serious consideration.

I renew to you my respects, and pray God to preserve you many years.

LUIS DE ONIS.

Don Luis de Onis to the Acting Secretary of State.

SIR: WASHINGTON, March 11, 1817.

In an official letter, under date of the 11th of last month, which I had the honor to direct to the Secretary of State, I represented to this Government that, contrary to my expectation, I had just received positive information that the marshal at Baltimore had left at liberty the captain and crew of the pirate "Mongore," and had even permitted her to go to sea to renew her excesses, without having even so much as taken their declarations, which the public vengeance and the interests of both Governments demanded; I dwelt on the great injuries which would follow to my nation from the impunity and toleration which these highway robbers met with in this country; and requested that the President would give the correspondent directions for preventing this injury.

In my official letter of the 12th of the same month I took occasion again to call the attention of this Government to the same subject, though in a different case, in consequence of having received advice that Captain John Chase, who commanded the privateer "Potosi," alias the Spartan, of Baltimore, and more than thirty persons belonging to her crew, had arrived at Baltimore, of whom four had given very detailed declarations respecting the capture of the Spanish vessel the "Ciencia," of her halting place, and of the existence in Baltimore, in the possession of Mr. Henry Didier, [of articles] to the amount of more than $20,000; and requested that the Government would interpose its authority to give effect to the prosecution which the consul of His Majesty had set on foot against the person of Chase, and [to] the legal proceedings under which he has succeeded in attaching, in the hands of Mr. Didier, the said interests; and, under date of the 22d of same month, I enclosed a list of these effects, which were in the hands of Mr. Didier.

I have not, as yet, had the honor to receive an answer to any of the above-mentioned notes; and I have just understood that the authorities at Baltimore, contemning the evidence of the four witnesses who had presented themselves, and the entry in the custom-house, in the name of Didier, of the effects robbed from the Spanish, have permitted the said Captain Chase to go very tranquilly to Norfolk, to enjoy the fruits of his depredations; that, with universal scandal, and notwithstanding the character of Captain Barnes, as a pirate, was established by the decision of the court of the United States in Boston, which had declared as illegitimate his prize, the Spanish schooner "Pastora," and ordered that she should be restored to her owners, he has sailed from Baltimore, with his privateer "Mongore," as soon as the ice permitted, and gone down the bay, to go to sea, to repeat his cruelties, without its having been possible for the consul of the King to get the declaration of Barnes and his people taken as to what had been the lot of the crews of the Spanish vessels which they had captured; declarations which, not only by the laws of nations, but by the more sacred law of humanity, should have been taken, considering the vehement and well-founded suspicions there were that they had assassinated all the individuals who had had the misfortune to fall into their hands.

In consideration, then, of the excesses committed against the subjects of the King, my master, and of those which, from the impunity and toleration on the part of the authorities of this country, are in a state to be repeated, with vessels purchased, armed, manned, and equipped in the ports of these States, contrary to all the laws of nations, to the express stipulations of the treaty which exists between the two countries, and to the laws of humanity itself, I cannot do less, in discharging my obligation, than to represent and reclaim, in the name of my sovereign, the damages and injuries which have resulted, and may hereafter result, to his subjects, and to protest against the authors of all of them. At the same time, I cannot omit to beg you, with earnestness, to be pleased to inform me of the measures which this Government may have taken for the purpose of having restored to the Spanish owners the effects of which they have been robbed, and also to ascertain the fate of the unfortunate crews of the Spanish vessels which have been captured and destroyed by the two pirates above mentioned, as likewise by the other two, called the Orb and the Romp, that were, in like manner, armed in Baltimore.

I hope you will have the goodness to give me the information I ask, that I may bring it to the knowledge of the King, my master.

I renew to you my respects, &c.

LUIS DE ONIS.

Don Luis de Onis to the Secretary of State.

SIR: WASHINGTON, March 15, 1817.

I had the honor to receive your note of the 13th instant, in which, by order of the President, you enclose a copy of the act passed by Congress on the 3d, entitled "An act more effectually to preserve the neutral relations of the United States," by which the President trusts that my Government will perceive a new proof on the part of the United States of a desire to cultivate just and friendly dispositions towards Spain.

I cannot but be highly gratified by all those occasions on which the Government of these States manifests a disposition corresponding with that entertained by the King, my master, to maintain and strengthen the amicable relations subsisting between the two nations; and I therefore hope that the President will cause the most effectual measures to be taken to enforce an observance of this law by the officers of this Government, with greater exactness than has hitherto been paid to the existing laws, and to the express stipulations of the present treaty between the two nations.

I shall embrace the first opportunity to transmit a copy of this act to my court, for the information of my sovereign; and, with renewed assurances of my respects, I pray God to preserve you many years.

LUIS DE ONIS.

Don Luis de Onis to the Secretary of State.

SIR: WASHINGTON, March 26, 1817.

I have just been informed that there have entered at Norfolk two pirates, under the flag of Buenos Ayres, the principal of which is called the "Independencia del Sud," armed with sixteen guns and one hundred and fifty men; her captain is the well-known pirate called Commodore Chaytor. The second is the schooner "Romp," which, to enter that port, has her name changed to that of "Altavela;" she has a crew of seventy men, and appeared to be commanded by a person called Grennolds. Both vessels were built and fitted out at Baltimore, belong to citizens of that place, and others in this republic, and their crews and captains are of the same. Their entrance into Norfolk has been public, to revictual and return to their cruise against the subjects of the King, my master; but their principal object is to place in safety the fruits of their piracies, which must be of great importance, if we attend to the information from Havana, which states that they have robbed a single Spanish vessel coming from Vera Cruz of ninety thousand dollars; and to the fact that, on the 21st of the present month, they had deposited sixty thousand dollars in the Bank of Norfolk, had landed a number of packages of cochineal, and had declared that they had taken to the amount of two hundred and ninety thousand dollars. I am informed that the person called Commodore Chaytor was about to set out for Baltimore, probably to settle accounts and divide his robberies with the persons interested in the outfit. It is a circumstance worthy of remark, that these two pirates saluted the fort at Norfolk, and that it returned the salute upon the same terms as would have been done with a vessel of war of my sovereign, or of any other nation acknowledged by all independent Powers.

It would be superfluous to take up much time in representing to you how sensible my sovereign, and likewise all maritime nations, must be, to see that their flags are treated on an equality with pirates in the territory of this Union. So obvious a reflection cannot be withheld from your knowledge and that of the President. I therefore do not doubt, that if, as I persuade myself, there has been a mistake in the honors paid to these pirates, you will be pleased to disapprove of the conduct of the commander of the fort, and give suitable orders to prevent its happening in future.

At the same time that I expect this measure from the justice of the President, I claim, in the name of the King, my master, that all steps be taken for the arrest of these pirates, whether they be at Norfolk, or that they repair, as is probable, to Baltimore, where their principal associates are; that they be proceeded against according to the act of Congress of the 3d instant, and to the stipulations of the treaty between His Majesty and this republic; that legal means be taken to ascertain all the captures made by them during their cruise, the fate of the Spanish crews that have fallen into their hands, and the places of deposite of the property taken from on board them, in order that, by attaching the same by the competent tribunals, it may be held for the disposal of the owners who may prove their property.

This request, being moreover founded in justice, is supported by the friendly sentiments of this Government towards His Catholic Majesty, by the assurances which the President has given to me of his sincere desire to put an end to a piracy which, although in opposition to the sentiments of the administration, highly compromits the dignity and character of a people distinguished for their rectitude, morality, and refined virtue. I, therefore, cannot but confidently hope that you will enable me to inform my Government of the measures which may be taken in this matter.

LUIS DE ONIS.

Don Luis de Onis to the Secretary of State.

SIR: MARCH 26, 1817.

The pirate Orb, fitted out at Baltimore, under the name of the "Congreso," and flag of Buenos Ayres, commanded by Joseph Almeyda, a Portuguese, and a citizen of this republic, has had the audacity to return and enter the said port, there to deposite a part of his robberies. The piratical character of this vessel is as fully acknowledged, as it is proved that she was armed and manned with people of this country and of others in the abovementioned port, and that she had made different prizes in the neighborhood of Cadiz and other points, since there now is in the port of New York the Spanish polacre, the "Leona," captured by her, whose cargo, consisting of two hundred thousand dollars, is concealed—where, it is not known; and in the same port of Baltimore, there are deposited the proceeds of the Spanish brig "Sereno" and her cargo, captured by the same vessel. No evidence can, in my judgment, be offered, which gives greater certainty to facts so notorious. If, by chance, any thing could be added thereto, it would be the acknowledgment of their atrocities. Nevertheless, I have the mortification to say, that neither this notoriety nor the reclamations of His Majesty's consul at that port have as yet been sufficient to produce those steps which are required by humanity, to secure the person of this notorious pirate, to take the declarations of the crew, and to prevent their enjoying their plunder to the prejudice of the lawful owners.

I think it my duty to bring this incident to your knowledge, and I doubt not that the President, when informed thereof by you, will take it into the serious consideration which it merits, and give the most positive orders that a suit be instituted against this pirate, that an attachment be laid on all his property and funds wheresover they may be placed throughout this republic, and that they be held at the disposal of those owners who may prove their property.

As I propose to despatch a messenger in a few days to my Government, and it will be very agreeable to me to give to His Majesty an assurance that the United States are seriously disposed to put an end to the injuries resulting to Spain from the non-observance of the treaty between the two nations, I will thank you to inform me as speedily as possible of the measures which may be taken in this case, and in that on which I address you in a separate despatch of this date.

LUIS DE ONIS.

SIR: DEPARTMENT OF STATE, March 28, 1817.

I have had the honor to receive your two notes, dated the 26th of this month, stating that you have been informed that two armed vessels, which have been committing unauthorized depredations upon the commerce of Spain, have recently arrived at Norfolk, and that a third, liable to the same charge, has arrived at Baltimore; thus bringing themselves within the reach of those laws against which, in the above, and in other ways, it is alleged they have offended.

Conformably to the constant desire of this Government to vindicate the authority of its laws and the faith of its treaties, I have lost no time in writing to the proper officers, both at Norfolk and Baltimore, in order that full inquiry may be made into the allegations contained in your notes, and adequate redress and punishment enforced, should it appear that the laws have been infringed by any of the acts complained of.

I use the present occasion to acknowledge also the receipt of your note of the 14th of this month, which you did me the honor to address to me, communicating information that had reached you of other and like infractions of our laws within the port of Baltimore; in relation to which I have to state, that letters were also written to the proper officers in that city, with a view to promote every fit measure of investigation and redress. Should it prove necessary, I will have the honor to address you more fully at another time upon the subjects embraced in these several notes. In the mean time, I venture to assure myself, that in the readiness with which they have thus far been attended to, you will perceive a spirit of just conciliation on the part of this Government, as well as a prompt sensibility to the rights of your sovereign.

I pray you, sir, to accept the assurances of my distinguished consideration and respect.

RICHARD RUSH.

The CHEVALIER DE ONIS.

Don Luis de Onis to the Acting Secretary of State.

SIR: WASHINGTON, March 29, 1817.

By your note of yesterday I am apprized that the President, on being informed, by the notes to which you have replied, of the audacity with which the pirates armed in this country introduce into it the fruits of their robberies, has been pleased to give suitable orders to the authorities at Norfolk and Baltimore that, having ascertained the facts which I have brought to his knowledge, they should duly proceed according to law against the violators of the laws of this republic. The district attorney for the United States at Baltimore has replied to the King's consul there that he has no evidence upon which he can proceed against Captain Almeyda; but if a witness should offer, who will depose to the facts referred to, he will proceed to order an embargo to be laid on his vessel. I am perfectly aware that good order, the personal security of individuals, and the prevention of any violence being committed upon them, require that suits should be instituted according to the rules of court: but when a crime is notorious to all, and is doubted by none; when the tranquillity and security of the state, the honor of the nation, and the respect that independent Powers owe to each other, are interested in putting a stop to crimes so enormous as those I have had the honor to denounce to you, it appears to me that the magistrates are authorized to collect a summary body of information, to inquire whether the public opinion is doubtful, and if there be ground to institute a suit. The collector of the customs cannot be ignorant that the three vessels which I have named to you were built and fitted out at Baltimore; that they were cleared at that custom-house as Americans; that their crews were, at their departure, composed of citizens of this Union, as were their captains; and that the effects which they have landed can only come from Spanish countries. What stronger testimony (if more is wanted) than their own declaration can be desired, to proceed against these pirates?

The ships' papers, the declarations of the crews, the log-book, are all testimony which can throw light upon the truth or falsehood of the crime alleged, and makes it unnecessary to trouble them, until it be ascertained that there is ground for proceeding judicially against them.

It must have been known to you, sir, that when the rebel Mina armed and equipped at Baltimore for the purpose of attacking the dominions of the King, His Majesty's consul presented two declarations, sworn to by two officers, who had accompanied him, setting forth all the plans and projects of this traitor, and the manner in which he had violated the laws of the republic; that, on another occasion, the same consul presented the declarations, on oath, of four sailors of the pirate Potosi, stating the prizes they had made, the merchants to whom were addressed the effects stolen from the vassals of the King, and that, in both cases, they were considered insufficient to proceed against these highway robbers, and to afford the vassals of His Catholic Majesty that protection which they had a right to expect of a friendly Power.

At this very moment I have received advice from His Majesty's consul at Norfolk, stating that a quantity of zeroons of cochineal, indigo, and Jesuit's bark, brought in by the two privateers, the Independence of the South, Captain Chaytor, and the Altavela, alias Romp, Captain Grennolds, has been shipped at that port on board the packet which sailed on the 23d instant for New York, in order that, by changing place and appearing to be cleared out by other merchants, the vassals of His Majesty may be deprived of their property, and the pirates and merchants who have fitted them out become the owners of the booty. No one renders more justice to the rectitude of the President than I do, and to the sincere desire that he has to put a stop to practices so contrary to the virtue and good faith which characterize this republic; but it is that very cause which lays me under the necessity of exposing these practices, with an entire confidence that the President will only see in this communication my anxious desire to prevent any obstacles being thrown in the way of the friendly arrangement now pending between the two Powers. The treaty of limits and navigation existing between them establishes, in the most positive manner, that the two nations have agreed to consider as pirates all vessels fitted out in the two countries, respectively, manned and commanded by their respective subjects or citizens, acting in a hostile manner against one or the other of the two contracting parties under a foreign commission. The acts of Congress of the 5th of June, 1794, of the 14th of June, 1797, and the second section of that of the 30th of April, 1790, prescribe the punishment to be inflicted on these persons, and the steps to be taken on both sides to restore the property to its lawful owners.

I rely on your justice and friendly sentiments towards my Government for promoting with the President such orders as, in his wisdom and foresight, will seem to him best adapted to prevent the evasion of the laws, and the sacrifice of that portion of His Catholic Majesty's subjects who have been robbed by these pirates.

I renew, &c. LUIS DE ONIS.

Don Luis de Onis to the Acting Secretary of State.

SIR: WASHINGTON, April 4, 1817.

Although I have always made it a duty not to intrude on the attention of this Government by remonstrances which are not founded on incontestable facts, or at least on moral evidence, yet it appeared to me, in the conference which I had with you yesterday, that you were not satisfied with the complaints I lately addressed to you against the pirates Potosi, Mongore, Congreso, Independencia del Sud, and Altavela. I have now the honor to annex a copy of a letter from the owners of the Spanish ship Nuestra Señora de los Dolores, and of one from the consignee at Havana, by which you will be informed that the said vessel was captured near to Cadiz by the pirate Independencia del Sud, Captain James Chaytor.

I also enclose to you the declaration, on oath, of Joseph Ojeda, captain of the Spanish schooner Catalina, captured by the pirate Almeyda, commanding the Orb, alias the Congreso. By this declaration you will see the number of Spanish vessels he has plundered, those he has burnt, and those he has sent to other ports. I flatter myself that you will find in these documents, if not all the evidence required by the laws of the United States for the punishment of a man who has committed so many atrocious acts, at least sufficient to justify the detention, for the benefit of the lawful owners, of the property which he is endeavoring to introduce clandestinely into this country, in violation of the treaty of friendship, limits, and navigation now existing between the two Powers.

I hope, sir, that you will allow me to use the term pirates, in speaking of these banditti. My impression is, (and I found it upon the treaty of amity I have just referred to,) that every vessel built or fitted out within the jurisdiction of this republic, manned and commanded by citizens of the Union, which is navigated and commits hostilities under a foreign flag, is and must be deemed a pirate; that, as such, it is liable to confiscation, with all the property on board, that it may be afterwards restored to the lawful owners, although no one should present themselves to make the claim in their behalf, as would be done in the case of any known murderer, or of one against whom there existed strong suspicions of having committed a crime against society, and this for the purpose of satisfying the calls of public vengeance. I hope that you will have the goodness to inform me if I am mistaken in this conception, and, in case it should be that of the President, that you would be pleased to obtain such measures of him as, in his wisdom, he may deem most proper to prevent the vessels above mentioned, together with their captains, again putting to sea, and to afford that protection to His Majesty's subjects which they have a right to expect, from the close friendship existing between the two Governments, by laying an attachment on the property on board those vessels, that it may be delivered up when its owners are ascertained.

I renew, &c. LUIS DE ONIS.

SIR: HAVANA, December 17, 1816.

The foregoing is a copy of my last of the 4th instant, which I confirm. I am again obliged to trouble you by requesting you would be on the watch, if the ship called the Na. Sa. de los Dolores, alias the Primera, should put into any port of the United States; which vessel I despatched for Cadiz on the 10th of July, under the command of Captain Nicholas Larrea, with a cargo of sugar consigned to the owner, Don Juan Fsco. de Vergara, of the same place, who, under date of the 3d of September, informs me of her capture on the 27th of August, near Cape St. Vincent, by the privateer Independencia del Sud, Captain James Chaytor, and gives me authority to claim or ransom her, as you will see by a copy of his letter, enclosed. I therefore hope you will do me the favor to advise me of whatever may turn up in the affair, that the requisite orders may be promptly given.

FRANCO. DE PAULD DE MAURA.

Don THOMAS STOUGHTON.

SIR: CADIZ, September 3, 1816.

On the 27th of August last, at the distance of twenty-two leagues from Cape St. Vincent, the ship Na. Sa. de los Dolores, alias Primera, Captain Nicholas Larrea, which sailed on the 10th of July of the present year, was captured by the insurgent schooner brig of Buenos Ayres, called the Independencia del Sud, commanded by James Chaytor. On being captured, Captain Larrea endeavored to ransom his vessel and cargo, and the commander of the privateer actually agreed to estimate the sale at $50,000, including therein $5,000 for the vessel, the ransom to be paid in Cadiz. When they were on the point of drawing up the necessary writings, the brig Golondrina, from Cumana, appeared in sight, which being likewise made prize of, she was afterwards liberated to carry to Cadiz the crew of the Primera, and on that account the ransom was not carried into effect. As it appears, by information, that the privateer which captured her was fitted out in North America, and commissioned by the insurgent Government of Buenos Ayres, she will be purchased for little or nothing. I understand that she will be ordered to the Cayes of St. Louis, St. Thomas, St. Bartholomew, North America, Jamaica, or some other English port. It will, therefore, be for my interest and that of your brother, Don Pascal, &c.

BALTIMORE COUNTY, State of Maryland, to wit:

Be it remembered that, on the 1st day of April, 1817, personally appeared before me, Daniel Rogers, notary public for this State, Diego José Ojeda, and, being first duly sworn according to law, deposes as follows: That he was captain of a Spanish schooner called the Nueva Catalina; that he was taken in the said schooner, on the coast of Cuba, by a privateer called the Congreso de Buenos Ayres, commanded by Joseph Almeyda; that, in the night of the same day, the 9th of February last, his said schooner was taken by the Spanish brig of war Campeador, and immediately afterwards taken again by the same privateer; when, having taken out all the provisions and best part of the sails, fire was put to the said schooner Catalina, and her crew put on board an American schooner, with the exception of the captain, the second mate, the cook, and two passengers; whom Captain Almeyda said he would not liberate until the same had been done with one of his officers and five men who had been taken prisoners there; during the deponent's stay on board of Almeyda's privateer he took the schooner Ardilla from Omoa with a cargo of sarsaparilla and $2,000; which sum was taken out and the schooner burnt.

On the 19th of February he captured two brigs, the San Antonio de Padua, from Vera Cruz, for the Havana, in ballast, and having some money on board; this vessel was also burnt. The other brig, San José, from Havana to Campeachy, with a cargo of brandy, wine, and other goods, was completely plundered, and the prisoners of the Ardilla and San Antonio, with the two passengers of the Catalina, were put on board of her, keeping a man of each vessel on board of the privateer; the San José was then allowed to proceed to Campeachy.

On the 24th he captured the Paz, bound from Sisal to Havana, on board of which vessel a prize-master and eight sailors were sent, as also the mate of the Catalina. She was then despatched for Galvezton. Her crew were put on shore at about eleven leagues from the port of Sisal; and this deponent further states that Almeyda made sail for this place, where the said deponent was not allowed to land until the 28th of March last, when he was sent on shore without any of the papers of his vessel, Almeyda having taken possession of them.

In testimony whereof, the said deponent hath hereunto subscribed his name, and I, the said notary, have hereunto set my hand and affixed my notarial seal, the day and year first hereinbefore written.

SIR: WASHINGTON, April 5, 1817.

As nothing can be more flattering to me than to prove to you that all my reclamations bear the stamp of the most scrupulous exactness and truth, I have the honor to enclose the declaration, on oath, of two seamen of the Spanish brig San Antonio de Padua, captured by the pirate Almeyda, by which you will see that this pirate has not confined himself to taking and burning Spanish vessels, but has also detained and robbed an English vessel upon the high seas.

I hope that you will have the goodness to bring the said document to the knowledge of the President, as a corroboration and support to the reclamations which I have addressed to you, in order that the property plundered by that pirate, and by the Potosi, Independencia del Sud, Mongore, and Altavela, may be secured for the subjects of the King, my master, and that they may not be permitted to return to sea, to continue their depredations.

I renew my respects, &c.

LUIS DE ONIS.

BALTIMORE COUNTY, State of Maryland, to wit:

Be it remembered that, on the 4th day of April, in the year of our Lord 1817, personally appeared before me, a justice of the peace of said county, Lewis Falcone and Bernard Falcone, Italians, and, being first duly sworn according to law, depose as follows:

That they belonged to the crew of the Spanish schooner San Antonio de Padua, he, the said Lewis, being gunner thereof; that having sailed from St. Jago de Cuba, bound for Havana, on or about the 28th of January last, they were chased and captured the same day by a Buenos Ayres privateer, called the Congreso, commanded by one José Almeyda, who took the deponents on board his vessel, depriving them of fifty boxes of segars, four barrels and five bundles of Spanish tobacco, and a bag containing silk handkerchiefs; that, during their stay on board Almeyda's vessel, he took seven Spanish prizes, three of which he burnt; and on or about the 15th of March, near the port of Havana, he fell in with a British brig, chased her under Spanish colors, and, when sufficiently near, fired into her, hoisting at the same moment the Buenos Ayres flag. The brig, being armed, was defended by discharges of grape shot nearly the whole day, but, being boarded in the evening, was compelled to surrender: during the whole transaction the British ensign was at her main peak, and no other flag. Her crew were taken on board the Congreso, and the vessel plundered of several valuable articles of gold and silver. She was given up and allowed to proceed. Her mate received a musket-shot through the head, of which wound it was almost impossible he could recover. And these deponents further state, that Almeyda after this proceeded to the United States, and arrived at Baltimore on or about the 28th of March last.

The Chevalier de Onis to the Acting Secretary of State.

SIR: WASHINGTON, April 18, 1817.

By the information which has been transmitted to me by His Majesty's consul at Baltimore, in relation to the legal steps taken by him for the seizure of the pirate "Congreso," Captain Almeyda, and the attachment of her cargo, it appears that the court of Baltimore county has declared its incompetency to take cognizance of this cause, on the plea that the Congress had not the power to alter the mode pointed out by the constitution, in which similar causes are heard and decided in the Supreme Court of the United States; from which decision it follows that no State judge, or justice of the peace, has power to arrest any individual for a violation of the laws of this republic. I will not permit myself [to indulge in] any reflection upon the form of law which may be laid down for cases of this nature, nor upon the powers which are, or are not, within the competency of the Legislature; but I cannot the less express to you my surprise that the States' attorney has not given the direction recommended by the laws to an affair which, in addition to the justice due to the subjects of His Catholic Majesty, so essentially interested the honor of the United States, by the violation of its statutes, its treaties, and its neutrality with foreign nations.

The result of all which is, that the pirate Almeyda is at full liberty; that his vessel, the "Congreso," is released from attachment; and that he is free to land, and place in safety, the fruits of his piracies; that, during several weeks, he has had thirty hands at work upon his vessel, sheathing her with copper, making new sails, and giving her a thorough repair; and that there is an appearance that he will profit by the first favorable wind to put to sea, and continue with greater fury his atrocities and piracies, before the suit can be instituted in the court which is now designated, if effectual measures be not taken to prevent him.

I therefore hope that you will be pleased to lay the foregoing subject before the President; and I doubt not that, animated by his desire to preserve the friendship which happily subsists between Spain and this republic, he will adopt those measures which appear to him most suitable to prevent the evasions employed to obstruct the course of justice, and burden the United States with an indemnification for injuries of such magnitude, occasioned to the subjects of the King, my master, by reason of the non-observance of the treaty which exists between the two nations.

LUIS DE ONIS.

The Chevalier de Onis to the Acting Secretary of State.

SIR: WASHINGTON, April 19, 1817.

Although I was persuaded that the act of Congress of the 3d of March, relative to the preservation of the neutrality of the United States, in addition to the treaty of friendship, limits, and navigation, existing between Spain and this republic, and to the act of 1797, which prescribes the mode of pursuing the violators of the laws of this republic, would exempt me from again calling your attention, by new reclamations, to the injuries which the subjects of the King, my master, incessantly experience from the privateers armed in the ports of this Union, the annexed copies of notes which His Majesty's consul at Norfolk has addressed to the States' attorney, and to the collector of the customs, and the answer which he received from the latter, will show you that nothing is sufficient to put a stop to the evil of which I have so often complained to this cabinet.

By these documents you will see, notwithstanding the proofs presented by Don Antonio Argote Villalobos, that the pirates "Independencia del Sud" and "Altavela" were both fitted out at Baltimore; that their captains, Chaytor and Grennolds, are American citizens, as well as their crews; that both the one and the other have received commissions, and cruised under a foreign flag, against the Spanish commerce; that they were then strengthening their armament and increasing their crew; and, finally, that the same collector, who acknowledges they bring no manifest (registro) of the articles they have on board from any authority or port, known or unknown, thereby evidently proving that they were stolen on the high seas, refused to arrest this property, unquestionably stolen, to hold it at the disposal of the owners, who might prove their claims; and to detain the vessels, which, in manifest violation of the laws of this republic, and, above all, of the act of Congress of the 3d of March, are there preparing to return to their cruise.

I shall abstain from fatiguing you further upon a subject to which I have so often claimed your attention and that of the President. I flatter myself that the transmission of the proceedings, such as they have been transmitted to me, and the elucidation afforded by the annexed copies, will be sufficient to induce the President to acknowledge the urgency of adopting measures really effectual, at once to put an end to these piracies; otherwise His Majesty will not be able to see, in a continuance of these excesses, a confirmation of the assurances which the President has given me of his desire amicably to adjust, by means of a treaty, all the differences pending between the two Governments, and to strengthen the friendly relations with His Majesty by new arrangements mutually advantageous to both states; nor the pledge which I have already given him, that if the above-mentioned act of the 3d of March did not repair the evils suffered by his subjects until that period, it would at least prevent those by which they were threatened in future.

I renew to you, &c.

LUIS DE ONIS.

No. 1.

SIR: SPANISH CONSUL'S OFFICE, NORFOLK, April 10, 1817.

I found it my duty, on a former occasion, to make an official application to you, in the case of the armed schooner "Potosi," Captain Chase, said to be acting under a commission from the pretended Government of Buenos Ayres, (where, by the by, she had never been,) but which had been fitted out, armed, and equipped in the port of Baltimore, to cruise against the subjects of Spain, contrary to the law of nations, and in violation of the neutrality of the United States, their laws, and stipulations in the existing treaty between the two nations, concluded on the 27th October, 1795, and in opposition to the intentions of the Government, manifested in the President's proclamation of the 1st September, 1815, and since more fully displayed by the act of Congress passed on the 3d March ultimo, entitled "An act more effectually to maintain the neutral relations of the United States."

I do not doubt, sir, but that you participate in the indignation which every honest man feels at the lawless proceedings, the greedy rapacity, and, in many instances, horrid cruelties of this set of sea depredators, who, being for the most part citizens of the United States, are a disgrace to this country; but still, you did not think yourself authorized to interfere, though in your reply, dated the 16th of December ultimo, you expressed that you would take care in that, as in other cases, to see that the laws of the United States and other regulations of the Government are duly observed.

Impelled again by duty, and relying on the assurance (just quoted) in your said letter of the 16th of December ultimo, I do myself the honor of addressing you the present letter, to request you to interpose your authority for the purpose of detaining the armed brig "Independencia del Sud," alias the "Mammoth," commanded by James Chaytor, and the schooner "Altavela," alias the "Romp," Captain Grennolds; both which vessels have been armed and equipped in this country, in violation of the law of nations, the neutrality, laws, explicit stipulations, and professed intentions of the Government of the United States, and are commanded, and principally manned, by citizens thereof.

As these violators of all law pretend to shield their conduct under a commission from a Government the existence of which is not acknowledged by this or any other civilized country, it becomes necessary for me to call your attention to the fourteenth article of the treaty existing between Spain and this country, by which you will find that it is expressly forbidden to the citizens and subjects of either nation, respectively, to take any commission from any prince or state with which the other nation shall be at war; and such as will take such a commission are punishable as pirates. Upon the strength of this article, and in vindication of the laws and honor of the United States, I must solicit you to put a stop to the further proceedings of these freebooters, and to deter them from going on in their criminal course to the great detriment of the commerce of Spain, a nation in amity with this country, and to the annoyance of the peaceable commercial subjects of all other nations. I must further solicit you to stop these vessels, on the ground that they have in this port improved their equipment and considerably augmented their crews, by enlisting several individuals, contrary to the said act of Congress of the 3d of March ultimo; which enlistment is the more aggravating, because most of the individuals so enlisted are known to be citizens of this country. I also solicit you to stop and keep in your possession certain stolen goods, namely, cochineal and indigo, which I am told are now in the custody of the custom-house under your direction, reserving to myself to prove hereafter the true owners of this property. I must add the request to be furnished with a copy of the entry or manifest of the goods or articles of merchandise imported by, and landed at this port from, the said cruisers.

In closing this letter, I cannot forbear expressing a hope that you will give to this application all the attention which the nature of the case requires, and that you will not delay your answer, from the tenor of which I shall regulate my conduct, so as to acquit myself of that duty to my King and country imposed upon me as well by my office as by my personal feelings.

With great respect, I remain, &c.

ANTONIO ARGOTE VILLALOBOS.

SIR: SPANISH CONSUL'S OFFICE, NORFOLK, April 10, 1817.

The enclosed is a copy of an official letter which I have addressed this day to the collector of the customs of this port.

As there is no question but that the Government of the United States are bound to punish such of their citizens as, in defiance of all law, have committed hostilities against a friendly nation, and also to arrest them in their progress when they are seen within their jurisdiction preparing to continue their nefarious course; and as it is in your province, as district attorney, to see that the laws of the Union are duly enforced, both in the punishment of crimes and in the prevention of them, I make the same application to you that I have made to the collector, requesting you, in the name of my Government and the suffering subjects of Spain, to issue such process as will deter James Chaytor and Captain Grennolds, their officers and crews, mostly American citizens, from going out of this port to renew their depredations on Spanish commerce; at the same time that I leave it to your discretion to institute any further proceedings that the nature of the offences already committed may admit of, and of which I shall furnish proofs in due time. I must also request you to secure, in behalf of the true owners of the stolen property which can be come at, namely, a parcel of cochineal and indigo, landed by these privateersmen at this port, and said to be now in the custody of the custom-house.

I hope, sir, that you will see the propriety of my applying to you in the present instance, and that you will do me the favor to answer this letter, apprizing me of the course you mean to adopt, for my information, and to enable me to give proper intelligence to my minister.

I remain, &c.

ANTONIO ARGOTE VILLALOBOS.

SIR: COLLECTOR'S OFFICE, NORFOLK, April 11, 1817.

I had the honor to receive your note of yesterday, in relation to the two armed vessels now lying in this port, under the flag of the Government styling itself "the United Provinces of the river Plate," the one called "Independencia del Sud," and the other "Altavela." You require me to detain these vessels upon the grounds that, in violation of the law of nations, the neutrality, laws, explicit stipulations, and professed intentions of the Government of the United States, they have been armed and equipped "in this country, and are commanded and principally manned by citizens thereof;" that, under the fourteenth article of the treaty between Spain and this country, they are pirates; and that, in violation of the act of Congress of the 3d March last, "more effectually to preserve the neutral relations of the United States," "they have in this port improved their equipment, and considerably augmented their crew, by enlisting several individuals." In reply to which, I conceive it proper only to remark, that these vessels have not been unnoticed by me, and that, in my conduct towards them, I shall endeavor, as I have done, to observe that course which my official duties appear to me to have prescribed. In pursuing which, that I may have the aid of every light to guide me which facts can afford, and the allegations thus made by you in an official form must be presumed to be bottomed on positive facts, which have come to your knowledge, you will have the goodness, I trust, to furnish me, with as little delay as possible, with the evidence of their existence in your possession.

In respect to the merchandise landed from these vessels, and deposited in the public store, which you request me to retain in my custody for proofs to be obtained by you as to the owners of it, I have to observe, that the circumstances of the case, as far as they are at present known to me, do not seem to require that I should take upon myself the responsibility; on the contrary, that these goods should be regarded as the property of those who deposited them, subject to be delivered to them, on complying with all the requisites of the laws for the protection of the public revenue.

There was no regular manifest or entry of these articles, or a copy of it should be furnished to you, according to your request; but simply a memorandum of them, and a receipt of the keeper of the public store, from which it appears that there were ninety-two bales or packages of cochineal, jalap, and varilla, consisting chiefly of the first-mentioned article.

I am, &c.

CHARLES K. MALLORY.

Don Antonio Argote Villalobos, His Catholic Majesty's Consul, Norfolk.

No. 4.

Sir: Spanish Consul's Office, Norfolk, April 12, 1817.

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of yesterday, in answer to mine of the day before, soliciting you to detain the privateers "Independencia del Sud" and "Altavela," on the grounds that those vessels have been originally armed and equipped in this country, and are now commanded and principally manned by citizens of the United States, and because they have in this port improved their equipment, and augmented their crews by enlistment; and further, soliciting you to retain in your possession, and not to re-deliver to those privateersmen, certain articles of stolen goods now under your custody; in reply to which you are pleased to observe, that those vessels have not been unnoticed by you, and that you shall endeavor to observe, with regard to them, that course which you think your official duties prescribe to you; requesting me, at the same time, to furnish the evidence to prove the facts that I have set forth, in order that you may have the aid of every light to guide you; and, finally, you observe that, from the circumstances of the case, you do not think you ought to take upon yourself to retain possession of the property above mentioned, of which you give a description in general terms.

With regard to the evidence you require, I will not hesitate to say that, as the facts I have stated are matter of public notoriety, known to every body, and I had no reason to suppose that you were ignorant of them, I did not deem it incumbent upon me to add any proof to the simple narration of them; and I was confident that, by going on to point out to you the stipulations and laws which are infringed in consequence of those facts, you would think yourself authorized to interfere in the manner requested.

I will assert, sir, as a known fact, that the brig, now called Independencia del Sud, is the same vessel which was formerly known under the name of the Mammoth privateer, belonging to Baltimore, armed and equipped in that port, from which she sailed under the command of the same Chaytor who still commands her; that the very same James Chaytor was necessarily then, and cannot have ceased since to be, a citizen of the United States; is settled, and has a family in Baltimore, whence his wife came down a few days ago in the packet Walter Gray, and is now in this town on a visit to her husband; that he has enlisted men in this port, many of whom are not so obscure as not to be generally known. I will mention, as an example, Mr. Young, of Portsmouth, who is now acting as first lieutenant on board the said brig. I will assert as a fact that the Altavela is the very schooner known before under the name of the Romp, the same that underwent a trial for piracy before the federal court in this State; that her present commander, Captain Grennolds, is a native of one of the neighboring towns, and very well known in this place; and, finally, that this vessel has been at one of the wharves altering her copper, which I call an improvement in her equipment.

If these public facts, falling within the knowledge of every individual, require more proof than the public notoriety of them, I must request to be informed as to the nature of that proof; and, also, whether you are not warranted to act upon just grounds of suspicion, without that positive evidence which is only necessary before a court of justice.

Respecting the property which I have solicited you to stop, as you seem not to think yourself authorized so to do, I must observe to you that, by the law in general practice in this and other countries, property in suspicious hands is frequently stopped; and I will go further, and assert that there is no doubt of the goods in question being stolen goods, or what, by way of softening the expression, are called prize goods; and all such property hitherto brought into this country by this sort of cruisers has been adjudged by the federal courts stolen property, and has been ordered to be restored to the rightful owners. I do, therefore, most solemnly lay claim to this property in behalf of the lawful owners, who, I am confident, will, at no distant period, come forward themselves to demand it; and I hereby reserve to them their rights unimpaired, to sue and recover from whomsoever they may be entitled to claim under the law of nations, and in conformity to the sixth and ninth articles of the treaty between Spain and this country, concluded on the 27th of October, 1795, and under any other law that may make in their favor.

I will now conclude by expressing a hope that, upon a thorough view of the subject, you will consider it consistent with the duties of your office to accede to my solicitation for the relief of the injured subjects of Spain, and to prevent a number of bad citizens of this country from committing further depredations on their commerce.

I remain, &c.

ANTONIO ARGOTE VILLALOBOS.

Charles K. Mallory, Esq.

No. 5.

Sir: Collector's Office, Norfolk, April 14, 1817.

I have had the honor to receive your letter of the 12th instant, and have bestowed upon it all the attention which the limited time allowed me would admit of.

From the view I have taken of the facts, as now stated by you, which it is to be presumed are to be regarded as specifications under the more general charges set forth in your letter of the 10th instant, I must really confess I do not at present see grounds sufficient to justify the steps you require me to take against the armed vessels now in this port, and the merchandise which has been permitted to be landed from them, and deposited in the public store.

You assert, as known facts, that the brig now called the "Independencia del Sud" is the same vessel that was formerly known under the name of the Mammoth privateer, belonging to Baltimore, armed and equipped in that port, from which she sailed under the command of the same James Chaytor who still commands her. That this very same James Chaytor was necessarily then, and cannot have ceased since to be, a citizen of the United States; is settled, and has a family in Baltimore, whence his wife came down a few days ago in the packet Walter Gray, and is now in this town on a visit to her husband. That he has enlisted men in this port, many of whom are not so obscure as not to be generally known; and you mention, as an instance, Mr. Young, of Portsmouth, who you allege is now acting as first lieutenant on board the brig. You further assert as a fact, "that the Altavela is the very same schooner which was known under the name of the Romp, the same that underwent a trial for piracy before the federal court in this State; that her commander, Captain Grennolds, is a native of one of the neighboring towns, and is very well known in this place." And, finally, that this vessel has been at one of the wharves altering her copper, which you call an improvement in her equipment.

Now, sir, supposing these facts to be what you affirm they are, matter of too great public notoriety to require any thing like demonstration; do they prove so clearly that the brig now called Independencia del Sud was originally fitted out in this country to aid the United Provinces of the river Plate in their struggle for independence? that James Chaytor, a citizen of the United States, assumed the command of her with that intention, under a commission from that Government, in the port of Baltimore? and that he commenced his cruise against the vessels of the subjects of His Catholic Majesty, with whom the United States are in amity, from that port? On the contrary, do they not, with equal or greater certainty, tend to show that this brig, which you acknowledge was formerly the Mammoth privateer, belonging to Baltimore, was fitted out during the late war between this country and Great Britain, to cruise against the vessels of the subjects of His Britannic Majesty; that she was then under the command of, and probably owned in whole or in part by, the said James Chaytor; that on the termination of that war, the owners of the said vessel, having a right to dispose of her wheresoever and to whomsoever they thought fit, may have sent her under the command of the said James Chaytor, from Baltimore to Buenos Ayres, where she may have been purchased by the Government of that place, and put upon their naval establishment, and that the same James Chaytor might then and there have accepted the commission appointing him to the command of her? I wish not to be understood as contending that this was the case, but that it is an inference which may be fairly deduced from the facts as specified by you. The log-book and other documents which I have in my possession seem, moreover, to corroborate this view of the subject. It appears from them that she is a public armed vessel, not a privateer, and commenced her cruise from Buenos Ayres under the orders of that Government (be it whatever you may please to term it) in May, 1816. Whether the said James Chaytor had the right, under such circumstances, to accept the commission or not; or whether, when he sailed from Baltimore, being then a citizen of the United States, he cannot have since ceased to be one, appears to me plainly and simply the question: has a citizen of the United States the right to expatriate himself, and enter the service of a foreign Power not at war with his native country? A question which it is not my province to discuss, but about which, I apprehend, there can be but little doubt in this country, whatever be the antiquated notions prevailing upon the subject in the old Governments of Europe. His having a wife in Baltimore, and her coming to see him here, does not appear to me to affect the case at all; inasmuch as nothing is more common than for foreigners to have wives here, natives of the country; an illustrious instance of which might be given.

With respect to the facts assumed by you, of the enlistment of men in this port, of which you mention Mr. Young as an evidence, suffice it to say, that from intimations I had received anterior to the date of your letter, I had determined to make the proper inquiries, and to be satisfied upon this point before those vessels are permitted to sail, and shall be governed by the result; although it does not appear altogether perfectly certain that such an augmentation of their force is interdicted by the act of Congress of the 3d of March last, which, being a law highly penal in its nature, will admit of no latitude of construction. Permit me to observe, "en passant," that this Mr. Young is by birth an Englishman, served several years in the British navy, several in ours, and, I suppose, has now an equal right, provided it be not done in a manner to violate the laws of the United States, to enter into the service of the Government calling itself the "United Provinces of the river Plate," or any other Government that will receive him.

With respect, also, to the vessel called the Altavela, asserted by you to be the very schooner formerly known by the name of the Romp, and tried for piracy, I proceed to remark, that this vessel furnishes a strong argument against you; for, after a full investigation of all the charges against her, supported, as I believe they were, by some of her own crew, she was acquitted, as well as the commander of her, Squire Fish, who had previously been an officer in the navy of the United States. The same remark will apply with equal force to her present commander, Captain Grennolds.

Upon the subject of the fact lastly stated by you, of the improvement in the equipment of this vessel at one of our wharves, I have to observe that, on the arrival here of these vessels, I had them examined, and an inventory of their armament, equipment, &c. taken; and before their departure I shall cause a re-survey to be made, with a view to ascertain whether they have undergone, in any respect, any alterations prohibited by the laws of the United States. I cannot agree with you, however, that a mere alteration of her copper, rendered necessary, perhaps, by some damages which I understand were sustained in the bottom of the vessel, can be considered as an improvement "in her equipment."

As for the merchandise which you "most solemnly lay claim to," in behalf of those whom you term the lawful owners, which you assert "there is no doubt of being stolen, or what, by way of softening the expression, are called prize goods," I can only say, that I neither officially nor individually have any claim to it whatsoever. It is only deposited in the public store for safe-keeping, to guard against injury, as in other cases, which might result to the revenue of the United States; and I see no reason, from any thing you have advanced, to change the opinion expressed in my last upon the subject. I know of no decisions, such as you speak of, in the federal courts, adjudging prize goods to be "stolen property, and ordering it to be restored to the rightful owners." If there be any such decisions, they only go to show that it is by such authority only, and not by any that I possess, that the articles in question can be detained or restored.

Having thus, sir, gone through the different topics presented by you for my consideration, I shall conclude by assuring you it did not require any thing you have pointed out to me to remind me of any duty which the circumstances of this case have rendered, or may render, it incumbent on me to perform.

I am, &c.

CHARLES K. MALLORY.

Don Antonio Argote Villalobos, His Catholic Majesty's Consul.

No. 6.

SIR: SPANISH CONSUL'S OFFICE, NORFOLK, April 15, 1817.

I have received the letter which, in answer to mine of the 12th instant, you did me the honor to address to me yesterday.

Without denying any of the facts, on the strength of which I requested your interposition to prevent two armed vessels now in this port, commanded and principally manned by citizens of the United States, from sallying forth to renew their depredations upon the commerce of Spain, you state that you do not see sufficient grounds for stopping those vessels, or the merchandise landed from them, and now in deposite in the public storehouse in this place.

I do not mean to enter, on the present occasion, into a minute discussion of the several reasons you assign for the line of conduct which you think proper to pursue in this case, because I think it sufficient for me to transmit copies of my correspondence with you to my Government, through the channel of the minister plenipotentiary of His Catholic Majesty in this country. Still, you will permit me to advert to that part of your argument, purporting that it is not so clearly proved that Chaytor's views on leaving Baltimore with the armed vessel under his command, were to cruise against the subjects of Spain under a commission from the pretended Government of the river Plate; upon which I will remark, that it is no longer necessary to form conjectures about the probable intentions of men, when facts and overt acts have already fully developed their evil purposes. Thus, whether James Chaytor, in going out of Baltimore with the armed vessels still under his command, had hostile views against the subjects of Spain, a nation in amity with this country, is sufficiently solved by the hostilities which he has already committed, and still intends to commit, in the same vessel, against the said subjects.

I must also be allowed to notice that part of your argument, "that, whatever may be the antiquated notions prevailing upon the subject in the old Governments of Europe, there is little doubt in this country about the question whether a citizen of the United States has a right to expatriate himself, and enter the service of a foreign Power not at war with his native country." In this you certainly appear to me to have set up a mere speculative opinion in opposition to a positive law, namely, the stipulations in the fourteenth article of the treaty with Spain, by which the United States have solemnly pledged themselves not to permit their citizens to accept commissions from any prince or state at war with Spain, for the purpose of cruising against her subjects, and to punish as pirates such of their said citizens as will act contrary to that stipulation.

With regard to the schooner Altavela, formerly the Romp, which vessel, you say, "furnishes a strong argument against me," because, although tried for piracy, she was not actually condemned, I cannot avoid remarking, that since the time when she escaped merited condemnation, and her commander and crew condign punishment, she has been out cruising with the armament and commission she took out from this country; (it is pretty well ascertained that she has never been at Buenos Ayres;) and that, in every respect, she is evidently a pirate, under the true meaning and intent of the said fourteenth article of the treaty with Spain; and that her said commander and crew are actually engaged in piratical pursuits, in which course it behooves the constituted authorities of this country to stop them when within their jurisdiction and completely in their power.

Nor can I forbear to observe, before I dismiss the subject, that the self-styled Government of the United Provinces of the river Plate will gain very little "in their struggle for independence" by commissioning such a gang of greedy freebooters, the scum of this and other countries, who, caring little for the fate of that deluded people, excite, by their voracious appetite for plunder, the indignation not only of the people of Spain, but of the honest and good of all other nations.

I will now conclude, sir, by repeating my solicitations and assertions contained in my letters of the 10th and 12th instant, and by solemnly protesting, in the name of my sovereign, against permitting a number of citizens, now within their jurisdiction, and under their control, to go out to cruise against the commerce of Spain, and to renew their hostilities against her subjects; and I do also protest against delivering back to them certain articles of merchandise, described by you in general terms in your letter of the 11th instant, which articles of merchandise are obviously taken from Spanish subjects, contrary to law, and especially contrary to the fourteenth article of said treaty with Spain, and which, from the tenor of the sixth and ninth articles of the same treaty, ought to be retained in behalf of the lawful owners.

I am, &c.

ANTONIO ARGOTE VILLALOBOS.

SIR: COLLECTOR'S OFFICE, NORFOLK, April 15, 1817.

I have been honored with your letter of to-day, in answer to mine of yesterday, and am perfectly pleased that our correspondence has issued in a determination on your part to transmit copies of it to your Government, through its minister in this country.

I have nothing further to add on my part, but assurances of the respect with which I am, &c.

CHARLES K. MALLORY.

Don ANTONIO ARGOTE VILLALOBOS, H. C. M. Consul, Norfolk.

Mr. Rush to the Chevalier de Onis.

SIR: DEPARTMENT OF STATE, April 22, 1817

By direction of the President, I have the honor to ask whether you have received instructions from your Government to conclude a treaty for the adjustment of all differences existing between the two nations, according to the expectation stated in your note to this Department of the 21st of February. If you have, I shall be happy to meet you for that purpose. If you have not, it is deemed improper to entertain discussions of the kind invited by your late notes. This Government, well acquainted with and faithful to its obligations, and respectful to the opinion of an impartial world, will continue to pursue a course in relation to the civil war between Spain and the Spanish provinces in America, imposed by the existing laws, and prescribed by a just regard to the rights and honor of the United States.

I have the honor to be, &c.

RICHARD RUSH.

Don Luis de Onis to the Acting Secretary of State.

SIR: WASHINGTON, April 23, 1817.

I have received your letter of yesterday's date, in which you are pleased to inform me, by order of the President, that, if I have received the instructions which I expected, to conclude a treaty for the arrangement of all the differences pending between the two nations, you are authorized to enter into that negotiation with me; but, if not, you consider it improper to entertain discussions on the subjects treated of in my last notes.

In reply to these points, I have to inform you, with respect to the first, that (my conjectures being confirmed) my instructions have been intercepted by the pirates which infest the seas, whereby their arrival is so much delayed. I have despatched my secretary, Don Luis Noeli, in order that, by informing His Majesty of this unexpected event, he may cause them to be renewed to me. As to what relates to the second point, I refer to what I stated to you in my letter of the 21st of February, that I would entirely conform to the wishes of the President, to wait the discussion of those points until the arrival of the instructions.

In the same note you have been pleased to add, in reply to the different notes which I have addressed to you on the subject of the armament of privateers in this country for the purpose of cruising against the subjects of the King, my master, that this Government, faithful to its obligations, and respectful to the opinion of the impartial world, will continue to pursue a course, in relation to the civil war between Spain and the Spanish provinces in America, imposed by the existing laws, and prescribed by a just regard to the rights and honor of the United States.

As all my notes have been directed to this single object, and as I have, in conformity to your intimations, given correspondent orders to His Majesty's consuls to require of the tribunals the execution of those same laws, there is nothing left for me to do but to transmit to His Majesty this new assurance of the President, and to continue on my part to inform this Government of every thing which may contribute to maintain unalterable the relations of friendship which exist between the two nations, until the arrival of the instructions which I have requested, and further to strengthen them by a treaty which may put an end to all pending discussions.

I have the honor, &c.

LUIS DE ONIS.

Don Luis de Onis to the Secretary of State.

SIR: PHILADELPHIA, September 2, 1817.

The viceroy of New Spain informs me, in several despatches which I have lately received, of the frequent cases which have occurred of American vessels, both merchantmen and armed ships, which, in running along the coasts of those parts of the dominions of His Catholic Majesty, enter their bays, roads, and harbors, sometimes for the purpose of exploring the country and examining the state of things there, and at others for that of assisting the rebels with provisions, arms, and warlike stores, and of landing adventurers and other dangerous persons, whose object is to join the insurgents. The viceroy states that the American Colonel Perry had joined the traitor Mina with five hundred men; and Savary, the commandant of the mulattoes, with another body, having gone from New Orleans to incorporate their force with that of Mina and Aury at Galvezton, a place within the Spanish dominions; that American vessels are continually sailing from New Orleans with supplies of arms, ammunition, and provisions, for those banditti; that the American schooner "Saeta," from New Orleans, entered the harbor of Tampico, under the pretence of stress of weather, but, without any manner of doubt, for the purpose of examining the country; and that the privateer or pirate "Jupiter" had captured two Spanish vessels off the bar of the Mississippi, very near to several American vessels, &c. The viceroy concludes by saying, that he cannot possibly think that so many acts of hostility and violation of the laws of nations and of the existing treaty can be permitted or tolerated by the Government of the United States; and that, being desirous to contribute on his part to the maintenance of the amicable relations subsisting between this Government and that of His Catholic Majesty, he had treated the American vessels and citizens, even in the cases of hostility and violation referred to, with unexampled kindness; but that now he left it to my zeal to endeavor to obtain of this Government effectual remedies against these excesses; that, in the mean time, he had given orders to the governors, commandants, and other officers, at the most suitable places within his viceroyalty, neither to admit nor tolerate any American vessel, or of any other foreign nation, without the requisite passport and license; and that he would exercise the rigor of the laws against those who should disturb the good order and tranquillity of the King's dominions.

In consequence, therefore, of this request of the viceroy, I add this reclamation to those which I have already had the honor to address to the President, through the medium of the Department committed to you, on similar cases, and in the name of the King, my master; and I trust that, on your laying the whole before his excellency, he will cause the most effectual measures to be adopted to prevent the continuation of these excesses, and to enforce the due observance of the general principles of the laws of nations, and of the treaty which governs between Spain and the United States.

I renew, &c. LUIS DE ONIS.

Don Luis de Onis to the Secretary of State.

SIR: PHILADELPHIA, September 19, 1817.

A complaint having been laid before His Catholic Majesty's Government, by a part of the crew of the Spanish polacre "Santa Maria," captured on her passage from Havana to Cadiz by the pirate called the "Patriota Mexicano," commanded by José Guillermo Estefanos, manned with citizens of these States, and covered by their flag, under which he chased and brought-to the said polacre, until, having ascertained her capture, he hoisted the insurgent flag. I have received the commands of the King, my master, to request of the President, through your medium, the most decisive measures for putting an end to the abuses practised in the ports of this Union, by arming privateers to cruise against the Spanish trade; thus prostituting the flag of the United States by these predatory acts, and trampling under foot, with unparalleled audacity, national rights and the existing treaty between Spain and these States.

I, therefore, now renew those urgent reclamations which, on former occasions, I have submitted to the President, through your Department, on this important point; and I trust that the numerous instances of these abuses and horrible depredations will induce his excellency to adopt energetic measures to restrain these excesses, which so deeply compromit the neutrality of the United States in the eyes of all nations, and are wholly repugnant to the friendship and good understanding happily subsisting between them and His Catholic Majesty.

I renew, &c. LUIS DE ONIS.

The Chevalier de Onis to the Secretary of State.

PHILADELPHIA, November 2, 1817.

SIR:

His Majesty's consul at New York has transmitted to me a copy of his correspondence with the United States attorney for that district, whereby he requests that, in conformity with the act of Congress of the 3d of March last, he would oblige a certain armed brigantine to give security, or cause her to be seized; the said vessel having arrived at that port from Norfolk, under the flag of Venezuela, and recruited men to increase her crew, in order to proceed afterwards to Amelia island, there to join the adventurer McGregor, and to co-operate in his nefarious plans against the possessions of my sovereign and against the Spanish trade.

I have the honor to enclose a copy of the said correspondence, on the contents of which I think it entirely superfluous to make any comment; leaving it to you, sir, to decide whether the solicitude of His Catholic Majesty's consul at New York has been in conformity with the laws and the above-mentioned act of Congress, and whether the attorney for that district will rightfully have conformed thereto, by his strict observance of them, in obliging the owner or captain of the said armed brigantine to give the requisite security that he will commit no hostilities against the subjects of His Catholic Majesty, and in preventing him from proceeding freely to sea to commit new depredations.

It is very disagreeable to me to have to repeat to you, sir, what, unfortunately, I have been several times under the necessity of submitting to the President, through the medium of your predecessors, namely, that the act of Congress of the 3d of March, 1817, has in nowise lessened the abuses by which the laws are evaded, and render entirely illusory the laudable purposes for which they were enacted. From the greater part of the ports of these States there frequently sail a considerable number of vessels, with the premeditated intention of attacking the Spanish commerce, which carry their armanent concealed in the hold. It rarely happens that they can be arrested, inasmuch as the collectors of the customs say that they have not at their disposition the naval force necessary to effect it; on the other hand, armed vessels, under the flag of the insurgents, enter into the ports of the Union, and not only supply themselves with all necessaries, but also considerably increase the means they already have of destroying the trade of Spain, as has recently been the case at New York, whereby the (so called) privateers of His Majesty's revolted provinces, which are in reality nothing more than pirates, manned by the scum of all countries, enjoy greater privileges than the vessels of independent Powers.

I request you, sir, to lay particularly before the President the case which now obliges me to trouble you, in order that his excellency, being made fully acquainted therewith, may be pleased to take such measures as are within his reach to cause the provisions of the laws of this republic to be carefully fulfilled, to preserve the observance of the neutrality with other Powers, and prevent the infraction of the treaty existing between the two nations; and thus avoid not only the serious evils that the said pirates cause to the subjects of His Catholic Majesty, but the increase of the difficulties which the two Governments are endeavoring to overcome, for the purpose of establishing their relations upon a more friendly and permanent footing.

I flatter myself that you will honor me with your answer; and, reiterating my respects, &c.

SIR:

CONSULATE OF SPAIN, NEW YORK, September 16, 1817.

Some days ago there arrived in the port of New York an armed brig proceeding from Norfolk, which, I have been very credibly informed, is a vessel pretending to have a commission from Venezuela, but whose object, in coming to this port, was to procure an additional supply of men wherewith to commit hostilities against the subjects and possessions of the King of Spain. A few days ago I presented to the collector of the port of New York an affidavit of a man named John Reilley, stating that he had been requested to enlist on board of a vessel, which was represented to him to be the privateer schooner Lively, bound to Amelia island, to join General McGregor, to invade the territories of His Catholic Majesty.

I am now informed that the brig above mentioned is the vessel alluded to, Reilley having either been mistaken in the name, or designedly deceived by the agents of the privateer. I now enclose the affidavit of John Finegan, by which you will perceive that the officers of the above brig (whose name is the Americana Libre, commanded by Captain Barnard) are enlisting, and have enlisted, men in this port to proceed against the Spanish possessions. I have caused application to be made to the collector, who doubts the extent of his authority in interfering with this vessel. Now, as there must be provisions in the laws and treaties of the United States vesting an authority in some of its officers to prevent the equipment of vessels and the enlistment of men in the United States to proceed against a foreign nation at peace with the United States, I make this application to you, most urgently requesting you to take whatever measures may be necessary immediately, in order to prevent the departure of the above vessel, at least until she shall give bonds that she will not commit hostilities against Spanish subjects. The vessel, it is said, will sail to-morrow morning.

Indeed, if an inquiry were instituted, I am induced to believe that the above brig would be found to be a pirate.

I have the honor, &c.

THOMAS STOUGHTON.

John Finegan, at present in the city of New York, being duly sworn, saith: That he was requested by a man, who is represented to be the commissary of the vessel next mentioned, to go out in the patriot brig now lying at the quarantine ground; that the destination of the said vessel is to fight against the Spaniards; that the deponent was told, that, on his arrival in the Spanish possessions, he was to join the land service of the patriots; that deponent knows of five persons who have been engaged in like manner, who are about to proceed on board said brig; that deponent was told, that, as soon as he gets on board, he will receive his advance; that officers are at present employed in the city of New York, in looking out for men, and endeavoring to enlist them to proceed in the said vessel.

SIR: CONSULATE OF SPAIN, NEW YORK, September 17, 1817.

I enclose the deposition of John Reilley, relating to the privateer brig, about which I yesterday had the honor to address you. You will perceive, by the affidavit, that officers belonging to that brig are openly employed in this city in recruiting and enlisting men to join with General McGregor, and invade the possessions of the King of Spain.

I need not remind you that, by the existing laws of the United States, these enlistments are unlawful, and that not only the vessel on board of which they are to embark is liable to seizure and forfeiture, but that the captain and the officers thereof, who are engaged in this business, are liable to a heavy fine and imprisonment. As these are flagrant violations of the laws of the United States, and calculated to produce serious injury to the property and to the possessions of His Majesty's subjects, I flatter myself that you will take, without delay, such steps as may be necessary to put a stop to these proceedings.

I have the honor, &c.

STATE OF NEW YORK, City of New York, ss:

John Reilley, at present of the city of New York, mariner, being duly sworn, saith: That some days ago, deponent was requested to embark on board of a vessel which was said to be lying at the Narrows, in the bay of New York, for the purpose of going to join General McGregor, and to fight against the Spaniards; that, after he arrived at Amelia island, he might either join the land service or the naval service; that deponent would be paid as soon as he got on board; that several persons were engaged in looking out for recruits to proceed upon the same service, and many men were spoken to for the purpose. Deponent was then informed that the vessel was the privateer schooner "Lively," but has since learned that it was a mistake, and that the vessel in question is the patriot brig "Americano Libre," Captain Barnard, which is lying at quarantine ground, and is armed with several large guns, and many men; that several persons, who are officers, captains, lieutenants, and so forth, are at present employed in recruiting men to join that service, and proceed in the said brig to Amelia; that many hands have already been bespoken, and are now waiting for money, which has been promised to them; that the offers made to them are to give them eight dollars a month, and clothing, together with ten or twelve dollars advance. Deponent supposes that the officers above mentioned were in treaty with about twenty persons, who were to go on board as soon as their advance was paid to them, and which the said officers told them would be during the course of the day; among the officers there is one who is called a general. That the above men were told, in deponent's presence, by the officers who were enlisting them, that they were principally wanted to join the land service against the royalists. And further the deponent saith not.

SIR: NEW YORK, September 17, 1817.

I have duly received your notes of yesterday evening and of this day, and have referred to the statutes providing for the punishment of the offences stated. It is not a case, from the evidence mentioned, that would justify the collector in detaining the vessel; the aggression is to be punished in the ordinary mode of prosecuting those who are guilty of misdemeanors. Oath is to be made of the facts by the complainant, who enters into a recognizance to appear and prosecute the offenders, before any process can issue. This oath being made, and recognizance taken, the judge of the circuit court will issue a warrant to apprehend the accused, and bring them before him, to be further dealt with according to law. When apprehended, it is the province of the attorney of the United States to conduct the prosecution to judgment. I have no authority to administer an oath, or to issue a warrant, nor have I the power to issue any process to arrest and detain the vessel in question, unless by the direction of an executive officer of the United States. By the reference you have furnished, the parties complained of are to be prosecuted either under the fourth section of the act of Congress passed on the 3d March, 1817, or under the second section of the act passed 5th June, 1794. By adverting to these statutes, it will be seen that the vessel is not liable to seizure for the act of any person enlisting himself to go on board, or for hiring or retaining another person to enlist. The punishment is personal to the offenders; and those who disclose the fact, on oath, within thirty days after enlisting, are protected from prosecution. The offenders are to be arrested and prosecuted in the manner I have stated. I beg you to be assured, sir, that it is not from a disposition either to shrink from the performance of my duty, or to decline interfering to defeat any illegal enterprise against the subjects or possessions of a Power with whom the United States are at peace, that I have stated to you the embarrassments I must encounter in attempting a compliance with your request upon any information with which I am furnished. If it is in your power to procure the names of the parties, and the evidence upon which a prosecution for a misdemeanor can be founded, I will readily co-operate with the proper authorities in having every offender arrested and brought to justice. It is impracticable for me, or any other officer of the United States, to take any legal measures against aggressors upon the indefinite statement of certain persons being concerned in an illegal transaction. Since the receipt of your notes, I have had an interview with the collector, and we are unable to discover any other legal course of proceeding in this case than that adopted in the ordinary cases of misdemeanor.

I have the honor to be, &c.

[Enclosed in Don Luis de Onis's letter of 2d November, 1817.]

SIR: CONSULATE OF SPAIN, NEW YORK, September 19, 1817.

I have the honor to acknowledge having received yesterday your letter dated the 17th instant, in reply to mine of the 16th and 17th, wherein you mention that the case whereof I informed you in those communications was not one which would justify the collector in detaining the vessel; that the aggression is to be punished in the ordinary mode of prosecuting those who are guilty of misdemeanors; that oath is to be made of the facts by the complainant, who enters into a recognizance to appear and prosecute the offenders before any process can issue; that this oath being made, and recognizance taken, the judge of the circuit court will issue a warrant to apprehend the accused and bring them before him, to be further dealt with according to law; and that, when apprehended, it is the province of the attorney of the United States to conduct the prosecution to judgment; that you have no authority to administer an oath or to issue a warrant, nor have you the power to issue any process to arrest and detain the vessel in question, unless by the direction of an executive officer of the United States.

In reply, permit me to request that you will take this subject again into your serious reflection. I do not urge it for the present occasion, because, even though you should upon consideration adopt a different opinion from that which you have communicated to me, it is now too late, since the vessel in question sailed from this port this morning. But, sir, can it be possible that the doctrine can be correct which you lay down in your letter, and which forms your reason for declining to proceed against the persons who were enlisting men in this city, with the open and avowed design of taking them in a privateer under the Venezuela flag to join with McGregor, and commit hostilities against the Spanish possessions? I furnished you with the affidavits of two persons stating the fact, and you will excuse me in saying that I cannot think the laws of the United States render it incumbent upon me to present myself before a judge of the circuit court, and enter into bonds to appear and prosecute the offenders. On the contrary, sir, the thirty-fifth section of the judiciary act imposes upon the attorney of the United States for each district the duty of prosecuting all delinquents for crimes and offences cognizable under the authority of the United States. I conceive, therefore, that as soon as the attorney of the United States receives information of the infraction of the laws, it becomes his duty to take such measures as may be necessary to bring the offenders to justice; he is the person who must take the witnesses before a judge or magistrate; he must become the informer; he must prosecute; that is, he must take, or cause to be taken, the steps which are necessary to arrest the offenders and bring them to punishment. I am the more confirmed in this belief, because the thirty-third section of the judiciary act directs that offenders may be imprisoned by a judge or magistrate, at the expense of the United States, and leaves it discretionary to the witnesses to appear and testify. That act does not require that the informer should enter into bonds to appear and prosecute. The offence of which I have complained is of a most serious nature. The United States should not afford means to one nation at peace with them to annoy and invade another nation also at peace with them. And it becomes the duty of all the officers of the United States, as they value the reputation and the interest of their country, to discharge with alacrity and zeal those duties assigned to them, which can preserve the neutrality of their country, and prevent its becoming the centre of reunion for the enemies of Spain, and to prevent their own citizens joining in measures of hostility and aggression. It is a matter of notoriety that the insurgent Governments of South America all have their agents in this country; that swarms of privateers are fitted out, armed, and equipped for war in the United States; and all the injuries and desolation committed by them upon the Spanish commerce emanate from the facilities which they find in the United States to prepare for themselves these outrages. And, sir, Congress having passed laws rendering these acts illegal, I cannot admit that individuals must undertake the task of informing against and prosecuting the offenders. These offences are against the dignity of the country; they affect the community at large. I cannot, therefore, bring myself to believe that it is the province of individuals to bind themselves to prosecute offenders, any more than I can think that it is the duty of an individual who gives information that a murder has been committed to enter into bonds to prosecute the murderer. No, sir; the laws must have confided this odious but necessary task to its public officers; they must see that offenders are brought to punishment; and, sir, I do further consider that this duty has by law been devolved upon you. Regretting, therefore, that this expedition has been permitted to proceed unmolested, notwithstanding the information which I communicated to you, you will excuse me if, on all future occasions of a similar nature, I should renew my application to you to prevent a new aggression.

I beg you to be assured, &c.

THOMAS STOUGHTON.

The Chevalier de Onis to the Secretary of State.

SIR: PHILADELPHIA, November 2, 1817.

I have just received a statement, dated the 14th of July, addressed to me by the directors of the Royal Philippine Company at Madrid, informing me of the unfortunate fate of two ships belonging to the said company, the one named "Nuestra Señora del Buen Suceso," alias "La Esperanza," and the other "El Triton," captured, the first on the 8th of June last, the day on which she sailed from Cadiz for Calcutta and Manilla, by the pretended insurgent privateers "La Independencia del Sud," commanded by James Chaytor, of 18 guns and one traversing 42-pounder; and the Mangore, under the orders of the same Chaytor, of 14 guns and one traversing 36-pounder; and the ship "Triton," from Calcutta and the coast of Coromandel, which was captured off the Cape de Verd islands, after a gallant defence of two hours and a half, in which she lost twenty killed, and sprung her foremast, by a privateer (of the same description as the two above mentioned) called the Regent, alias Trepacamara, commanded by one Manson, who, when seventeen days out from Baltimore, fell in with the "Triton," and conducted her as a prize to Buenos Ayres, where she arrived on the 2d of April last, according to the advices received by the underwriters at Lloyd's from their agent at Buenos Ayres.

The directors of the Royal Philippine Company, in giving me an account of these distressing events, inform me that they have understood, by the advices which I have given to the principal Secretary of State of the King, my master, that Captain James Chaytor, of the piratical vessel "La Independencia del Sud," kept depending a demand made at the instance of the Spanish consul at Norfolk, relative to the safe-keeping of certain Spanish property deposited in the custom-house of that port by the above-named pirate, and one called the "Altavela;" whence it is incontestably proven that the armament of "La Independencia del Sud" is made in the ports of these States, and that the captain, officers, and the greater part of her crew, are likewise subjects of the same States. From presumptive causes and circumstances, they suppose that the other privateer may be the "Regent," alias "Trepacamara," Captain Manson, which vessel sailed from Baltimore seventeen days previous to his capturing the "Triton."

I have repeatedly found myself under the painful necessity of representing to the President, through the medium of your predecessors, that the fourteenth article of the treaty between His Catholic Majesty and the United States establishes the most positive right of reclamation on the Government and those citizens who have taken or do take part in the numerous armaments of privateers which have taken place in the ports of this republic, under cover of the pretended commissions so profusely circulated by the insurgents of the revolted provinces of the King, my master, to attack openly and in a barefaced manner the subjects and commerce of Spain; and that the same article declares those to be pirates who engage in these horrid cruises, and consequently obliges the contracting parties to punish them as such, as a just atonement for their offences. On the 2d and 15th of January, and on the 29th of March last, I officially addressed your immediate predecessor, and remonstrated against the robberies and outrages committed by various privateers, and, among others, by those called "Independencia del Sud" and "Mangore," the captains of which, James Chaytor and Barnes, are citizens of these States. In the note transmitted to the Secretary on the 4th of March, [14th March,] I found myself under the necessity, in consideration of the excesses committed against the subjects of the King, my master, and of those which, through the impunity and toleration of some of the authorities of this country, were about to be repeated by vessels bought, armed, manned, and equipped in the ports of this republic, in violation of the laws of nations, of the express stipulations of an existing treaty, and of the rights of humanity; and in discharge of my duty, I was laid under the necessity, I say, of representing and remonstrating, in the name of my sovereign, on the subject of the injuries and losses which had already resulted, and might further result, to his subjects; and, at the same time, of protesting against the authors of the same. The capture of the ship "Esperanza" has been one of the fatal consequences of allowing the privateer "Independencia del Sud" to proceed freely to sea from Norfolk, after His Catholic Majesty's consul, Don Antonio Argote Villalobos, had made proof of the illegal conduct and atrocious acts of her captain, James Chaytor; and that of the ship "Triton" proceeds likewise from toleration granted in this country of arming and equipping against the trade of Spain; under which supposition, I cannot refrain from stating to you, in order that you may be pleased to communicate the same to the President, that the aforesaid Royal Company of the Philippines have an incontestable right to claim of this republic full compensation for the value of the said ships and cargoes, by reason of the armament of the privateers which captured them having been made in its ports.

I have the honor to enclose, for the suitable purposes, a note of the articles shipped on board the "Esperanza," at Calcutta and Manilla, for the account of the Royal Philippine Company, and of the return cargo of the "Triton," from Bengal and the coast of Coromandel to Cadiz; which sums united, amount, according to the invoice, to that of seven hundred and one thousand nine hundred and eighty dollars; to which is to be added an interest of fifteen per cent. on the disbursement of the amount of the cargo of the "Triton," for the period of one year and a half, and of six per cent. in Europe on the cargo of the "Esperanza."

I hope you will take into consideration the contents of this note, and be pleased to call the attention of the President to the interesting subject treated of in it, that His Catholic Majesty may adopt such measures as his wisdom may dictate to him, for the purpose of collecting, as far as it may be possible, any parts of the two prizes above named, for the benefit of their owners, and at the same time giving orders to the competent authorities in the ports of this republic to discover such effects as may arrive, making part of the same.

I therefore hope this from your established zeal, and the well-known rectitude of the President, deferring to my return to the seat of Government the verbal communication of a plan which I have meditated, from a desire to settle amicably an affair of such importance.

I avail myself, &c.

GREAT BRITAIN—NAVAL ARMAMENT ON THE LAKES.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, APRIL 6, 1818.

To the Senate of the United States: APRIL 6, 1818.

An arrangement having been made and concluded between this Government and that of Great Britain, with respect to the naval armament of the two Governments, respectively, on the lakes, I lay before the Senate a copy of the correspondence upon that subject, including the stipulations mutually agreed upon by the two parties. I submit it to the consideration of the Senate whether this is such an arrangement as the Executive is competent to enter into by the powers vested in it by the constitution, or is such a one as requires the advice and consent of the Senate, and, in the latter case, for their advice and consent, should it be approved.

JAMES MONROE.

Mr. Bagot, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary, to Mr. Monroe, Secretary of State.

WASHINGTON, July 26, 1816.

SIR:

Mr. Adams having intimated to His Majesty's Government that it was the wish of the Government of the United States that some understanding should be had, or agreement entered into, between the two countries, in regard to their naval armaments upon the lakes, which, while it tended to diminish the expenses of each country, might diminish also the chances of collision, and prevent any feelings of jealousy, I have the honor to acquaint you that I have received Lord Castlereagh's instructions to assure you that His Royal Highness the Prince Regent will cheerfully adopt, in the spirit of Mr. Adams's suggestion, any reasonable system which may contribute to the attainment of objects so desirable to both states.

Mr. Adams not having entered into any detailed explanation of the precise views of his Government for giving effect to the principle which he had offered for consideration, the British Government is unacquainted with the particular arrangements which the Government of the United States would propose to make for this purpose; but I have been instructed to assure you of the general disposition of His Royal Highness the Prince Regent to listen with satisfaction to any proposal which may secure such ends, and of his readiness to act in a spirit of the most entire confidence upon the principle which has been suggested by Mr. Adams.

I have the honor to be, with the highest consideration, sir, your most obedient, humble servant,

CHARLES BAGOT.

The Hon. JAMES MONROE, &c.

Mr. Monroe to Mr. Bagot.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, August 2, 1816.

I have had the honor to receive your letter of the 26th of July, by which you inform me that Mr. Adams had intimated to your Government the desire of the President to arrange, by compact, the naval force which should be retained on the lakes by both nations, with a view to lessen equally the expense of each, and likewise to guard against collision, but that he had not explained in sufficient detail the proposal which he had been authorized to make, to lead, at that time, to any practical result. You assure me that His Royal Highness the Prince Regent is well disposed to the object, and that, in concert with this Government, he is willing to adopt such measures as may be deemed expedient to give it effect.

The President, being satisfied that, if each nation should maintain on the lakes a large naval force, it would expose both to considerable and useless expense, while it would multiply the risks of collision between them, instructed Mr. Adams, shortly after the peace, to make the proposals which you mention, in the hope, from the amicable spirit in which it was conceived, and the advantage which it was believed both parties would derive from it, that it might be carried into immediate effect. It is very satisfactory to the President to find that your Government approves the principle on which the proposal is founded, and that His Royal Highness the Prince Regent is willing to act on it.

I infer from your letter that you are desirous of obtaining a precise project, either for the purpose of acting on it here immediately, in conformity with the powers already given you, or of transmitting it to your Government for its consideration. Whether it be for the one or the other purpose, I am instructed to afford all the facility that I may be able; though it would, undoubtedly, be more agreeable to the President that the arrangement should be made and executed with the least delay possible.

I have the honor now to state that the President is willing, in the spirit of the peace which so happily exists between the two nations, and until the proposed arrangement shall be cancelled, in the manner hereinafter suggested, to confine the naval force to be maintained on the lakes, on each side, to the following vessels: that is, on Lake Ontario, to one vessel not exceeding one hundred tons burden, and one eighteen-pound cannon; and on the upper lakes, to two vessels of like burden and force; and on the waters of Lake Champlain, to one vessel not exceeding the like burden and force; and that all other armed vessels on those lakes shall be forthwith dismantled; and, likewise, that neither party shall build or arm any other vessel on the shores of those lakes.

That the naval force thus retained by each party on the lakes shall be restricted in its duty to the protection of its revenue laws, the transportation of troops and goods, and to such other services as will in no respect interfere with the armed vessels of the other party.

That should either of the parties be of opinion, hereafter, that this arrangement did not accomplish the object intended by it, and be desirous of annulling it, and give notice thereof, it shall be void and of no effect after the expiration of ——— months from the date of such notice.

If this project corresponds with the views of your Government, and you are authorized to accede to it, under any modifications which you may propose, and in which we can agree, I am instructed to give it immediate effect, either by convention, the interchange of notes, or in any form which may be thought best adapted to the ends proposed. If, on the other hand, you consider it your duty to submit this project to your Government for consideration, and to wait its sanction before you can adopt it, and have power to make, ad interim, any provisional reciprocal arrangement, having the same objects in view, I shall be happy to digest with you such provisional arrangement, and to carry it reciprocally into effect, for such time, and in such manner, as may be agreed on; or, should your powers be adequate, I am ready to concur in an immediate suspension of any further construction or equipment of armed vessels for any of the waters above named.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JAMES MONROE.

The Right Hon. CHARLES BAGOT, &c.

Mr. Bagot to Mr. Monroe.

SIR:

WASHINGTON, August 6, 1816.

I have had the honor to receive your letter of the 2d instant, containing the project of an arrangement into which it is proposed that our respective Governments should enter, for the purpose of giving effect to the principle upon which I had the honor to acquaint you, in my letter of the 26th ultimo, that His Royal Highness the Prince Regent was willing to act in respect to the naval armaments upon the lakes.

The general coincidence of sentiment which exists between our Governments, in regard to entering into some arrangement upon this subject, gives reason to hope that the several parts of it will become matter of easy adjustment; but as, in the consideration of any precise proposition to this effect, reference must necessarily be had to various points connected with the internal administration of His Majesty's provinces, and to the naval assistance which the ordinary business of a peace establishment may require, I am not authorized to conclude, definitively, any agreement as to details, without previously submitting it to my Government.

I shall, therefore, immediately forward for consideration the proposal contained in your letter; but I shall, in the mean time, willingly take upon myself to give effect to any arrangement upon which we may mutually agree, for the purpose of suspending the further construction and equipment of armed vessels upon the lakes, and of generally abstaining from exertion in those quarters.

I have the honor to be, with the highest consideration, sir, your most obedient, humble servant,

CHARLES BAGOT.

Hon. JAMES MONROE, &c.

Mr. Monroe to Mr. Bagot.

SIR: DEPARTMENT OF STATE, August 12, 1816.

I have had the honor to receive your letter of the 6th of this month, by which you inform me that, although you have full confidence that an agreement will be finally entered into by our Governments to limit in a satisfactory manner the naval force to be maintained by them on the lakes, you consider it your duty to submit to your Government the project which I lately communicated to you to that effect, and to wait its orders, before you can proceed to make a definitive arrangement on the subject. You intimate, however, that you are willing to give effect to any arrangement on which we may agree, for suspending, in the mean time, the further construction and equipment of armed vessels on the lakes, and for abstaining from further exertion there.

To this delay no objection is entertained, provided such a provisional arrangement is made as may accomplish the just objects which our Governments have in view. This arrangement, however, like the other, should be equal. In the same spirit, therefore, I now propose the regulations stated in my former note to be adopted as a provisional arrangement. If your powers authorize, and you approve those regulations, on being assured that you will adopt a similar measure, an order will be immediately issued by this Government for carrying them fully into effect.

If your powers do not extend to this object, but are confined exclusively to the suspension of the further augmentation of the naval force on the lakes, I have then to observe, that, on receiving from you a statement of the force which your Government now has on the lakes, with an assurance that its further augmentation shall be suspended, an order will be immediately issued by this Government for confining the naval force of the United States there strictly within the same limit.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JAMES MONROE.

The Right Hon. CHARLES BAGOT, &c.

SIR: WASHINGTON, August 13, 1816.

I have had the honor to receive your letter of yesterday's date. For the same reasons which I have assigned in the letter which I had the honor to address to you on the 6th instant, I conceive that I am not authorized to make, even provisionally, any precise agreement as to the exact manner in which the respective naval forces upon the lakes shall be limited; as, in any such agreement, whether permanent or provisional, reference must equally be had to the arrangements of a peace establishment and the ordinary administration of His Majesty's provinces.

I am not in possession of a correct statement of His Majesty's naval force now in commission upon the lakes, but I will take the earliest means of procuring and communicating to you the most accurate information upon this point; and I can, in the mean time, give you the assurance that all further augmentation of it will be immediately suspended.

I have the honor to be, with the highest consideration,
Sir, your most obedient, humble servant,

CHARLES BAGOT.

The Hon. JAMES MONROE, &c.

The same to the same.

SIR: WASHINGTON, November 4, 1816.

In conformity with the arrangement made between us in our correspondence of the 12th and 13th August last, I have now the honor to enclose to you an account of the actual state of His Majesty's naval force upon the lakes; and to acquaint you that its further augmentation is suspended until the sentiments of His Majesty's Government upon the project contained in your note of the 5th [2d] of August (and which I have transmitted to Lord Castlereagh) are known.

I have the honor to be, with the highest consideration,
Sir, your most obedient, humble servant,

CHARLES BAGOT.

Prince Regent,	do.	60	do.	in commission, but unequipped, being merely used as a barrack or receiving ship, and the commander-in-chief's head-quarters.

Montreal, in commission, carrying 6 guns; used merely as a transport for the service of His Majesty.

Star, carrying 4 guns; used for current duties only, and unfit for actual service.

Netley, schooner, carrying no guns; attached for the most part to the surveyors, and conveying His Majesty's servants from port to port.

There are, besides the above, some row-boats, capable of carrying long guns; two 74 gun ships on the stocks, and one transport of four hundred tons, used for conveying His Majesty's stores from port to port.

ON LAKE ERIE.

Tecumseh and Newark, carrying 4 guns each; and Huron and Sauk, which can carry 1 gun each. These vessels are used principally to convey His Majesty's servants and stores from port to port.

ON LAKE HURON.

The Confiance and Surprise schooners, which may carry 1 gun each, and are used for purposes of transport only.

ON LAKE CHAMPLAIN.

Twelve gun-boats; ten of which are laid up in ordinary, and the other two (one of which mounts 4 guns, and the other 3 guns) used as guard-boats. Besides the above, there are some small row-boats, which are laid up as unfit for service.

Keel, stem, and stern-post of a frigate laid down at the Isle aux Noix.

Captain of His Majesty's ship Prince Regent, and senior officer.

Mr. Monroe to Mr. Bagot.

SIR: DEPARTMENT OF STATE, November 7, 1816.

I have received and laid before the President your letter of the 4th instant, in which you do me the honor to give me an account of the actual state of His Britannic Majesty's naval force on the lakes, with an assurance that its further augmentation is suspended until the sentiments of your Government upon the project contained in my note of the 5th [2d] August are known.

As this proceeding is in conformity to one of the propositions heretofore made by me, I have now the honor to enclose to you an account of the actual state of the naval force of the United States on the lakes, and to assure you that orders will be immediately given by this Government to prevent any augmentation of it beyond the limit of the British naval force on those waters.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JAMES MONROE.

The same to the same.

SIR: DEPARTMENT OF STATE, November 8, 1816.

I have the honor to inform you that the orders alluded to in my letter of yesterday's date, in relation to the naval force on the lakes, have been given by this Department.

I am, &c. JAMES MONROE.

Mr. Bagot to Mr. Monroe.

SIR: NOVEMBER 8, 1816.

In the statement of the American naval force upon the lakes, which I yesterday morning received from you, at your office, in exchange for a similar statement at the same time delivered to you of the naval force of His Majesty, I observe that no return is made of any force upon the upper lakes.

I shall be much obliged to you if you will have the goodness to acquaint me whether the force upon those lakes is comprehended in the return of that upon Lake Erie.

I have the honor to be, with the highest consideration,
Sir, your most obedient, humble servant,

CHARLES BAGOT.

The Hon. JAMES MONROE, &c.

Mr. Monroe to Mr. Bagot.

SIR; NOVEMBER 8, 1816.

I hasten to inform you, in reply to your letter of this date, that the naval force of the United States upon the upper lakes is comprehended in the return of that upon Lake Erie, which I gave to you yesterday.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JAMES MONROE.

Mr. Bagot to Mr. Rush, acting Secretary of State.

WASHINGTON, April 28, 1817.

The undersigned, His Britannic Majesty's envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary, has the honor to acquaint Mr. Rush that, having laid before His Majesty's Government the correspondence which passed last year between the Secretary of the Department of State and the undersigned, upon the subject of a proposal to reduce the naval force of the respective countries upon the American lakes, he has received the commands of His Royal Highness the Prince Regent to acquaint the Government of the United States that His Royal Highness is willing to accede to the proposition made to the undersigned by the Secretary of the Department of State, in his note of the 2d of August last.

His Royal Highness, acting in the name and on the behalf of His Majesty, agrees that the naval force to be maintained upon the American lakes by His Majesty and the Government of the United States shall henceforth be confined to the following vessels on each side; that is:

On Lake Ontario, to one vessel, not exceeding one hundred tons burden, and armed with one eighteen-pound cannon.

On the upper lakes, to two vessels, not exceeding like burden each, and armed with like force.

On the waters of Lake Champlain, to one vessel, not exceeding like burden, and armed with like force.

And His Royal Highness agrees, that all other armed vessels on these lakes shall be forthwith dismantled, and that no other vessels of war shall be there built or armed.

His Royal Highness further agrees, that, if either party should hereafter be desirous of annulling this stipulation, and should give notice to that effect to the other party, it shall cease to be binding after the expiration of six months from the date of such notice.

The undersigned has it in command from His Royal Highness the Prince Regent to acquaint the American Government that His Royal Highness has issued orders to His Majesty's officers on the lakes, directing that the naval force so to be limited shall be restricted to such services as will in no respect interfere with the proper duties of the armed vessels of the other party.

The undersigned has the honor to renew to Mr. Rush the assurances of his highest consideration.

CHARLES BAGOT.

Mr. Rush to Mr. Bagot.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, April 29, 1817.

The undersigned, acting Secretary of State, has the honor to acknowledge the receipt of Mr. Bagot's note of the 28th of this month, informing him that, having laid before the Government of His Britannic Majesty the correspondence which passed last year between the Secretary of State and himself, upon the subject of a proposal to reduce the naval force of the two countries upon the American lakes, he had received the commands of His Royal Highness the Prince Regent to inform this Government that His Royal Highness was willing to accede to the proposition made by the Secretary of State in his note of the 2d of August last.

The undersigned has the honor to express to Mr. Bagot the satisfaction which the President feels at His Royal Highness the Prince Regent having acceded to the proposition of this Government as contained in the note alluded to; and, in further answer to Mr. Bagot's note, the undersigned, by direction of the President, has the honor to state that this Government, cherishing the same sentiments expressed in the note of the 2d of August, agrees that the naval force to be maintained upon the lakes by the United States and Great Britain shall henceforth be confined to the following vessels on each side; that is:

On Lake Ontario, to one vessel, not exceeding one hundred tons burden, and armed with one eighteen-pound cannon.

On the upper lakes, to two vessels, not exceeding the like burden each, and armed with like force; and

On the waters of Lake Champlain, to one vessel, not exceeding like burden, and armed with like force.

And it agrees that all other armed vessels on these lakes shall be forthwith dismantled, and that no other vessels of war shall be there built or armed.

And it further agrees that, if either party should hereafter be desirous of annulling this stipulation, and should give notice to that effect to the other party, it shall cease to be binding after the expiration of six months from the date of such notice.

The undersigned is also directed by the President to state, that proper orders will be forthwith issued by this Government to restrict the naval force thus limited to such services as will in no respect interfere with the proper duties of the armed vessels of the other party.

The undersigned eagerly avails himself of this opportunity to tender to Mr. Bagot the assurances of his distinguished consideration and respect.

RICHARD RUSH.

Mr. Rush to Mr. Crowninshield, the Secretary of the Navy.

SIR: DEPARTMENT OF STATE, April 30, 1817.

I have the honor to enclose to you, herewith, the copy of a letter, dated yesterday, embracing the terms of a stipulation which has been entered into with the British Government relative to the reduction of the naval force upon the lakes, and to request, in conformity with the President's desire, that you will be so good as to issue such orders as may be necessary for giving all the contemplated effect to the stipulation in question.

I am, &c.

RICHARD RUSH.

Mr. Crowninshield, Secretary of the Navy, to Captain D. S. Dexter, commanding naval officer of the United States, Erie, Pennsylvania.

SIR: NAVY DEPARTMENT, May 2, 1817.

Conformably to stipulations which have been recently entered into between this Government and that of Great Britain, it is agreed that the naval force to be maintained on the upper lakes, viz: Erie, Huron, &c., shall henceforth be confined to two vessels on each side, neither of which to exceed one hundred tons in burden, nor mount more than one eighteen pounder. The schooners Porcupine and Ghent, the former armed with an eighteen pounder and the latter with a twelve or eighteen pounder, will be retained for occasional service upon the upper lakes; in the performance of which you will be particularly careful not to interfere in any respect with the proper duties of the British armed vessels.

For your information and government, I enclose to you, herewith, an extract copied from the stipulations.

I am, very respectfully, &c.

B. W. CROWNINSHIELD.

Captain D. S. DEXTER, Commanding Naval Officer, Erie, Penn.

The Secretary of the Navy to Captain Woolsey.

SIR: NAVY DEPARTMENT, May 2, 1817.

Conformably to stipulations which have been recently entered into between this Government and that of Great Britain, it is agreed that the naval force to be maintained on Lake Ontario shall henceforth be confined to one vessel on each side, not exceeding one hundred tons burden, and mounting not more than one eighteen-pounder. The schooner Lady of the Lake, armed with one eighteen pounder, will be retained on Lake Ontario for occasional service; in the performance of which you will be particularly careful not to interfere in any respect with the proper duties of the British armed vessel.

For your information and government, I enclose to you, herewith, an extract copied from the stipulations.

I am, very respectfully, &c.

B. W. CROWNINSHIELD.

Captain M. T. WOOLSEY, Commanding Naval Officer, Sackett's Harbor.

The Secretary of the Navy to Captain Leonard.

SIR: NAVY DEPARTMENT, May 2, 1817.

Conformably to stipulations which have been recently entered into between this Government and that of Great Britain, it is agreed that the naval force to be maintained on Lake Champlain shall henceforth be confined to one vessel on each side, not exceeding one hundred tons burden, and mounting not more than one eighteen pounder. The galley Allen, with an armament of one twelve or eighteen pounder, will be retained for occasional service upon Lake Champlain; in the performance of which you will be particularly careful not to interfere in any respect with the proper duties of the British armed vessel.

For your information and government, I enclose to you, herewith, an extract copied from the stipulations.

I am, very respectfully, &c.

B. W. CROWNINSHIELD.

Captain JAMES T. LEONARD, Commanding Naval Officer, Whitehall, N. Y.

[This arrangement having been approved by the President, the following proclamation was issued.]

BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

A PROCLAMATION.

Whereas an arrangement was entered into at the city of Washington, in the month of April, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventeen, between Richard Rush, Esq., at that time acting as Secretary for the Department of State of the United States, for and in behalf of the Government of the United States, and the right honorable Charles Bagot, His Britannic Majesty's envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary, for and in behalf of His Britannic Majesty; which arrangement is in the words following, to wit:

"The naval force to be maintained upon the American lakes, by His Majesty and the Government of the United States, shall henceforth be confined to the following vessels on each side, that is—

"On Lake Ontario, to one vessel, not exceeding one hundred tons burden, and armed with one eighteen-pound cannon.

"On the upper lakes, to two vessels, not exceeding like burden each, and armed with like force.

"On the waters of Lake Champlain, to one vessel, not exceeding like burden, and armed with like force.

"All other armed vessels on these lakes shall be forthwith dismantled, and no other vessels of war shall be there built or armed.

"If either party should be hereafter desirous of annulling this stipulation, and should give notice to that effect to the other party, it shall cease to be binding after the expiration of six months from the date of such notice.

"The naval force so to be limited shall be restricted to such services as will in no respect interfere with the proper duties of the armed vessels of the other party."

And whereas the Senate of the United States have approved of the said arrangement, and recommended that it should be carried into effect; the same having also received the sanction of His Royal Highness the Prince Regent, acting in the name and on the behalf of His Britannic Majesty:

Now, therefore, I, James Monroe, President of the United States, do, by this my proclamation, make known and declare that the arrangement aforesaid, and every stipulation thereof, has been duly entered into, concluded, and confirmed, and is of full force and effect.

Given under my hand, at the city of Washington, this twenty-eighth day of April, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and eighteen, and of the independence of the United States the forty-second.

JAMES MONROE.

By the President:

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, Secretary of State.

15th CONGRESS.] No. 302. [1st SESSION.

SPAIN—IMPRISONMENT OF CITIZENS OF THE UNITED STATES.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, APRIL 15, 1818.

To the House of Representatives of the United States: APRIL 15, 1818.

In compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 10th instant, relative to the capture and imprisonment of certain persons, citizens of the United States, therein specifically mentioned, I now transmit a report from the Secretary of State, which, with the documents accompanying it, embrace the objects contemplated by the said resolution.

JAMES MONROE.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, April 13, 1818.

The Secretary of State, to whom was referred the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 10th inst. requesting information relative to the capture and imprisonment, at Santa Fé, in Mexico, of Auguste Pierre Chouteau, Julius Demun, and their company, Robert McKnight, James Baird, and their company, likewise J. Farro, citizens of the United States, has the honor of submitting to the President copies of the papers in this Department concerning the subject of that resolution, in relation to McKnight, Baird, and their company. He transmits, at the same time, the original papers which contain the information relative to the place where Chouteau, Demun, and their company were captured, requested by the resolution of the House.

1. Deposition of Baptisti Ficio and others, taken 25th September, 1817, before F. M. Guyolo, a justice of the peace in the Missouri Territory.
2. Depositions of Toussaint Charbonneau and Michel Carriere.
3. Letter from Julius Demun to the Governor of the Missouri Territory, enclosing a draught of a map, showing the spot where he (Demun) and his company were taken.
4. Statements marked A, B, C, and D, of expenditures by Chouteau and Demun.

There is at the Department no information relative to the capture or imprisonment of J. Farro.

It is desirable that the original papers, after being communicated to the House, should, if they think proper, be returned to this Department.

All which is respectfully submitted.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

SIR: DEPARTMENT OF STATE, February 8, 1817.

As you have intimated a willingness to interpose your good offices in behalf of the unfortunate persons to whom the enclosed papers relate, I deem it unnecessary to do more than request your early attention to the subject.

If you could, in addition to your application to the Viceroy of Mexico, address one to the local authorities at Santa Fé, the relatives of the unfortunate captives would undertake to have it forwarded across the country from St. Louis, provided you would give the passport necessary for the protection of the messenger. This appears to me the best method of effecting an early release of the captives, and I take the liberty to recommend it accordingly.

I have the honor to be, &c.

The CHEVALIER DE ONIS. JAMES MONROE.

Don Luis de Onis to the Secretary of State.

SIR: WASHINGTON, February 13, 1817.

I have had the honor to receive your note of the 8th instant, with several enclosures, relating to certain individuals detained in the province of Santa Fé, on the ground of their having entered the Spanish territory without being furnished with the necessary passports.

In conformity to what I before stated to you, I shall transmit these documents to the Viceroy of Mexico, and specially recommend this business to his attention, with a request to exert his authority to cause these persons to be immediately liberated, provided there appear no sufficient reason to the contrary.

With respect to the passport requested by you, to enable the families of the parties so detained to send a messenger by land, and apply immediately to the local authorities of Santa Fé, I am sorry to say it is not in my power to grant it; His Majesty having, under the existing circumstances, reserved to himself the right of issuing passports, through the medium, exclusively, of his principal Secretary of State, for the admission and passage of any individual whatsoever into his colonial territories; but, with a view to facilitate, as far as depends on me, this application to the viceroy, I now do myself the honor to enclose a duplicate of my letter to that officer, to enable you to avail yourself of one of the frequent opportunities which now offer directly for Vera Cruz, in consequence of the opening of that port for the vessels of all friendly nations taking provisions thither.

I renew to you, &c. LUIS DE ONIS.

Hon. JOHN Q. ADAMS.

SIR: WASHINGTON CITY, December 29, 1817.

In 1811 or 1812, Robert McKnight, Benjamin Shrive, James Baird, Alfred Allen, Michael McDonough, William Mines, Samuel Chambers, Peter Baum, Thomas Cook, and one —— Miers, as their interpreter, and probably some others whose names I do not know, all citizens of the United States, of the Missouri Territory, went up the Missouri river, and from thence into the Spanish provinces; they were arrested and imprisoned by the authorities of that country, at Santa Fé, and from then till now have been detained from returning to their families and their homes. Last winter I laid this subject before the Secretary of State, and he procured from the Spanish minister something like an order (the minister not feeling authorized to give more) for their release, (triplicates;) one was stated to have been sent directly to the viceroy, another was said to have been sent on for the royal signature, and the third was given to me, with a view of having it sent directly on from St. Louis, by some gentlemen who were expected to go shortly through, but who did not go. The paper thus obtained did not amount to a passport to protect any person who would bear the same; and the consequence was, no person would venture to be the bearer of it, when they also ran the risk of being immersed with those they went to relieve; and it is presumed, from the delay, either that the orders have never reached the viceroy, or have been disregarded. I understood, even if the copy of the order destined directly to reach the viceroy did arrive, that it did not amount to positive orders for their release, but recommended it, and that they should be furnished with the means of returning home; and, should this fail, the one sent for the royal signature at all events would procure their release.

I hope you will take up this subject; and if an order for their discharge can be obtained, together with a passport, they have friends (and some of them brothers) at St. Louis, who would go or send instantly to their assistance.

If deemed proper by you, I should be glad to know the result as early as possible.

I have the honor to be, &c.

Hon. J. Q. ADAMS. JOHN SCOTT.

The Secretary of State to Don Luis de Onis, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary from Spain.

SIR: DEPARTMENT OF STATE, WASHINGTON, January 7, 1818.

I have the honor to enclose a copy of a letter received at this Department from the Delegate in Congress of the Missouri Territory, and to request information of you whether you have received any advices showing the effect of the applications suggested in the letter to have been transmitted by you, in behalf of the persons stated to have been imprisoned at Santa Fé; and, if you have not, I am directed by the President to ask of you a renewed application for the release of these citizens of the United States; and, if that is obtained, a passport or safe-conduct for any friend or relation of the prisoners to go to Santa Fé, for the purpose of furnishing them the means of returning to their country.

Be pleased, sir, to accept, &c.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

Don Luis de Onis to the Secretary of State.

SIR: WASHINGTON, January 12, 1818.

In answer to your very esteemed note of the 7th of this month, enclosing a letter from the Delegate of the Missouri Territory, I have to assure you of my great regret in not being able to communicate to you positive information of the result or effect of the application which I made on the 13th of February last, to the Viceroy of New Spain, in behalf of Mr. James Baird, Mr. McKnight, and other individuals arrested by the Spanish authorities, on the ground of their having entered the territory of New Mexico, on their way from St. Louis to the capital, without being furnished with the necessary passports.

On the same date I made a representation of this case to His Catholic Majesty's Government, and I requested both His Majesty and the Viceroy of New Spain to be pleased to take into consideration the innocence or good faith of the parties in question, by permitting and facilitating their return to St. Louis, or other point on the frontier most convenient to them.

I have yet received no answer either from my court or from Mexico, which is doubtless to be attributed to accidental circumstances, such as the miscarriage of letters, and others of the like nature, which frequently happen. But, being anxious to comply with your wishes, and render a service to the above-mentioned individuals, I shall renew my application and request to the viceroy of New Spain, and again make a communication on this subject to my sovereign. I am sorry, however, to inform you, that it is not within my province to grant the passport wished for Santa Fé, in New Mexico, as it is only His Catholic Majesty's principal Secretary of State who has authority to issue passports of that nature.

In consequence of which, I enclose a duplicate open letter for the Viceroy of Mexico, which may be transmitted by the parties interested, by way of Havana, to some merchant or other person there, to be by them forwarded and properly recommended to Vera Cruz, for the purpose of obtaining a speedy answer and ascertaining the result, which I flatter myself will be completely satisfactory, provided nothing has occurred in the case repugnant to the laws of the monarchy, and those particularly regulating the affairs of the Indies.

I shall forward a triplicate and quadruplicate of the same letter to the viceroy, it not being in my power to do more.

I avail myself of this occasion to renew, &c.

LUIS DE ONIS.

Don Luis de Onis to Don Ruiz de Apodaca, Viceroy of the kingdom of New Spain.

MOST EXCELLENT SIR: WASHINGTON, January 12, 1818.

On the 13th of February, of the last year, I had the honor to inform your excellency that the Secretary of State of this republic had addressed to me a note, requesting me to employ my good offices with your excellency in behalf of a Mr. James Baird, who, together with the persons named McKnight, Mercer, Server, Allen, Brown alias Baum, McDonough, and others, had been arrested and imprisoned at Santa Fé, having been found within the territory of New Mexico without passports. I then stated to your excellency, that it was alleged by the families of the above-mentioned citizens of these States, that their error proceeded from their ignorance of our laws for the administration of the Indies, that is, those which prohibit an entrance into the country to all foreigners, and that their object in going to Santa Fé was purely and simply commercial; in consideration of which, I could not do less than recommend to your excellency to give due attention to the request of the said Secretary, by ordering the requisite inquiries to be made, and the persons so detained to be liberated, provided there appeared no sufficient reasons to the contrary, that they might immediately return to their families.

As I have yet received no answer from your excellency on this subject, and the Secretary of State has addressed to me another note, on the 7th instant, enclosing a copy of a statement of the deputy of the Missouri Territory, to which the parties in question belong, and requesting me to communicate to him the result of my recommendation to your excellency in behalf of the sufferers, I think it my duty to renew it to you, as I now do in the most particular manner, in the hope that your excellency will give immediate orders that, with an especial preference to this matter, the necessary inquiries be made into the case of James Baird and other American citizens confined at Santa Fé, and that, in consideration of the length of time since their arrest and separation from their distressed families, and of their unintentional error, your excellency will be pleased to mitigate as far as possible the punishment they may have incurred, by granting them permission and the requisite facilities to return to the Missouri Territory, or other part of the American territory most suited to their convenience.

I doubt not that your excellency will pay due attention to this request, and communicate to me the result with all possible despatch, that I may give the necessary information to this Government.

In the mean time, I renew, &c.

LUIS DE ONIS.

Statement and proof in case of Chouteau and Demun, of their loss and treatment by the Spaniards.

UNITED STATES, TERRITORY OF MISSOURI, County of St. Louis, sct:

The undersigned, having been first duly sworn on the holy evangelists, severally depose and say: that, in the beginning of September, 1815, they were engaged by Auguste P. Chouteau and Co. at St. Louis, in the Territory of Missouri, for a trading expedition with the Indians of the head waters of the rivers Arkansas and Platte. The party, conducted by the said Auguste P. Chouteau, proceeded to their grounds on the head waters of the Arkansas, and continued the trade until the spring of 1817; at which time our encampment was visited by a guard of Spaniards, two hundred or more in number, the commanding officer of which guard was the bearer of an order from the Governor of New Mexico to conduct our whole party to Santa Fé. This order was executed.

Auguste P. Chouteau, together with the whole party, consisting of twenty-one persons, accompanied the troop or guard, and, on their arrival at Santa Fé, were reviewed by the Governor, and immediately put into close confinement. At the time of the arrest of our persons within the limits of the United States, Mr. Chouteau, conscious, no doubt, that he had violated none of the Spanish regulations, took with him a part of his property to defray expenses; none of which he was permitted to retain, to exchange, or to make any use of. Not only that, but also the whole stock of the company cached or concealed in the ground near our camp, east of the mountains, and on the head waters of the Arkansas, was seized by the Spaniards under special order from the Governor, and taken to Santa Fé. We remained in prison (some of us in irons) forty-eight days, during which time we were dieted in a very coarse and meager manner, with boiled corn or beans, without salt.

When we speak of the review and confinement of the party, we mean the men generally; for Mr. Chouteau and the conductors of our trade preceded us, and arrived first at Santa Fé. We know not the particulars of their reception or treatment, except that, when they were liberated, (after forty-eight days,) their property was not restored to them.

Long previously to our arrest, Mr. Chouteau had equipped several parties for different parts of the upper country; all, as we constantly understood, within the acknowledged limits of the United States. Of the fate of these detached parties we know nothing. Our arrest and detention in the Spanish province interrupted that correspondence on which their success must, in a great degree, have depended. As well as we recollect, Mr. Chouteau's party, on leaving St. Louis, amounted to forty-six.

St. Louis, November 25, 1817.

Sir:

Having to relate to your excellency the unfortunate event which has thrown me, Mr. Auguste P. Chouteau, and twenty-four men, for forty-eight days, in the dungeons of Santa Fé, and which, by depriving us of every thing we possessed, has brought us to the brink of ruin, I must beg your excellency's indulgence if I take too much of your time. But I think myself bound to give a detailed account of what has happened; the more so, as your excellency's right of granting us a license to go to the head waters of Arkansas and Platte rivers was denied by the Governor of New Mexico, Don Pedro Maria de Allaude.

In the month of September, 1815, Mr. A. P. Chouteau and myself fitted out an expedition to go to the head waters of Arkansas river, to trade with the Aarapahos, and other Indians living thereabout; and, having obtained a license from your excellency, we started from this place on the 10th of same month, in company with Mr. Philibert, a trader, who had gone to the mountains the year before, and who had come back to get a supply of goods to enable him to buy horses to bring in his furs.

It being late in the season, we had great difficulties to encounter; some of our horses giving out every day, we had to walk more than one-half of the way to the mountains, where we arrived on the 8th of December.

On our way we had bought of Mr. Philibert his furs, goods, horses, &c., and the time of his men. These we expected to find at the fork called by the Spaniards El Haerfano, and denominated on Pike's map the Third Fork, where Philibert had given them rendezvous; but in this we were disappointed. After our researches were over, we met some Indians, who told us that the men, not seeing Philibert return about the appointed time, and being destitute of every thing necessary to support themselves, had gone over to the Spaniards. We had then no alternative. We determined that I should go in quest of them; and I started in the beginning of January, 1816.

I arrived at Taos, where I found the men, who had been received with the greatest hospitality, and allowed to pass the winter there. I went on to Santa Fé, to explain to the Governor the reasons of my coming into the country. As soon as I alighted in the capital I was presented to the then Governor, Don Alberto Maynez, who at first expressed his surprise to see me; but no sooner had I told him the circumstances under which I came than he treated me very politely.

Don Alberto is an old gentleman of good information, who possesses, in a great degree, the good manners and politeness peculiar to his nation.

Having seen on my way to Santa Fé that the rivers abounded with beaver, I asked the Governor the permission of coming, with a fixed number of hunters, to catch beaver in the rivers which empty themselves into Rio del Norte. This he could not take upon himself to grant, but had the goodness to write on that subject to the commandant general. As I could not wait for the answer, Don Alberto told me to come back, when convenient, to know the general's answer. I must not omit to say that the Governor did not seem a moment to doubt that we had a right to frequent the east side of the mountains, and there to trade or catch beaver if we could; for he advised me not to go to the south of Red river of Natchitoches, but from that river to the northward we might trade and hunt as we pleased.

I returned to Taos, from whence I started, with all our engagees and two Spaniards the Governor had ordered to accompany us, to the Rio della Trinehera; from thence, in three days, we reached Mr. Chouteau's camp at the mouth of the Third Fork. Finding ourselves with more men than we expected at our departure from St. Louis, and not having a necessary equipment, it was necessary for one of us to come back. I started on the 27th February with Philibert and one of our men, and did not reach this place but after forty-six days' journey, through barren prairies, which, at that season, did not afford any pastures for our horses, having sometimes to travel in the night to avoid the Panis' war parties we had the good fortune to discover in the day time. I bought the goods and engaged men for a new expedition, and, having taken another license, started on the 15th July to go by water to the Kansas river, where Mr. Chouteau and I had appointed to meet. On his way from the mountains Mr. Chouteau was attacked by the Pawnees, about two hundred in number, had one man killed and three wounded; five Pawnees remained on the spot, and a great many wounded.

At the Kansas river we found ourselves forty-five. We shipped the furs to St. Louis, and started again for the mountains. There we met a party of Spanish traders, who told us that the Yutas and Apaches Indians were hovering in this quarter; and as those Indians had already killed two of Philibert's men, our return would not have been safe had our party gone to any distance, so that we agreed that Chouteau should wait for me at the pass called by the Spaniards La Sangre de Christo, or thereabout. Myself and two men went in company with the Spanish traders to the Rio de la Culevra, where we left them, and continued our way to Taos. When I arrived at Rio Colorado (a small fork of Rio del Norte) I found that a new village had been established since my first passing there. I alighted at the house of the commandant of the place, who told me that I could not go further till he had given notice to the alcade of Taos, and received his orders. I waited patiently that night and next day. On the second night, at about 12 o'clock, arrived a party of forty men, commanded by Don Mariano Penne, with verbal orders that I must go back with him to my men, and that the Governor would not allow me to go to Santa Fé. I answered that I was ready and willing to follow him, but wished to write to his excellency; to which he consented.

In my letter I explained the object of my coming—that it was by the orders and with the consent of his predecessor, and begged of him to permit me to go to Santa Fé, in order to know precisely what to depend on. This appeared to me the more necessary, as Don Mariano had not brought any written orders.

My letter being despatched, we started from Rio Colorado to go and rejoin our party. Mr. Chouteau was not at Sangre de Christo, but we traced him up the Rio del Norte, near where it enters into the mountains. Here Don Mariano, after spending one day with us, took leave. At his departure, he told us that we should remain there, or rather go lower down the river, to wait for the Governor's answer.

I do not know what caused the delay, but it was not until about twenty days after that I received a letter from the Governor, saying that the commandant general would not permit us any time to stay in the Spanish dominions, and to go out of them immediately. I wrote to the alcade of Taos that I had just received the Governor's orders, and, in compliance with them, we were recrossing the mountains; that, when on the east side of them, we should remain all winter; that we gave this notice, having no bad intentions, nor any motives to conceal our movements

Receiving no answer, we took it for granted that, being on this side of the mountains, we gave the Spaniards no uneasiness. We had almost every week some traders from the upper villages, of whom we bought several horses, bread, flour, &c.

We had fixed on the 15th of March, 1817, for the day of our departure, to go in search of the Crow Indians, whom we knew to be somewhere about the head waters of the Columbia; but as the Spanish traders, during the winter, repeatedly told us that the Governor had written to the commandant general, in order to obtain permission to hunt on the rivers running west of the mountains, we did not think proper to abandon a subject so interesting to us. For that purpose, I went to Taos in March; there I was told that there were very unfavorable reports. It was said that at the first fork of the Arkansas (Rio de las Animas) we had built a fort; that we had there twenty thousand men, with many cannons and ammunition, and other such idle tales; that a party of two hundred men had been raised to go and investigate the truth of all those absurd reports. The alcade having to write to the Governor, I wished him to say that I felt very satisfied to have come under such circumstances; that I proposed to remain as a hostage till the truth should be known; and that my life would answer for the good behavior and pacific occupation of our party. Two days after, the two hundred men commanded by Lieutenant Don Francisco Salagar, of the militia, and Sergeant Manuel Vaca, of the regulars, arrived at Taos. They intimated their orders, which were to take me back to my party, visit all the places where we had encamped from the mountains to the Rio de las Animas, and to dig out all the goods we had put in the ground for security, having no use for them in the winter. We started from Taos, and a few days after reached this side of the mountains, where we were soon joined by Mr. Chouteau, to whom we had sent an express. We took out of the ground all the goods and furs, &c. we had hidden in different places. This being done, Sergeant M. Vaca told us that the Governor had further ordered that the whole of our party must go to visit with them our former encampments, as low down as Rio de las Animas; that, if no fort was found, he would leave us there, to get to St. Louis as well as we could. To this we could not consent, for it would have carried us to an inevitable destruction, it being the time when the Pawnees were lurking for prey in all directions about Arkansas river; besides, we should have lost the benefit of our spring trade. We proposed to the sergeant that I should go with him to the Rio de las Animas; that Mr. Chouteau would remain where we then were, with a party that he (the sergeant) would leave to guard him; and that at our return we would go away in a northern direction. Both commanders agreed to this proposition. I started with a party of fifty men to search the so-much-talked-of fort, which, it is needless to say, could not be found. Every thing was in order, and a good understanding existed between our people and the Spaniards when we returned. Next day we parted, and were accompanied some distance by the lieutenant, sergeant, and a few men. Much delay having taken place by the coming of the Spaniards, it was now impossible for us to proceed to the head waters of the Columbia by the route we had at first intended to go, which was by following the foot of the mountains, up the Rio del Almagre, and then turn to the west. Though we knew the road to be good, we could not undertake it for want of time, therefore we resolved to enter the mountains on the north side of Arkansas river. We passed the first chain with great ease, but we were no sooner on the other side than we foresaw all the difficulties we had to encounter. We had before us a chain of snow-capped mountains much higher than the one we left behind. The cold was intense, and the recital of hardships would renew the sufferings we underwent. After three days of steady labor through the snow, in order to cut a route, we had the mortification to retrace our way back. Perceiving that nothing advantageous could be performed that season, it was agreed that seventeen men, with the most reduced horses, should go down the river Platte, and there wait for Chouteau, who was determined to remain one year longer. Both he and I, with the balance of our men, (except five Shawnee Indians, who had left us several days before,) came on this side of the first chain of mountains, to take the goods we had put into the ground at the entrance of the mountains, and myself to take the furs and return to St. Louis, which was fixed on the 23d of May.

In the night a very heavy rain commenced, which continued all day on the 23d, and prevented my starting. At about two o'clock P. M., one corporal and four soldiers came to us; they said that a large party was behind, and would come up to us next day. On the 24th Sergeant Mariano Vernal came up with his party, and informed us his orders were to take us all to Santa Fé. (Afterwards we were told he had instructions to take us alive or dead.) We secured again our goods in the earth, and were escorted to New Mexico. When on our way there, Sergeant Vernal, as it was reported, sent a detachment of his men back to steal our property, of which we never heard any thing until three days previous to our leaving Santa Fé, while the Governor made a kind of an inventory of the same. When we got to the Rio de la Culevra, Chouteau, myself, and one of our hands, under an escort of ten men, took the advance, and on the 1st of June arrived at Santa Fé. I was first introduced to the Governor, who inquired, in a very angry manner, why I had not obeyed him, when ordered to go out of the Spanish domains? I replied, his orders were obeyed as soon as received; that we were taken on the American territory, where our Governor had given us a license to go. At this he got in a violent rage, saying that we should pay for our own and our Governor's ignorance; using all the time very abusive language; repeating several times that he would have our brains blown up; that we were fortunate he had not come himself, for he would not have taken us alive.

Mr. Chouteau told me, since, that he experienced the same treatment, and was likewise confined in a dungeon and in irons.

On the 7th of the same month, the lieutenant, Don José Maria de Arce, came in to give the welcome intelligence that the Governor had ordered my irons should be taken off. After forty-four days' imprisonment, we were presented before a court-martial, composed of six members and a president, who was the Governor himself. Only one of the six members appeared to have some information, the others not knowing even how to sign their names. Many questions were asked, but more particularly why we had staid so long in the Spanish dominions? I answered, that, being on the waters of the Arkansas river, we did not consider ourselves in the domains of Spain, as we had a license to go as far as the head waters of said river. The president denied that our Government had a right to grant such a license, and entered into such a rage that it prevented his speaking, contenting himself with striking his fist several times on the table, saying, gentlemen, we must have this man shot. At such conduct of the president I did not think much of my life, for all the other members were terrified in his presence, and unwilling to resist him; on the contrary, do any thing to please him. He (the president) talked much of a big river that was the boundary line between the two countries, but did not know its name. When mention was made of the Mississippi, he jumped up, saying, that that was the big river he meant; that Spain had never ceded the west side of it. It may be easy to judge of our feelings, to see our lives in the hands of such a man. That day the court did not come to any determination, because the president (as I heard himself say to Lieutenant de Arce) had forgot every thing he had to say. Next day we were again presented to the court, but, as I knew then what kind of a man I had to deal with, I never attempted to justify myself of his false assertions. We were dismissed, and Mr. Chouteau and myself put in the same room.

Half an hour afterwards, the lieutenant came in with a written sentence; we were forced to kneel down to hear the citure of it, and forced likewise to kiss the unjust and iniquitous sentence that deprived harmless and inoffensive men of all they possessed—of the fruits of two years' labor and perils.

What appears the more extraordinary is, that the Governor acknowledged to me afterwards, and in the presence of Don Pedro Pino, the deputy of New Mexico to the Cortes, and several others, that we were very innocent men; yet, notwithstanding this, all our property was kept, and we permitted to come home, each with one of the worst horses we had.

I have already taken too much of your time in narrating our journey. Many incidents are probably unnecessary, but, by relating facts as they really are, I thought you would sympathize with our sufferings. Our actual loss amounts to $30,380 74½. The benefits which we had a probable, indeed a most assured, confidence to reap from our labors, would no doubt have fully compensated us. It remains now to know whether our Government will demand satisfaction of the King of Spain for outrages committed by his ignorant Governor on American citizens. Our accounts have been forwarded to the Honorable I. Scott, our Delegate; and we hope that your excellency will assist our case with the zeal and generosity so congenial with your feelings of justice.

I remain, &c.

JULIUS DEMUN.

No. 303.

HANSEATIC CITIES—REPEAL OF DUTIES.

PROCLAMATION MADE AUGUST 1, 1818.

BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

A PROCLAMATION.

Whereas, by an act of Congress of the United States of the 3d of March, 1815, so much of the several acts imposing duties on the ships and vessels, and on goods, wares, and merchandise imported into the United States, as imposed a discriminating duty of tonnage between foreign vessels and vessels of the United States, and between goods imported into the United States in foreign vessels and vessels of the United States, were repealed, so far as the same respected the produce or manufacture of the nation to which such foreign ship or vessel might belong; such repeal to take effect in favor of any foreign nation, whenever the President of the United States should be satisfied that the discriminating or countervailing duties of such foreign nation, so far as they operate to the disadvantage of the United States, have been abolished:

And whereas satisfactory proof has been received by me, from the burgomasters and senators of the free and Hanseatic city of Hamburgh, that, from and after the 13th day of November, 1815, all discriminating or countervailing duties of the said city, so far as they operated to the disadvantage of the United States, have been and are abolished:

Now, therefore, I, James Monroe, President of the United States of America, do hereby declare and proclaim, that so much of the several acts imposing duties on the tonnage of ships and vessels, and on goods, wares, and merchandise imported into the United States, as imposed a discriminating duty of tonnage between vessels of the free and Hanseatic city of Hamburgh and vessels of the United States, and between goods imported into the United States in vessels of Hamburgh and vessels of the United States, are repealed, so far as the same respect the produce or manufacture of the said free Hanseatic city of Hamburgh.

Given under my hand, at the city of Washington, this first day of August, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and eighteen, and the forty-third year of the independence of the United States.

JAMES MONROE.

By the President:

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, Secretary of State.

15th CONGRESS.] No. 304. [2d SESSION.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE AT THE COMMENCEMENT OF THE SESSION.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, NOVEMBER 17, 1818.

Fellow-citizens of the Senate and of the House of Representatives: NOVEMBER 16, 1818.

The auspicious circumstances under which you will commence the duties of the present session will lighten the burden inseparable from the high trust committed to you. The fruits of the earth have been unusually abundant; commerce has flourished; the revenue has exceeded the most favorable anticipation; and peace and amity are preserved with foreign nations on conditions just and honorable to our country. For these inestimable blessings we cannot but be grateful to that Providence which watches over the destinies of nations.

As the term limited for the operation of the commercial convention with Great Britain will expire early in the month of July next, and it was deemed important that there should be no interval during which that portion of our commerce which was provided for by that convention should not be regulated, either by arrangement between the two Governments, or by the authority of Congress, the minister of the United States at London was instructed, early in the last summer, to invite the attention of the British Government to the subject, with a view to that object. He was instructed to propose, also, that the negotiation which it was wished to open might extend to the general commerce of the two countries, and to every other interest and unsettled difference between them, particularly those relating to impressment, the fisheries, and boundaries, in the hope that an arrangement might be made, on principles of reciprocal advantage, which might comprehend and provide in a satisfactory manner for all these high concerns. I have the satisfaction to state that the proposal was received by the British Government in the spirit which prompted it, and that a negotiation has been opened at London embracing all these objects. On full consideration of the great extent and magnitude of the trust, it was thought proper to commit it to not less than two of our distinguished citizens, and, in consequence, the envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the United States at Paris has been associated with our envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary at London; to both of whom corresponding instructions have been given, and they are now engaged in the discharge of its duties. It is proper to add, that, to prevent any inconvenience resulting from the delay incident to a negotiation on so many important subjects, it was agreed, before entering on it, that the existing convention should be continued for a term not less than eight years.

Our relations with Spain remain nearly in the state in which they were at the close of the last session. The convention of 1802, providing for the adjustment of a certain portion of the claims of our citizens for injuries sustained by spoliation, and so long suspended by the Spanish Government, has at length been ratified by it; but no arrangement has yet been made for the payment of another portion of like claims, not less extensive or well-founded, or for other classes of claims, or for the settlement of boundaries. These subjects have again been brought under consideration in both countries, but no agreement has been entered into respecting them. In the mean time, events have occurred which clearly prove the ill effect of the policy which that Government has so long pursued on the friendly relations of the two countries, which, it is presumed, it is at least of as much importance to Spain as to the United States to maintain. A state of things has existed in the Floridas, the tendency of which has been obvious to all who have paid the slightest attention to the progress of affairs in that quarter. Throughout the whole of those provinces to which the Spanish title extends, the Government of Spain has scarcely been felt. Its authority has been confined almost exclusively to the walls of Pensacola and St. Augustine, within which only small garrisons have been maintained. Adventurers from every country, fugitives from justice, and absconding slaves have found an asylum there. Several tribes of Indians, strong in the number of their warriors, remarkable for their ferocity, and whose settlements extend to our limits, inhabit those provinces. These different hordes of people, connected together, disregarding, on the one side, the authority of Spain, and protected, on the other, by an imaginary line which separates Florida from the United States, have violated our laws prohibiting the introduction of slaves, have practised various frauds on our revenue, and committed every kind of outrage on our peaceable citizens, which their proximity to us enabled them to perpetrate. The invasion of Amelia island last year, by a small band of adventurers, not exceeding one hundred and fifty in number, who wrested it from the inconsiderable Spanish force stationed there, and held it several months, during which a single feeble effort only was made to recover it, which failed, clearly proves how completely extinct the Spanish authority had become; as the conduct of those adventurers, while in possession of the island, as distinctly shows the pernicious purposes for which their combination had been formed.

This country had, in fact, become the theatre of every species of lawless adventure. With little population of its own, the Spanish authority almost extinct, and the colonial Governments in a state of revolution, having no pretension to it, and sufficiently employed in their own concerns, it was in a great measure derelict, and the object of cupidity to every adventurer. A system of bucaneering was rapidly organizing over it, which menaced, in its consequences, the lawful commerce of every nation, and particularly of the United States, while it presented a temptation to every people, on whose seduction its success principally depended. In regard to the United States, the pernicious effect of this unlawful combination was not confined to the ocean. The Indian tribes have constituted the effective force in Florida; with these tribes, these adventures had formed, at an early period, a connexion, with a view to avail themselves of that force to promote their own projects of accumulation and aggrandizement. It is to the interference of some of these adventurers, in misrepresenting the claims and titles of the Indians to land, and in practising on their savage propensities, that the Seminole war is principally to be traced. Men who thus connect themselves with savage communities, and stimulate them to war, which is always attended, on their part, with acts of barbarity the most shocking, deserve to be viewed in a worse light than the savages. They would certainly have no claim to an immunity from the punishment which, according to the rules of warfare practised by the savages, might justly be inflicted on the savages themselves.

If the embarrassments of Spain prevented her from making an indemnity to our citizens for so long a time, from her treasury, for their losses by spoilation and otherwise, it was always in her power to have provided it, by the cession of this territory. Of this, her Government has been repeatedly apprized; and the cession was the more to have been anticipated, as Spain must have known that, in ceding it, she would, in effect, cede what had become of little value to her, and would likewise relieve herself from the important obligation secured by the treaty of 1795, and all other compromitments respecting it. If the United States, from consideration of these embarrassments, declined pressing their claims in a spirit of hostility, the motive ought at least to have been duly appreciated by the Government of Spain. It is well known to her Government that other Powers have made to the United States an indemnity for like losses sustained by their citizens at the same epoch.

There is, nevertheless, a limit, beyond which this spirit of amity and forbearance can in no instance be justified. If it was proper to rely on amicable negotiation for an indemnity for losses, it would not have been so to have permitted the inability of Spain to fulfil her engagements, and to sustain her authority in the Floridas, to be perverted by foreign adventurers and savages to purposes so destructive to the lives of our fellow-citizens and the highest interests of the United States. The right of self-defence never ceases. It is among the most sacred, and alike necessary to nations and to individuals. And, whether the attack be made by Spain herself, or by those who abuse her power, its obligation is not the less strong. The invaders of Amelia island had assumed a popular and respected title, under which they might approach and wound us. As their object was distinctly seen, and the duty imposed on the Executive, by an existing law, was profoundly felt, that mask was not permitted to protect them. It was thought incumbent on the United States to suppress the establishment, and it was accordingly done. The combination in Florida for the unlawful purposes stated, the acts perpetrated by that combination, and, above all, the incitement of the Indians to massacre our fellow-citizens, of every age, and of both sexes, merited a like treatment, and received it. In pursuing these savages to an imaginary line, in the woods, it would have been the height of folly to have suffered that line to protect them. Had that been done, the war could never cease. Even if the territory had been exclusively that of Spain, and her power complete over it, we had a right, by the law of nations, to follow the enemy on it, and to subdue him there. But the territory belonged, in a certain sense, at least, to the savage enemy who inhabited it; the power of Spain had ceased to exist over it; and protection was sought, under her title, by those who had committed on our citizens hostilities, which she was bound by treaty to have prevented, but had not the power to prevent. To have stopped at that line would have given new encouragement to these savages, and new vigor to the whole combination existing there, in the prosecution of all its pernicious purposes.

In suppressing the establishment at Amelia island, no unfriendliness was manifested towards Spain, because the post was taken from a force which had wrested it from her. The measure, it is true, was not adopted in concert with the Spanish Government, or those in authority under it; because, in transactions connected with the war in which Spain and the colonies are engaged, it was thought proper, in doing justice to the United States, to maintain a strict impartiality towards both the belligerent parties, without consulting or acting in concert with either. It gives me pleasure to state, that the Governments of Buenos Ayres and Venezuela, whose names were assumed, have explicitly disclaimed all participation in those measures, and even the knowledge of them, until communicated by this Government; and have also expressed their satisfaction that a course of proceedings had been suppressed, which, if justly imputable to them, would dishonor their cause.

In authorizing Major General Jackson to enter Florida, in pursuit of the Seminoles, care was taken not to encroach on the rights of Spain. I regret to have to add, that, in executing this order, facts were disclosed, respecting the conduct of the officers of Spain in authority there, in encouraging the war, furnishing munitions of war and other supplies to carry it on, and in other acts not less marked, which evinced their participation in the hostile purposes of that combination, and justified the confidence with which it inspired the savages, that by those officers they would be protected. A conduct so incompatible with the friendly relations existing between the two countries, particularly with the positive obligation of the fifth article of the treaty of 1795, by which Spain was bound to restrain, even by force, those savages from acts of hostility against the United States, could not fail to excite surprise. The commanding general was convinced that he should fail in his object, that he should in effect accomplish nothing, if he did not deprive those savages of the resource on which they had calculated, and of the protection on which they had relied in making the war. As all the documents relating to this occurrence will be laid before Congress, it is not necessary to enter into further detail respecting it.

Although the reasons which induced Major General Jackson to take these posts were duly appreciated, there was, nevertheless, no hesitation in deciding on the course which it became the Government to pursue. As there was reason to believe that the commanders of these posts had violated their instructions, there was no disposition to impute to their Government a conduct so unprovoked and hostile. An order was, in consequence, issued to the general in command there to deliver the posts—Pensacola, unconditionally, to any person duly authorized to receive it; and St. Mark's, which is in the heart of the Indian country, on the arrival of a competent force to defend it against those savages and their associates.

In entering Florida to suppress this combination, no idea was entertained of hostility to Spain; and, however justifiable the commanding general was, in consequence of the misconduct of the Spanish officers, in entering St. Mark's and Pensacola, to terminate it, by proving to the savages and their associates that they should not be protected even there, yet, the amicable relations existing between the United States and Spain could not be altered by that act alone. By ordering the restitution of the posts, those relations were preserved. To a change of them, the power of the Executive is deemed incompetent. It is vested in Congress only.

By this measure, so promptly taken, due respect was shown to the Government of Spain. The misconduct of her officers has not been imputed to her. She was enabled to review, with candor, her relations with the United States, and her own situation, particularly in respect to the territory in question, with the dangers inseparable from it; and, regarding the losses we have sustained, for which indemnity has been so long withheld, and the injuries we have suffered through that territory, and her means of redress, she was likewise enabled to take, with honor, the course best calculated to do justice to the United States, and to promote her own welfare.

Copies of the instructions to the commanding general; of his correspondence with the Secretary of War, explaining his motives, and justifying his conduct, with a copy of the proceedings of the courts-martial in the trial of Arbuthnot and Ambrister; and of the correspondence between the Secretary of State and the minister plenipotentiary of Spain near this Government, and of the minister plenipotentiary of the United States at Madrid with the Government of Spain, will be laid before Congress.

The civil war which has so long prevailed between Spain and the provinces in South America still continues, without any prospect of its speedy termination. The information respecting the condition of those countries, which has been collected by the commissioners recently returned from thence, will be laid before Congress, in copies of their reports, with such other information as has been received from other agents of the United States.

It appears, from these communications, that the Government of Buenos Ayres declared itself independent in July, 1816, having previously exercised the power of an independent Government, though in the name of the King of Spain, from the year 1810; that the Banda Oriental, Entre Rios, and Paraguay, with the city of Santa Fé, all of which are also independent, are unconnected with the present Government of Buenos Ayres; that Chili has declared itself independent, and is closely connected with Buenos Ayres; that Venezuela has also declared itself independent, and now maintains the conflict with various success; and that the remaining parts of South America, except Montevideo, and such other portions of the eastern bank of the La Plata as are held by Portugal, are still in the possession of Spain, or, in a certain degree, under her influence.

By a circular note, addressed by the ministers of Spain to the allied Powers with whom they are respectively accredited, it appears that the allies have undertaken to mediate between Spain and the South American provinces, and that the manner and extent of their interposition would be settled by a congress which was to have met at Aix-la-Chapelle in September last. From the general policy and course of proceeding observed by the allied Powers in regard to this contest, it is inferred that they will confine their interposition to the expression of their sentiments; abstaining from the application of force. I state this impression, that force will not be applied, with the greater satisfaction, because it is a course more consistent with justice, and likewise authorizes a hope that the calamities of the war will be confined to the parties only, and will be of shorter duration.

From the view taken of this subject, founded on all the information that we have been able to obtain, there is good cause to be satisfied with the course heretofore pursued by the United States in regard to this contest, and to conclude that it is proper to adhere it, especially in the present state of affairs.

I have great satisfaction in stating that our relations with France, Russia, and other Powers, continue on the most friendly basis.

In our domestic concerns we have ample cause of satisfaction. The receipts into the treasury during the first three quarters of the year have exceeded seventeen millions of dollars.

After satisfying all the demands which have been made under existing appropriations, including the final extinction of the old six per cent. stock, and the redemption of a moiety of the Louisiana debt, it is estimated that there will remain in the treasury on the 1st day of January next more than two millions of dollars.

It is ascertained that the gross revenue which has accrued from the customs during the same period amounts to twenty-one millions of dollars, and that the revenue of the whole year may be estimated at not less than twenty-six millions. The sale of the public lands during the year has also greatly exceeded, both in quantity and price, that of any former year; and there is just reason to expect a progressive improvement in that source of revenue.

It is gratifying to know, that, although the annual expenditure has been increased by the act of the last session of Congress, providing for revolutionary pensions, to an amount about equal to the proceeds of the internal duties which were then repealed, the revenue for the ensuing year will be proportionably augmented, and that, whilst the public expenditure will probably remain stationary, each successive year will add to the national resources, by the ordinary increase of our population, and by the gradual development of our latent sources of national prosperity.

The strict execution of the revenue laws, resulting principally from the salutary provisions of the act of the 20th of April last, amending the several collection laws, has, it is presumed, secured to domestic manufactures all the relief that can be derived from the duties which have been imposed upon foreign merchandise for their protection. Under the influence of this relief, several branches of this important national interest have assumed greater activity; and, although it is hoped that others will gradually revive, and ultimately triumph over every obstacle, yet the expediency of granting further protection is submitted to your consideration.

The measures of defence authorized by existing laws have been pursued with a zeal and activity due to so important an object, and with all the despatch practicable in so extensive and great an undertaking. The survey of our maritime and inland frontiers has been continued; and, at the points where it was decided to erect fortifications, the work has been commenced, and, in some instances, considerable progress has been made. In compliance with resolutions of the last session, the board of commissioners were directed to examine, in a particular manner, the parts of the coast therein designated, and to report their opinion of the most suitable sites for two naval depots. This work is in a train of execution. The opinion of the board on this subject, with a plan of all the works necessary to a general system of defence, so far as it has been formed, will be laid before Congress in a report from the proper department, as soon as it can be prepared.

In conformity with the appropriations of the last session, treaties have been formed with the Quapaw tribe of Indians inhabiting the country on the Arkansas, and with the Great and Little Osages north of the White river; with the tribes in the State of Indiana, with the several tribes within the State of Ohio and the Michigan Territory, and with the Chickasaws; by which very extensive cessions of territory have been made to the United States. Negotiations are now depending with the tribes in the Illinois Territory, and with the Choctaws, by which it is expected that other extensive cessions will be made. I take great interest in stating that the cessions already made, which are considered so important to the United States, have been obtained on conditions very satisfactory to the Indians.

With a view to the security of our inland frontiers, it has been thought expedient to establish strong posts at the mouth of the Yellow Stone river, and at the Mandan village on the Missouri, and at the mouth of St. Peter's on the Mississippi, at no great distance from our northern boundaries. It can hardly be presumed, while such posts are maintained in the rear of the Indian tribes, that they will venture to attack our peaceable inhabitants. A strong hope is entertained that this measure will likewise be productive of much good to the tribes themselves, especially in promoting the great object of their civilization. Experience has clearly demonstrated, that independent savage communities cannot long exist within the limits of a civilized population. The progress of the latter has, almost invariably, terminated in the extinction of the former, especially of the tribes belonging to our portion of this hemisphere, among whom loftiness of sentiment and gallantry in action have been conspicuous. To civilize them, and even to prevent their extinction, it seems to be indispensable that their independence as communities should cease, and that the control of the United States over them should be complete and undisputed. The hunter state will then be more easily abandoned, and recourse will be had to the acquisition and culture of land, and to other pursuits tending to dissolve the ties which connect them together as a savage community, and to give a new character to every individual. I present this subject to the consideration of Congress, on the presumption that it may be found expedient and practicable to adopt some benevolent provisions, having these objects in view, relative to the tribes within our settlements.

It has been necessary, during the present year, to maintain a strong naval force in the Mediterranean and in the Gulf of Mexico, and to send some public ships along the southern coast, and to the Pacific ocean. By these means, amicable relations with the Barbary Powers have been preserved, our commerce has been protected, and our rights respected. The augmentation of our navy is advancing with a steady progress towards the limit contemplated by law.

I communicate, with great satisfaction, the accession of another State, Illinois, to our Union; because I perceive, from the proof afforded by the additions already made, the regular progress and sure consummation of a policy, of which history affords no example, and of which the good effect cannot be too highly estimated. By extending our Government on the principles of our constitution over the vast territory within our limits, on the lakes and the Mississippi, and its numerous streams, new life and vigor are infused into every part of our system. By increasing the number of the States, the confidence of the State Governments in their own security is increased, and their jealousy of the National Government proportionally diminished. The impracticability of one consolidated Government for this great and growing nation will be more apparent, and will be universally admitted. Incapable of exercising local authority, except for general purposes, the General Government will no longer be dreaded. In those cases of a local nature, and for all the great purposes for which it was instituted, its authority will be cherished. Each Government will acquire new force and a greater freedom of action within its proper sphere. Other inestimable advantages will follow; our produce will be augmented to an incalculable amount, in articles of the greatest value for domestic use and foreign commerce. Our navigation will in like degree be increased; and as the shipping of the Atlantic States will be employed in the transportation of the vast produce of the western country, even those parts of the United States which are most remote from each other will be further bound together by the strongest ties which mutual interest can create.

The situation of this District, it is thought, requires the attention of Congress. By the constitution, the power of legislation is exclusively vested in the Congress of the United States. In the exercise of this power, in which the people have no participation, Congress legislate in all cases directly on the local concerns of the District. As this is a departure, for a special purpose, from the general principles of our system, it may merit consideration whether an arrangement better adapted to the principles of our Government, and to the particular interests of the people, may not be devised, which will neither infringe the constitution, nor affect the object which the provision in question was intended to secure. The growing population, already considerable, and the increasing business of the District, which it is believed already interferes with the deliberations of Congress on great national concerns, furnish additional motives for recommending this subject for your consideration.

When we view the great blessings with which our country has been favored, those which we now enjoy, and the means which we possess of handing them down unimpaired to our latest posterity, our attention is irresistibly drawn to the source from whence they flow. Let us, then, unite in offering our most grateful acknowledgments for these blessings to the Divine Author of all good.

SOUTH AMERICA—CONDITION OF.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, NOVEMBER 17 AND DECEMBER 15, 1818.

Mr. Rodney to the Secretary of State.

Sir: Washington, November 5, 1818.

I have the honor to present the report herewith enclosed, agreeably to the desire of Mr. Graham, who, on reflection, preferred submitting some additional remarks in a separate paper. For this purpose, two of the documents referred to in the report remain in his possession—Dr. Funes's Outline of Events in the United Provinces since the Revolution, and the Manifesto of Independence by the Congress at Tucuman.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, your most obedient servant,

C. A. RODNEY.

Hon. John Q. Adams, Secretary of State.

Mr. Rodney to the Secretary of State.

Sir:

I have now the honor to submit to your consideration my report on the subject of the late mission to South America, embracing the information derived from the various sources within my power, so far as I had an opportunity of improving the advantages possessed.

With the history of the conquest of the Spanish possessions in America you must be familiar. They were principally, if not exclusively, achieved by private adventurers. When completed, a most oppressive system of government, or rather despotism, was established by the parent country.

These extensive regions were originally swayed by two viceroys. The dominions of Spain in North America were under the government of the Viceroy of Mexico, and all her possessions in South America were subject to the control of the Viceroy of Peru.

The remoteness of some parts of the country from the residence of the Viceroy of Lima occasioned, in 1718, the establishment of another viceroyalty at Santa Fé de Bogota, in the kingdom of New Granada. In 1731 New Granada was divided, and a number of the provinces composing that kingdom were separated from it. These were put under the jurisdiction of a captain general and president, whose seat of government was at Caraccas.

In 1568 Chili was erected into a separate captain generalship; in 1778 a new viceroyalty was established at Buenos Ayres, comprehending all the Spanish possessions to the east of the Western Cordilleras, and to the south of the river Maranon.

This immense empire seems, according to the laws of the Indies, to have been considered a distinct kingdom of itself, though united to Spain and annexed to the crown of Castile. In this light it is viewed by Baron Humboldt, in his Essay on New Spain.

With some slight shades of difference in the regulations established in these Governments, the prominent features of their political institutions exhibit a striking resemblance, as the general system was the same.

Their commerce was confined to the parent country and to Spanish vessels exclusively. They were prohibited, under the penalty of death, to trade with foreigners. The natives of Old Spain composed the body of their merchants. Though this part of the system had, previously to the revolution, been relaxed, in some degree, (particularly by the statute of free commerce, as it is styled,) the relief was partial, and the restrictions continued severe and oppressive.

All access to the Spanish settlements was closed to foreigners, and even the inhabitants of the different provinces were prohibited from intercourse with one another, unless under the strictest regulations.

The various manufactures that might interfere with those of Spain were not permitted. They were prevented, under severe penalties, from raising flax, hemp, or saffron. In climates most congenial to them, the culture of the grape and the olive was prohibited. On account of the distance of Peru and Chili, and the difficulty of transporting oil and wine to these remote regions, they were permitted to plant vines and olives, but were prohibited the culture of tobacco. At Buenos Ayres, by special indulgence of the viceroys, they were allowed to cultivate grapes and olives merely for the use of the table.

They were compelled to procure from the mother country articles of the first necessity, and were thus rendered dependant on her for the conveniences of life as well as luxuries. The crown possessed the monopoly of tobacco, salt, and gunpowder.

To these oppressive regulations and restrictions was added an odious system of taxation. From the Indians was exacted a tribute in the shape of a poll-tax, or a certain servitude in the mines called the mita. A tenth part of the produce of cultivated lands was taken under the denomination of tithes. The alcavala, a tax varying from two and a half to five per cent. on every sale and resale of all things moveable and immoveable, was rigidly exacted, though in some cases a commutation was allowed. Royal and municipal duties were laid on imports and on the tonnage, entrance, and clearance of vessels, under the different appellations of almoxarifazgo, sea, alcavala, cerso, consulado, armada, and armadilla. To these may be added the royal fifths of the precious metals, the most important tax in the mining districts. Besides all these, there were stamp taxes, tavern licenses, and sums paid for the sale of offices, of titles of nobility, papal bulls, the composition and confirmation of lands, with a number of others of inferior grade.

Under the Spanish monarchs, who had early obtained from the Pope the ecclesiastical dominion, and thus had united in their royal persons all civil and religious authority, a most oppressive hierarchy was established, with its numerous train of offices and orders, succeeded by the inquisition.

The posts of honor and profit, from the highest to the lowest, were filled almost exclusively by natives of Old Spain.

The principal code of laws thus maintaining the supremacy of Spain over those distant regions, almost locked up from the rest of the world, emanated from the Council of the Indies, established by the King, in which he was supposed to be always present. The royal rescripts, the recopitationes of the Indies, and the partidas, furnished the general rules of decision; and, when these were silent or doubtful recourse was had to the opinions of professional men.

This system was generally executed by the viceroys, captains general, and by the tribunals of justice, with a spirit corresponding with the rigorous policy that produced it. To this form of government the country had for centuries submitted with implicit obedience, and probably would have continued to submit much longer, but for events in this country and the changes in Europe. The sagacious minds of many able writers, penetrating into the future, had predicted at some distant date a revolution in South America before that in North America had commenced. From the period of the successful termination of our own struggle for independence, that of the inhabitants of the south has been with more confidence foretold; and there is reason to believe it has been hastened by this fortunate event. The conduct of Spain, during the war of our revolution, was calculated to make a lasting impression on her colonies. This result was then foreseen by intelligent politicians; many were surprised that she could be so blind to her own interests after she had, on one occasion, manifested the strongest suspicion of Paraguay; for, to her scrupulous jealousy of this Power the expulsion of the Jesuits from that country in 1750 is to be attributed.

The wars that arose from the French revolution have produced in Europe changes of the greatest magnitude, which have had an immense influence on the affairs of South America. When Spain joined France against the combined princes, she exposed her distant possessions to British hostilities. The great naval power of England gave her ready access to the American colonies. Engaged in an arduous contest, she was prompted by her feelings and interests to retaliate on Spain the conduct she experienced from her during the war of our independence. Encouraged, perhaps, by the councils of her enemies, the first symptoms of insurrection in the continental possessions of Spain were exhibited in the year 1797, in Venezuela. These were succeeded by the attempts of Miranda in the same quarter, which were accompanied, or were followed, since the vacillating state of the Spanish monarchy, by revolutionary movements in Mexico, Granada, Peru, Chili, and Buenos Ayres; and from which scarcely any part of the Spanish dominions in America has been entirely exempt.

The occurrences that led the way to the subsequent important events in the provinces of La Plata were, the invasion of the British under Popham and Beresford in the year 1806, and their expulsion a few months afterwards by the collected forces of the country under Leniers and Pueyrredon. These incidents fortunately gave to the people a just idea of their own strength; and they afterwards repelled, with a firmness and bravery that did them great honor, the formidable attack of the British under General Whitlocke.

The wretched state to which Spain was reduced by the policy, the power, and the arts of Napoleon, the resignation of Charles the Fourth in favor of Ferdinand the Seventh, and the renunciation by both in favor of Napoleon, were productive of the most important results. They threw the kingdom into the greatest confusion. The alternate successes and disasters of the French armies produced a new era in Spain. The people, generally, revolted at the idea of being governed by the brother of Napoleon, to whom he had transferred the crown. Juntas were established, who acted in the name of Ferdinand, then confined in France. These were substituted for the ancient Cortes and the regular council of the nation, to which, in times of imminent danger, they ought to have recurred, agreeably to their usages. Conflicting authorities produced a distracted state of affairs. In the scenes that ensued the proper attention was not paid to the American provinces. Their conduct towards them was versatile and inconsistent; they were lost sight of or neglected until it was too late. Conceiving they were abandoned by the parent state, they thought it justifiable to act for themselves. It was not very long before the inhabitants of Buenos Ayres, embracing the example of their brethren in Spain, established a Junta, which assumed the reins of government, and finally, in the year 1810, sent off the Viceroy Cisneros and his principal adherents. For a summary of events subsequent to this period, until the time of my departure, I beg leave to refer to the "Outline" subjoined, (Appendix A,) from the pen of Dr. Funes, drawn up, in part, at my request. Without vouching for the perfect accuracy of the work, I think, from the information received, it will probably be found to contain, in general, a correct and impartial sketch of the prominent transactions and occurrences.

In perusing this interesting document, I have to lament that its pages are marked with some cases of severity and cruelty, which seem almost inseparable from great revolutions. It must, however, be consoling to observe, that they appear to have passed through that state which might possibly have rendered examples necessary, and to have arrived, perhaps, at that stage when, the passions becoming less turbulent and the people more enlightened, a milder system may be expected to prevail.

Their dissensions have produced most of their calamities—in such seasons they were naturally to be expected. But their disputes have been principally healed by the prudent and energetic measures of the Congress which commenced its sittings in Tucuman in the year 1815, and adjourned in the year following from thence to Buenos Ayres, where it remains in session, occupied with the task of forming a permanent constitution. This respectable body, besides acting as a convention or a constituent assembly, exercises temporarily legislative powers. Their sittings are public, with a gallery of audience for citizens and strangers. The debates are frequently interesting, and are conducted with ability and decorum; they are published every month for the information of the people.

The dispute with Artigas, the chief of the Orientals, has not been adjusted. This, with a certain jealousy of the superior influence of the city of Buenos Ayres on the general affairs of the provinces, the conduct of the Government of Buenos Ayres towards the Portuguese, and the high tariff of duties which, I understand, have been since reduced, appeared to constitute the principal causes of dissatisfaction at the time of my departure.

The declaration by Congress of that independence which they had for many years previously maintained in fact, was a measure of the highest importance, and has been productive of a unanimity and a decision before unknown. This summit of their wishes was only to be reached by slow and gradual progress. The public mind had to be illumined on the subject by their pulpits, their presses, and their public orations. The people were to be prepared for the event; when the season arrived, they cut the knot which could not be untied. The declaration of independence was adopted in the directorship of Mr. Pueyrredon, on the 9th day of July, 1816. It was succeeded by an able exposition of the causes that extorted it, to justify to their fellow-citizens and to the world the measure they had deliberately voted to support with their fortunes and their lives.

Believing the latter paper might be thought worthy of perusal, a translation has been annexed, (Appendix B.)

The salutary influence of this bold and decisive step was at once felt throughout the country. It gave new life and strength to the patriotic cause, and stability to the Government. The victories of Chacabuco and Maipu, achieved by the arms of Chili and Buenos Ayres, have produced and confirmed a similar declaration of independence by the people of Chili, which is also annexed, (Appendix C,*) and cemented the cordial union existing between the confederate states. The consequence has been that, within these extensive territories, there is scarcely the vestige of a royal army to be found, except on the borders of Peru.

Having thus, in connexion with the succinct account given by Dr. Funes, traced the principal events since the revolution in Buenos Ayres, I shall proceed to state the result of the information received, according to the best opinion I could form, of the extent, population, government, and resources of the United Provinces, with their productions, imports and exports, trade and commerce.

* Not transmitted.

The late viceroyalty of Buenos Ayres, of which that city was the metropolis, was by many considered the largest as well as the most valuable of all the Spanish dominions in South America, extending, in a direct line, from its north to its south boundary, a distance of more than two thousand miles, and, from its eastern to its western, not less than eleven hundred.

It was composed, at the commencement of the revolution, of the nine provinces or intendencies following: Buenos Ayres, Paraguay, Cordova, Salta, Potosi, La Plata, Cochabamba, La Paz, and Puno.

Watered by the great river La Plata, and its numerous tributary streams, which afford an easy communication with countries of immense extent, and furnishing an easy access to the treasures of South America, it has always been regarded by Spain as one of her most precious acquisitions. Enjoying every variety of climate to be found between different and distant latitudes, and blessed with a large portion of fertile soil, it is capable of producing all that is to be found in the temperate or torrid zones. Immense herds of cattle and horses graze on its extensive plains, and constitute, at this time, their principal source of wealth. The mines of Potosi are also included within its boundaries. There are no woods for a very considerable distance from Buenos Ayres. No forest trees are to be seen on the widely-extended pampas, except at intervals a solitary umboo. After passing the Saladillo, in a northerly direction, the woods begin; and, proceeding in the upper provinces, the hills appear, and mountains rise in succession, interspersed with rich valleys. On the east side of the rivers La Plata and Parana, the country is said to be very fine. The Entre Rios is represented as capable of being made a garden spot; and the Banda Oriental presents hills and dales, rich bottoms, fine streams of water, and, at a distance from the great river, on the banks of the smaller streams, some excellent woodland. Between Maldonado and Montevideo, the east ridge of the Cordilleras terminates on the river La Plata.

Since the revolution five more provinces have been erected, making, in all, fourteen within the limits of the ancient viceroyalty, viz: Tucuman, taken from Salta; Mendoza, or Cuyo, taken from Cordova; Corrientes; Entre Rios, comprising the country between the Uruguay and the Parana; and the Banda Oriental, or eastern shore of the river La Plata. The two last were taken from the province of Buenos Ayres, which was thus reduced to the territory on the south side of that river. The subordinate divisions of the country, with the principal towns, will be found in the appendix to this report, with an account of the produce or manufactures of the different districts. (Appendix D.)

Of the fourteen provinces into which the ancient viceroyalty is now divided, five were, at my departure, principally occupied by the royal forces, (which, in consequence of the victory of Maipu, were expected soon to retreat to Lower Peru,) or partially under their influence, viz: Potosi, La Plata, Cochabamba, La Paz, and Puno; and the nine following, independent de facto of Spain, were in the possession of the patriots, viz: Buenos Ayres, Paraguay, Mendoza, Salta, Corrientes, Cordova, Tucuman, Entre Rios, and Banda Oriental. But Paraguay and the city of Santa Fé act independently of Buenos Ayres—though Paraguay is not on unfriendly terms with them, and it is hoped by some will before long join the union. Entre Rios and the Banda Oriental, under General Artigas, in the character of chief of the Orientals, are in a state of hostility with Buenos Ayres.

Montevideo, the capital of the eastern shore, was occupied by a Portuguese army, and a squadron of ships of war from Brazil blockaded the ports of Colonia and Maldonado, and prohibited the entrance of neutral vessels, unless they paid them the same duties on their cargoes that were charged on the importation of the goods when landed in the country.

The territory of the United Provinces is computed to contain one hundred and fifty thousand square leagues, though it probably exceeds that quantity. The lands occupied in the country, remote from the cities, are generally converted by their owners into estanias, or large grazing farms for cattle, and chacras for growing grain. The small farms, or quintas, in the neighborhood of cities, are in fine order. Those around Buenos Ayres, which furnish their market with an ample supply of fruit and vegetables, are, by irrigation, in the highest state of culture.

The population, exclusive of the Indians, is now calculated at about one million three hundred thousand; but adding the civilized Indians only, who are of great importance, it would, in all, probably exceed two millions.

The whole population consists of natives of Old Spain, and their descendants born in the country, or, as they style themselves, South Americans; of Indians civilized, or unreclaimed, with different "castes," or mixed blood; of Africans, and their descendants, or negroes and mulattoes.

I could not ascertain, with satisfaction, the population of the different provinces; the province of Buenos Ayres contains about one hundred and twenty thousand, whilst the population of Entre Rios and Banda Oriental is computed at fifty thousand.

The city of Buenos Ayres contains a population of sixty thousand. The inhabitants of this place appear to be an amiable and interesting people. They are considered brave and humane; possessing intelligence, capable of great exertions and perseverance, and manifesting a cheerful devotion to the cause of freedom and independence.

There is also a certain mediocrity and equality of fortune prevailing among them, extremely favorable to a union of the popular sentiment in support of the common weal. Many industrious mechanics and enterprising merchants are, however, increasing their estates, and adding to the stock of capital in the country.

The people of the province of Buenos Ayres, residing out of the city, are, generally speaking, poor, and rather indolent, though a hardy race; and, when excited to action, they become zealous defenders of the liberties of their country. They are capable of great improvement, and under the influence of a good example, when a change takes place in their habits and manner of living, they bid fair to become useful and industrious citizens.

The inhabitants of Cordova are said to be more superstitious and more industrious, but less patriotic. This is principally attributed to the loss of the trade with Peru, occasioned by the revolutionary war.

Tucuman, I was informed, possessed an excellent population.

The people of Mendoza, or Cuyo, are moral, industrious, and patriotic. They have sacrificed largely at the shrine of independence, supporting with zeal and confidence the cause of their country; whilst the citizens of Santa Fé are represented as immoral and insubordinate, and manifesting on most occasions an extreme jealousy of their neighbors.

The population of Entre Rios and Banda Oriental is, perhaps, not inferior in valor to that of Buenos Ayres. Nor is it deficient in military skill, particularly in carrying on a partisan warfare, for which its troops are admirably adapted. Their other good qualities have been probably somewhat impaired by the system pursued in that quarter, where they have been compelled to give up every thing like civil avocations, and to continue without any regular kind of government, under the absolute control of a chief, who, whatever may be his political principles or professions, in practice concentrates all power, legislative, judicial, and executive, in himself.

The General Congress of the United Provinces, assembled at Buenos Ayres on the 3d of December of 1817, established, by a provisional statute, a temporary form of government, which will be found in Appendix, marked E.

This Congress is composed of deputies from the different provinces. It actually consists of twenty-six members; but, as a representative is allowed for every fifteen thousand citizens, it would be more numerous if all the provinces had sent delegates in that ratio of population.

With some exceptions, and particularly of that palladium of our rights which is unknown to the civil law, the trial by jury, the provisional constitution will be found, on an attentive perusal, to contain a distinct recognition of many of the vital principles of free government. A church establishment, also, that of the Catholic faith, is contrary to our ideas of religious freedom, though a measure adopted from necessity, perhaps, by them.

It declares that all power, legislative, judicial, and executive, resides in the nation. The Congress are to be chosen by electors, who are to be voted for by the people in the primary assemblies. The Cabildos, or municipalities, are to be elected immediately by the citizens. It recognises the independence of the judiciary, and declares the tenure of office, with respect to the superior judges, to be during good behavior. It provides for the election of a Chief Magistrate by Congress, removable when they choose to appoint a successor, and responsible for the execution of the duties of his office, which are defined and limited. In the oath of office, he is sworn to preserve the integrity and independence of the country.

The three great Departments—of State, of the Treasury, and of War—are distinctly marked out, and their respective powers and duties assigned.

On some subjects it enters more into detail than is usual with us, particularly in those of their army, navy, and militia; but this, perhaps, in their situation, was necessary.

It provides that no citizen shall accept a title of nobility, without forfeiting the character of citizenship.

It provides, also, against general warrants, and the arrest of individuals, unless on probable proof of guilt.

It contains a salutary provision, that a judge, having original jurisdiction, before taking cognizance of a cause, shall use all possible means of reconciling the parties. This constitution is but temporary. The Congress are engaged in the task of forming a permanent one. In the mean time, no alteration can be made in the present, unless with the consent of two-thirds of the members. In this manner some alterations have been adopted.

The subject of a permanent constitution was before a committee of sixteen members of Congress. There was a difference of opinion prevailing among them on the point of a confederated or a consolidated Government. If they should adopt the former, they will frame the constitution, in all probability, nearly after the model of that of the United States. Should they decide on the latter, it is highly probable they will incorporate the leading features of our system into their form of government. They seem to concur in the proposition to have a Chief Magistrate elected for a term of years, and a representive Legislature, to consist of two branches—a Senate, to constitute the most permanent body; and a House of Representatives, whose term of service will be of shorter duration.

Perhaps it would be better for them to delay the completion of this all-important task, after the example of the United States, until a period of peace. Their present provisional statute is an improvement on those which preceded it; and we may expect their proposed constitution will be still more perfect, as they advance in the knowledge of those principles on which republican Governments are constituted.

But, however free in theory this provisional statute may be, it is undoubtedly true that, unless administered agreeably to its letter and spirit, it will not afford security to the citizen. Whether any infractions have occurred since the date of its existence, I cannot pretend to determine, not being in full possession of the facts.

When we recollect that they have the benefit of our example, it may reasonably be expected that they will, in general, adhere to their written constitution. They have, also, the fatal result of the French revolution, warning them of the dangers of its excesses, of which they appear to be sensible.

The productions and the manufactures of the different provinces will be found in Appendix D; but I was unable to procure any satisfactory estimates of the probable value or amount in each province. There is, however, a considerable internal trade carried on, in the interchange of various articles, between the several provinces: cattle, horses, and mules furnish a considerable source of barter; with the latter, Peru is usually supplied; the Paraguay tea is a great article of trade throughout the country; the brandy, wine, raisins, and figs of Mendoza and San Juan, are becoming important; the hides of oxen, the skins of the vaccina and granaco, with a number of fine furs, afford valuable articles of exchange. These, with the foreign goods transported in every direction from Buenos Ayres very readily by oxen and mules, which also furnish the means of carrying their native productions to their seaports, form a branch of trade of great magnitude, considering the population of the country.

Their exports are calculated, with some degree of accuracy, at ten millions of dollars. These consist, principally, of ox hides, jerk beef, and tallow, the present great staples of the country; a variety of furs and peltry, some grain, copper, mostly brought from Chili, with gold and silver in bullion, and in coin, chiefly from the mines of Potosi.

The imports are computed to be about equal to their exports; British manufactures form the principal mass, and they are to be had in great abundance. They consist of woollen and cotton goods of every description, some of them wrought to imitate the manufactures of the country; ironmongery, cutlery, hardware, saddlery, hats, porter, ale, and cheese, are among the remaining articles.

From the United States they receive lumber of all kinds, and furniture of every description, coaches and carriages of all sorts, codfish, mackerel, shad and herring, leather, boots and shoes, powder, and munitions of war and naval stores, ships and vessels, particularly those calculated for their navy or for privateers.

From Brazil they receive sugar, coffee, cotton, and rum.

From the north of Europe they receive steel and iron, and from France a number of articles of its manufacture.

Their foreign commerce is principally carried on by British capitalists, though there are some Americans, a few French, and other foreign merchants, also settled at Buenos Ayres; they are all placed, I believe, on the same footing of equality.

The revenue of the state may be estimated at about three millions of dollars annually; but their system of finance is very imperfect, and, although their debt is small, their credit is low. They have hitherto avoided the issuing of paper money, and they have established no bank; but they have sometimes anticipated their revenue, by giving due bills receivable in payment for duties on goods imported or articles exported. The impost furnishes the principal part of the revenue. A copy of their tariff, as at first established, was some time since transmitted, I believe, to the Department of State; in this, the duties were generally specific and high. I understand they have been lately reduced, as their exorbitancy had occasioned much smuggling.

Voluntary contributions from those friendly to the revolution, and forced loans from the old Spaniards, have constituted another portion of their funds. To show the public capital adequate to all exigencies, their different civil, military, and naval establishments have been taken into view, and are comprised in the estimate furnished—a thing unusual with us; but they have omitted their public lands, which, if a prudent use be made of them, must at no distant day become a very productive source of revenue to the state.

The mines of Potosi, which in all probability will very soon fall into their hands again, may furnish them with a considerable supply of the precious metals. It is stated, on respectable authority, that so late as the year 1790, the amount of gold and silver coined at Potosi in that year was calculated to have been $299,846 in gold, and $2,983,176 in silver.

The state of their army, and the condition of their navy, will be seen by a reference to the original return presented. (Appendix F.*)

Their army is composed of regular troops, ciorcos, and militia; in one or other of these classes, they are educated to the military art, and, as far as I had an opportunity and was capable of judging, they appeared to be well acquainted with the elements of their profession. Their forces, according to the paper furnished, are estimated at nearly thirty thousand men. They are composed of 1,296 artillery, 13,693 infantry, and 14,768 cavalry, of which 12,143 are troops of the line, 7,041 are ciorcos, and 10,573 militia. These form the different armies of the centre of Peru, of the Andes, of Cordova, and the auxiliary forces in the Entre Rios. This statement, however, only includes the militia of the province of Buenos Ayres itself. Their supply of arms and munitions of war is ample, as will be seen by the statement annexed on that subject.

Their navy is small, and some of their vessels are laid up in ordinary. A list of them, as well as of their privateers, will be found in Appendix F.* Their private armed vessels are subjected to very strict regulations, agreeably to their prize code, which is among the original papers presented and herewith delivered. It may be proper in this place to introduce the subject of the irregular conduct of the privateers under the patriot flag, against which the commissioners were directed to remonstrate. Having taken an opportunity of explaining to Mr. Tagle, the Secretary of State, the proceedings of our Government relative to Amelia island and Galvezton, agreeably to their instructions, the commissioners embraced a suitable occasion to urge the just cause of complaint which the malpractices of private armed vessels, wearing the patriot colors, had furnished our Government; on both topics, they had long and interesting conversations. With the conduct of the Government respecting Amelia island and Galvezton Mr. Tagle expressed himself perfectly satisfied, and he disclaimed for his Government any privity or participation in the lodgements made at those places, by persons acting in the name of the patriots of South America. In reference to the acts of cruisers under the patriot flags, he said he was sensible that great irregularities had occurred, though his Government had done every thing in their power to prevent them, and were willing, if any instance of aggression were pointed out, to direct an inquiry into the case, and, if the facts were established, to punish those concerned, and redress the injured individuals. He professed his readiness to adopt any measures that would more effectually prevent a recurrence of such acts, in which he expressed his belief that the privateers of Buenos Ayres had rarely participated, though the character of the Government had suffered from the conduct of others. He stated that they had on one occasion sent out some of their public vessels to examine all cruisers wearing the Buenos Ayrean flag, to see that they were lawfully commissioned, and to ascertain whether they had violated their instructions.

Among the causes of dissatisfaction to which I have alluded, the preponderance of the capital has been mentioned. Its great weight in the scale of national affairs is to be ascribed to its greater exertions in the national cause. These are owing to its comparative wealth, and to its active, intelligent, and enterprising population. The armies that have been raised in this city and the neigboring country, with the supplies in money and munitions of war drawn from these sources, have been truly extraordinary.

It would be a difficult task to make an exact calculation, or to form even a probable estimate, but all seemed to concede the superior merit claimed on account of their exertions, when compared with their wealth and population; and it is not unlikely that Buenos Ayres has, in consequence, assumed a higher tone, and acquired a controlling influence, which she has sometimes abused.

Another source of discontent is, the unfortunate dispute between the Banda Oriental and Buenos Ayres, which had also an influence on the proceedings of the latter towards the Portuguese.

The original cause of division may be traced to a jealousy long subsisting between the rival cities of Montevideo and Buenos Ayres. This has become habitual, and has extended to the country. Private interests and personal views have also increased their dissensions.

General Artigas (who bears the character of chief of the Orientals, as has been already stated, and has also assumed that of the Protector of the Entre Rios and Santa Fé) was originally, in the royal service, a captain in a provincial corps. In this he continued for some time after the revolution had commenced at Buenos Ayres. But in the year 1811, taking offence, as it is said, at some conduct of the Spanish commandant of Colonia, he abandoned the royal cause, and entered into the service of the patriots. So early as the year 1813, when acting against Montevideo, he became dissatisfied with Sarratea, the commander-in-chief from Buenos Ayres. On his removal from the head of the army, he quarrelled with General Rondeau, who it was supposed would have been acceptable to him, and finally withdrew, before the siege of Montevideo was finished under General Alvear. For this conduct, Posadas, when he succeeded to the government, treated him as a deserter from their service. By a proclamation, he offered a reward for his apprehension, and set a price upon his head—an act which General Artigas never forgot or forgave.

During the subsequent directorship of Alvear, he induced the Cabildo of Buenos Ayres to issue a similar proclamation against General Artigas. When Alvear was dismissed, the people of Buenos Ayres endeavored to atone for their conduct by burning, with every mark of ignominy, the degrading proclamation. They also addressed a conciliatory letter to the general, and received from him a corresponding answer. These were preliminary to a fruitless attempt at reconciliation, made by the director ad interim, Colonel Alvares, who succeeded Alvear. The correspondence on this occasion is annexed. (Appendix H.) Other endeavors to reconcile him have failed, notwithstanding the changes in the office of Director at Buenos Ayres. On one occasion, the proposition was made that the Banda Oriental should remain independent of Buenos Ayres, and merely send deputies to the General Congress to concert measures against the common enemy. On another, when the Portuguese army was approaching the frontiers of the Banda Oriental, an effort was made by Pueyrredon to reconcile him, and to unite him in the common defence. Ample supplies of arms and munitions of war were offered, and some furnished; but this attempt also failed.

In order that a fuller view of this subject may be had, I have subjoined a translated copy of an animated letter from General Artigas to Mr. Pueyrredon. (Appendix I.) It is but justice to add, that General Artigas is thought, by persons entitled to credit, to be a firm friend to the independence of the country. To express a decided opinion on this delicate question would scarcely be expected of me, as my position did not command a view of the whole ground. I had not the satisfaction to be derived from a personal interview with General Artigas, who is, unquestionably, a man of rare and singular talents. But if I were to hazard a conjecture, I think it not improbable that in this, as in most family disputes, there have been faults on both sides. It is to be lamented that they are in open hostility. The war has been prosecuted with great animosity, and in two late engagements the troops of Buenos Ayres have been defeated with great loss. By some it was said that the inhabitants of the eastern shore were anxious that a reconciliation should take place, whilst the people in the country preferred their present state.

* The document referred to is not sent.

I must not omit to take a glance at the situation of Paraguay. This province presents a singular spectacle. It stands aloof from the rest. The people, with the aid of the few remaining royal troops, repulsed an army sent to compel them to join the common standard. Very soon afterwards they expelled the royalists, and set up for themselves. Since this period, they appear to have adopted a partial non-intercourse system. But Buenos Ayres, on one occasion, succeeded in obtaining an understanding with them. Some suspect that they are secretly inimical to the existing order of things, and wish to keep themselves within their shell in case of a change, that they may profit by future events; others calculate with some confidence on their ultimate union with Buenos Ayres, with which, at present, they indulge a limited and reluctant intercourse. Paraguay is under the immediate control of a person named Francia, who styles himself Dictator of Paraguay.

From the domestic concerns of the provinces we naturally turn to their foreign relations. On this subject the commissioners were informed that they had nothing more than a friendly understanding with any foreign nation. With the Portuguese Government they concluded an arrangement in 1812, under the mediation, it is said, of the British, with respect to the Banda Oriental. They have since had a correspondence with them on the subject of their entrance into that province, and the forcible occupation by a Portuguese army of the city of Montevideo, of which a copy is annexed. (Appendix I.) This will present the state of affairs between Buenos Ayres and the Brazils, which has been the theme of much discussion. The superior naval force of the Portuguese stationed in the river La Plata could have effectually blockaded all the ports of Buenos Ayres. By this means they would have prevented supplies of arms and munitions of war, and entirely destroyed the great source of revenue to the state, the duties on imports and tonnage, at a season when money was much wanted: for, about this period, Buenos Ayres had a powerful army to contend with on the side of Peru, and had taken the burden of the renewed contest of Chili with Spain. Under such circumstances, they were in some measure obliged to adopt a cautious and moderate policy. Their conduct in this respect seems to have been coerced. Their unhappy state with the Orientals had also an influence on their measures; they alleged that the restless conduct of Artigas had furnished the Portuguese with a pretext for the invasion; but it is probable that they will ultimately break with the Government of Brazil.

The British Government have, through their official agents, entered into commercial stipulations with General Artigas, as the chief of the Orientals, on the subject of their trade with the eastern shore. A copy of this instrument will be found in Appendix K.*

The Government of Buenos Ayres have a confidential person in Europe, soliciting, from England and other Powers, it is said, assistance of every kind and a recognition of their independence. England has a consul, who, with her naval commander on that station, appeared to conduct the confidential affairs of the British cabinet with the Government of Buenos Ayres.

What effects the victory of Maipu will produce abroad, it would be hazardous in me to conjecture. Whether, like the capture of Burgoyne, it will procure for the United Provinces foreign alliances, I cannot pretend to say.

From a source which is entitled to credit, I was informed that the raising and embarcation of Osorio's army in Peru was not accomplished without serious difficulties. Alternate force and persuasion were used to collect them; and nothing but the name, character, and promises of their general could have induced them to go on board of the vessels prepared for the purpose at the port of Callao. Some of them were actually in a state of mutiny, notwithstanding they were told they would be received with open arms by their brethren in Chili.

The forces finally embarked, agreeably to an account furnished by a gentleman of undoubted veracity on the spot, consisted of the following troops:

1 company of artillery,	70
1 company of sappers and miners,	81
Regiment of Brugos,	900
Regiment of San Carlos, infantry,	907
Regiment of Arequipa,	1,000
Arequipa dragoons,	160
Limas,	144
	3,262

This army was composed of all the regular soldiers they could spare from Lima, who were united at Talcaguna to the royal forces left in Chili. By the battle of Maipu it has ceased to exist. The probable effects in Peru, and other parts of South America, may be conjectured, but cannot be affirmed. The same gentleman who has been mentioned, and who is conversant in Peruvian affairs, apprehended that important changes would result.

I cannot conclude this paper without drawing your attention to a rapid survey of the reforms and improvements in the province of Buenos Ayres, produced by the revolution, and its influence on knowledge, society, and manners.

The effects of the revolution are visible in the changes produced in the state of society. The difference in the freedom of acting and thinking which preceded the revolution must necessarily be great. The freedom of commerce must have given a spring to exertions of native enterprise and intelligence; while the active scenes of war and politics, for the last ten years, have awakened the genius of the country which had so long slumbered. The generation now on the stage may almost be said to have been reared under a new order of things. The common stock of ideas among the people has been greatly augmented, the natural consequence of the important political events which daily transpire, and in which every man, like the citizen of Athens, feels an interest. The newspapers are everywhere circulated, together with the manifestoes of the Government, which is obliged to court the approbation of public opinion on all measures of moment. It is not very unusual for the same countryman, who, a few years ago, never troubled himself about any thing beyond the narrow circle of his domestic concerns, to purchase a newspaper on coming to town, as a matter of course, and, if unable to read, to request the first one he meets to do him that favor. The country curates are, moreover, enjoined to read the newspapers and manifestoes regularly to their flocks. The spirit of improvement may be seen in every thing. Even some of those who are under the influence of strong prejudices against the revolution frequently remark the changes for better which have taken place. Their habits, manners, dress, and mode of living, have been improved by intercourse with strangers, and the free introduction of foreign customs, particularly English, American, and French. Great prejudices prevail against whatever is Spanish. It is even offensive to them to be called by this name; they prefer to be identified with the aborigines of the country. The appellation which they have assumed, and in which they take a pride, is that of South Americans.

A powerful stimulus must necessarily have been given to their industry by two important circumstances—the diminution in prices of foreign merchandise, and the great increase in value of the products of the country, with the consequent rise of property. Though the grounds in the neighborhood of cities are highly improved, as I have already stated, agriculture, comparatively speaking, is in a low condition. In general, the lands are badly tilled; the plough is rarely used, and the substitute is a very indifferent one. But, notwithstanding the disadvantages of the present method of culture, I was informed by reputable persons that the average crop of wheat is not less than fifty bushels per acre in good seasons.

On the subject of religion, especially, the change in the public mind has been very great. The Catholic faith is established as that of the state; but there are many advocates, both in conversation and in writing, of universal toleration. Some members of Congress are said to be strongly in favor of it; but the ignorant and superstitious part of the people, together with the regular clergy, would not be satisfied with such a measure, while the liberality prevailing among the better informed classes is such as to secure a virtual toleration for the present. Besides, from the circumstances of there being no sects in the country, such a provision may wait the progress of liberality in public opinion. In fact, the human mind has been set free on all matters of a general abstract nature, although the liberty of the press is circumscribed, in some degree, with respect to strictures on public measures and men, and the established religion; but there is neither inquisition nor previous license. They acknowledge the Pope as a spiritual head merely, and do not think him entitled to any authority to interfere in their temporal concerns. His bull in favor of the King of Spain against the colonists, which may be almost regarded as an excommunication, produced little or no sensation.

The number of monks and nuns never was very great in Buenos Ayres, when compared with other portions of the Spanish dominions. They have diminished since the revolution. There was at one time a positive law passed forbidding any one to become a monk or a nun; but they were obliged to repeal it, and it was afterwards passed with some modifications. The restrictions substituted, aided by public opinion, have nearly produced the desired effect. Few of the youth of the country apply themselves to the study of theology, since other occupations much more tempting to their ambition have been opened to their choice. Formerly, the priesthood was the chief aim of young men of the best families who were desirous of distinction, as, in fact, it constituted almost the only profession to which those who had received a liberal education could devote themselves; which will readily account for the circumstance of so many of the secular clergy directing their attention at present almost exclusively to politics. The regular clergy, who are not permitted by the nature of their profession to take part in the business of the world, or to hold secular offices, are many of them Europeans; but those of them who are natives take the same lively interest in passing events with the other classes of the community.

They have gone cautiously to work in reforms in the different branches of their municipal laws and the administration of them. The number of offices has been considerably diminished, and responsibility rendered more direct and severe. The judiciary system has undergone many improvements, and nearly all the leading features of the law which did not harmonize with the principles of free government have been expunged, though some of the former evils still remain. The barbarous impositions on the aborigines have been abolished; the odious alcavala and other obnoxious taxes modified so as no longer to be vexatious; slavery and the slave trade forbidden in future; and all titles of nobility prohibited under the pain of the loss of citizenship. The law of primogeniture is also expunged from their system. In the provisional statute, as has already been stated, nearly all the principles of free representative government are recognised, accompanied, it is true, with certain drawbacks, for which they plead the necessity of the times, but which they profess their intention to do away with on the final settlement of the Government—a consummation anxiously desired by all classes of inhabitants. The example of France has warned them not to attempt too much at first. They have followed the plan of the United States in the introduction of gradual reforms, instead of resorting to violent and sudden innovations and revolutions.

Next to the establishment of their independence by arms, the education of their youth appears to be the subject of the most anxious interest. They complain that every possible impediment was thrown in the way of education previous to the revolution; that, so far from fostering public institutions for this purpose, several schools were actually prohibited in the capital, and the young men were not without restraint permitted to go abroad for their education. There was a college at Cordova, at which those destined for the bar or the priesthood completed their studies upon the ancient monkish principles. Another, called San Carlos, (now the Union of the South,) had been opened at Buenos Ayres, but was afterwards converted into barracks for soldiers. It is an immense building, more extensive, perhaps, than any which has been dedicated to learning in this country, and it has lately been fitted up at very great expense. The school was to have been opened in May or June last on a more modern and liberal plan of discipline and instruction. The library of the state is kept in an adjoining building; it occupies a suite of six rooms, and contains nearly twenty thousand volumes, the greater part rare and valuable. It is formed out of the library of the Jesuits, the books collected in the different monasteries, donations from individuals, and an annual appropriation by the Government, and contains works on all subjects and in all the languages of the polished nations of Europe. A very valuable addition has been lately made of several thousand volumes, brought to Buenos Ayres by M. Bonpland, the companion of the celebrated Humboldt.

Besides the University of Cordova, at which there are about one hundred and fifty students, there are public schools in all the principal towns, supported by their respective corporations. In Buenos Ayres, besides an academy, in which are taught the higher branches, and the college before mentioned, there are eight public schools, for whose support the corporation contributes about seven thousand dollars annually; and, according to the returns of last year, the number of scholars amounted to eight hundred and sixty-four. There are five other schools, exclusively for the benefit of the poor, and under the charge of the different monasteries; these are supplied with books and stationary at the public expense. There are also parish schools in the country, for the support of which a portion of the tithes has been lately set apart. It is rare to meet with a boy ten or twelve years of age, in the city of Buenos Ayres, who cannot read and write. Besides the scholars thus instructed, many have private tutors. In addition to all this, I must not omit to mention the military academies, supported by Government, at Buenos Ayres and Tucuman, at which there are a considerable number of cadets.

There are no prohibited books of any kind; all are permitted to circulate freely, or to be openly sold in the bookstores; among them is the New Testament in Spanish. This alone is a prodigious step towards the emancipation of their minds from prejudices. There are several bookstores, whose profits have rapidly increased; a proof that the number of readers has augmented in the same proportion. There had been a large importation of English books, a language becoming daily more familiar to them. Eight years ago the mechanic art of printing was scarcely known in Buenos Ayres; at present, there are three printing offices, one of them very extensive, containing four presses. The price of printing is, notwithstanding, at least three times higher than in the United States; but as there is no trade or intercourse with Spain, all school books used in the country, some of them original, are published at Buenos Ayres; the business is therefore profitable, and rapidly extending. There are many political essays, which, instead of being inserted in the newspapers, are published in loose sheets; there are also original pamphlets, as well as republications of foreign works. The constitutions of the United States and of the different States, together with a very good history of our country, and many of our most important state papers, are widely circulated. The work of Dean Funes, the venerable historian of the country, comprised in three large octavo volumes, considering the infancy of the typographic art in this part of the world, may be regarded as an undertaking of some magnitude.

There are three weekly journals, or newspapers, published in the city, which have an extensive circulation through the United Provinces. They all advocate the principles of liberty and republican forms of government, as none other would suit the public taste. The year before last, it is true, one of the papers ventured to advocate the restoration of the Incas of Peru, with a limited monarchy; but it was badly received. No proposition for the restoration of hereditary power, of any kind, as far as I could learn, will be seriously listened to for a moment by the people. Even the ordinary language has changed. They speak of "the state," "the people," "the public," "country," and use other terms, as in the United States, implying the interest that each man takes in what appertains to the community. The first principle constantly inculcated is, "that all power rightfully emanates from the people." This, and similar dogmas, form a part of the education of children, taught at the same time with their catechism. It is natural that the passion for free government should be continually increasing. A fact may be mentioned to show the solid advancement they have made, which is, that the number of votes taken at their elections increases every year. In becoming habituated to this peaceful and orderly mode of exercising their right of choosing those who are to be invested with authority, the tumultuous and irregular removal, by a kind of general oratory or acclamation, of those who have been chosen, will gradually cease.

Rather than disturb the order of society, they will endure with patience until the time arrives for effecting a regular and constitutional change. Since the election of the present Director, none of these tumults, before so frequent, have occurred. These tumults have seldom been attended with bloodshed; yet they produce great confusion and disorder, and give rise to habits of insubordination, at the same time that they are ruinous to the character of a nation.

The viceroyalty of Buenos Ayres differed from the rest in one important particular. It contained no nobility; or, if any, very few. This may be regarded as a favorable circumstance in their society. Another favorable feature, very necessary to the successful administration of their affairs, is the conduct of many individuals, who have filled the highest office of state, in descending from that dignified situation to inferior posts, and discharging their duties with alacrity. Thus we behold General A. Balcarce, who was formerly Director, acting as second in command to Colonel San Martin; Colonel Alvarez, also a Director at one period, now serving in the staff under the chief of that department, General Azcuenega; and General Rondeau, once elected to the chair of state, is at present employed in a minor office. There are others, who have occupied the same elevated post, who have retired to the station of private citizens.

The general capacities of the United Provinces for national defence are also important, in many respects. The nature and extent of the country afford the inhabitants numerous advantages over an invading army. The ease with which their herds of cattle may be driven to distant places, beyond the reach of an enemy, and the rapid movements the troops of the country can make, from the ample supply of horses and mules, are circumstances of great consequence in a military view. Even the towns not fortified, from the manner in which they are built, and from the construction of their houses, furnish powerful means of defence, as the British army under General Whitlocke experienced, in their attack on Buenos Ayres.

I am sensible that, in the course of these statements and remarks, some inaccuracies and errors must have occurred; but they have been unintentional. I have only to add, that the reception of the commissioners at Buenos Ayres by the Chief Magistrate was friendly and flattering. From every class they met with a cordial welcome. The people, in general, appear to be very much attached to the American character, and to the Government and citizens of the United States.

Should any thing further occur, it shall be made the subject of a future paper.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, your most obedient servant,

C. A. RODNEY.

Mr. Graham to the Secretary of State.

SIR: CITY OF WASHINGTON, November 5, 1818.

Mr. Rodney having undertaken to draw up, for our joint signature, a report respecting the present situation of the country we recently visited under the orders of the President, and circumstances having prevented him from presenting it to me for perusal until his late arrival in this city, I was not aware until then that I should have occasion to present to you my individual views on that subject. But, on an attentive perusal of the paper he drew up, I found that, although there was not, perhaps, any important fact on which we essentially differed, yet that some were stated of which I was not aware; and that we had taken views which it might be difficult to combine during the short time then allowed to us, and of which it might be proper that you should be put in possession. Under these circumstances, I thought it better to submit to the disadvantage of hastily throwing my observations together, and of presenting them separately, than to ask him to derange the general tenor of his report by introducing them into it.

The arrival of Mr. Bland, who will necessarily make a separate report, will, I trust, reconcile the President to the course I have taken, as, from a combined view of what we individually state, he may, perhaps, be better enabled to draw his own inferences as to the actual situation and future prospects of the country we visited, than from any just report in which we could all have agreed; as, under ordinary circumstances, that must have been the result of a compromise of opinions, and would, probably, have excluded some facts, or some views, which one or the other of us will, in the mode now adopted, present to you.

In my particular situation, however, I thought it less necessary to go into detail, as I knew that the report of Mr. Rodney would furnish information on points which I omit.

With great respect, I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient servant,

JOHN GRAHAM.

The Hon. JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, Secretary of State.

The country formerly known as the viceroyalty of Buenos Ayres, extending from the northwestern sources of the river La Plata to the southern cape of America, and from the confines of Brazil and the ocean to the ridge of the Andes, may be considered as that which is called "the United Provinces of South America."

Under the royal Government, it was divided into the intendencies or provinces of Buenos Ayres, Paraguay, Cordova, Salta, Potosi, La Plata, Cochabamba, La Paz, and Puno. Subsequently to the revolution, in the year 1814, another division was made; and from the provinces of Cordova, Salta, and Buenos Ayres were taken those of Cuyo or Mendoza, Tucuman, Corrientes, Entre Rios, and the Banda Oriental. The others, it is believed, retained their former boundaries, and, with the exception of Paraguay, are generally called "Upper Peru."

This widely-extended country embraces almost every variety of climate and soil, and is capable of almost every variety of production. A large part of it, however, particularly on the west side of the river La Plata, and southerly towards Cape Horn, is deficient in wood, even for fuel, and in water; that which is found is generally brackish.

Although three centuries have passed by since the Spaniards made their first settlement in this country, and some considerable towns and cities have grown in it, yet its general improvement and population have by no means kept pace with them, for the lower provinces have been almost entirely abandoned to the immense herds of cattle which graze on their plains, and require only the partial care of a comparatively few herdsmen; and the inhabitants of Upper Peru have been engaged more generally in the business of mining than was favorable to improvement or population. Certain small districts, having peculiar advantages, are said to be well cultivated, and very productive; but agriculture has, in general, been very much neglected. It is, in a great degree, confined to the vicinity of the towns and cities, and may be said to limit its supplies to their demands. This state of things, combined with the regulations of the former Government, the influence of climate, and the force of example, has stamped the character of indolence upon that class of society usually considered as the laboring class. The same causes have not operated (at least not with the same force) upon the other inhabitants of the country; hence, they are more industrious and more active. Their manners are social, friendly, and polite. In native talents, they are said to be inferior to no people; and they have given proofs that they are capable of great and persevering efforts, that they are ardently attached to their country, and warmly enlisted in the cause of its independence.

It is not necessary for me to enter into a detail of the causes which led to the revolution in 1810. The most immediate, perhaps, are to be found in the incidents connected with the two invasions of the country by the British, in the years 1805 and 1806, and in the subsequent events in Spain; as they had a direct tendency to show to these people their own strength, and the incapacity of Spain to give them protection or enforce obedience. The groundwork was, however, laid in the jealous and oppressive system adopted at a more early period by the Kings of Spain, whose policy it seemed to be to keep within as narrow limits as circumstances would permit the intelligence, wealth, and population of that part of America subject to their dominion, as the surest means of preserving an empire which they considered the great source of their wealth and power.

The revolution having been auspiciously commenced in the city of Buenos Ayres, was warmly and zealously supported by the great mass of the people descended from the Spaniards; but the native Spaniards, as well those domesticated in the country as those in the service of the King, were almost all opposed to it, particularly at the time and under the circumstances it took place. Dissensions were the immediate result, and their long-standing jealousy and distrust of each other have, by subsequent events, been heightened into deadly hostility, which time alone can wear away. These dissensions have been considered as one of the causes that produced those which subsequently took place amongst the patriots themselves, and which have been most serious obstacles to the progress of the revolution. Other obstacles, however, have been presented by the royal Government in Peru, which has hitherto not only been able to maintain itself there, but has found means, by enlisting the native Peruvians into its service, to send, at different times, considerable armies into the upper provinces on the La Plata, where the war has been carried on from the commencement of the revolution to the present day with various success; the great extent and peculiar character of the country, and the want of resources, having prevented either party from making a blow decisive of the contest. When we came away, the advantage in that quarter was on the side of the Spaniards, as they were in possession of the provinces of Upper Peru, which had, to a certain degree at least, joined in the revolution, and some of which are represented in the Congress. Everywhere else they have been obliged to yield up the Government and abandon the country, or submit to the ruling power. The peculiar situation of Montevideo, on the east side of the river La Plata, open to the sea, and strongly fortified, enabled the Spanish naval and military forces, at an early period in the revolution, to make a stand there. They were ultimately obliged to surrender it; not, however, until long-protracted and perhaps ill-directed efforts on the part of the assailants had given rise to many jarring incidents between those who came from the opposite shores of the river, probably the effect, in part at least, of ancient jealousies, kept alive by the individual interests of particular leaders; these have been followed by events calculated to produce a still greater alienation; and, although several attempts have been made to bring about a union, they have hitherto been unsuccessful. The provinces of the "Banda Oriental" and the "Entre Rios," on the eastern side of the river, under the direction of General Artigas, are now at war with those on the western side, under the government of the Congress at Buenos Ayres.

This war has originated from a combination of causes, in which both parties have, perhaps, something to complain of, and something to blame themselves for.

General Artigas and his followers profess a belief that it is the intention of the Government of Buenos Ayres to put them down, and oblige them to submit to such arrangements as will deprive them of the privileges of self-government, to which they claim to have a right. They say, however, that they are willing to unite with the people on the western side of the river, but not in such a way as will subject them to what they call the tyranny of the city of Buenos Ayres. On the other hand, it is stated that this is merely a pretext; that the real object of General Artigas, and of some of his principal officers, is to prevent a union on any terms, and to preserve the power they have acquired, by giving an erroneous excitement to the people who follow them; that it is wished and intended to place these provinces on a footing with the others; that the respectable portion of their inhabitants are aware of this fact, and anxious for a union, but are prevented from openly expressing their sentiments from a fear of General Artigas, whose power is uncontrolled by law or justice, and hence the propriety and necessity of aiding them to resist it. Armies have accordingly been marched within the present year into these provinces; but they were not joined by a number of the inhabitants, and were defeated with great loss.

This war is evidently a source of great injury and regret, and at the same time of extraordinary irritation to both parties; for, independently of other causes of recrimination, each accuses the other of having brought about that state of things which threatens to place a most important and valuable portion of their country in the hands of a foreign Power, who has invaded it with a regular and well-appointed army, and is gradually taking possession of commanding points, from which it may be difficult for their united force hereafter to dislodge them. That they will unite, is, I think, to be calculated on, unless some event disastrous to the cause of the revolution itself takes place; for their mutual interest requires a union. But more of moderation and discretion may be necessary to bring it about than is at this time to be expected from the irritated feelings of some of the principal personages on both sides.

The city of Santa Fé, and a small district of country around it, also refuse to acknowledge the authority of the Government of Buenos Ayres.

In Paraguay, the events of the revolution have differed from those in any other province, as the inhabitants of that country have uniformly resisted the efforts of the other provinces to unite with them. After having aided the Spanish placed over them to repel a military force which had been sent to overthrow them, they themselves expelled from their country these authorities, and established a Government of their own, totally unconnected with that of the other provinces, with whom they manifest an unwillingness to keep up even a commercial intercourse.

This has given rise to a suspicion in the minds of some that there is a secret predilection among them for the ancient order of things. But, from what is said of their cold and calculating character, from the safe position of their country, and its capacity to supply its own wants, it is probable that their object is to husband their resources, and profit by the exertions of others, without giving their own in aid of them; and possibly, in case of ultimate failure, to place their conduct in a less objectionable point of view before the Government of Spain. Whatever may have been their motives, they have hitherto contrived to escape, in a great measure, the evils of war.

Their resources in men and money are said to be considerable, and no country is more independent of foreign supplies.

Their conduct furnishes a striking contrast to that of the people of Buenos Ayres, who entered into the revolution with unbounded zeal and energy, and have ever been ready to meet the difficulties of so great an undertaking. This circumstance, connected with their local situation, greater resources, and more general information, and perhaps the fact of their having been the first to get power into their hands, have had the effect to give them a controlling influence over the revolutionary Government, which has not failed to excite, in some degree, the jealousy of the other provinces, and amongst themselves a feeling of superiority little calculated to allay that jealousy. Great evils were at one time apprehended from this state of things; but the Congress which met at Tucuman, in March, 1816, composed of deputies from the several provinces then united, assumed the sovereign power of the country, boldly declared its absolute independence, and adopted a provisional form of government, which is understood to have the effect of allaying dissensions, and of introducing a more regular administration of public affairs.

It will be seen, from the documents in your possession, that this provisional constitution recognises many of the principles of free government, but with such drawbacks as are little calculated to enforce them in practice. Great allowances are doubtless to be made for the circumstances of the times, and the danger and difficulty of tearing up ancient institutions, or of adapting new principles to them. But, after due allowance for all these considerations, it did not appear to me that so much had been done for the cause of civil liberty as might have been expected, or that those in power were its strongest advocates. It is generally admitted, however, that some changes for the better have been made. Much care seems to be taken to educate the rising generation; and as those who are now coming on the theatre of action have grown up since the commencement of the revolution, and have had the advantage of the light thrown in by it, it is fair to suppose that they will be better prepared to support and administer a free government than those whose habits were formed under the colonial Government of Spain.

The commerce and manufactures of the country have grown beyond its agriculture. Various causes, however, have contributed to lessen some branches of manufacture since the revolution, but commerce is understood to have been increased by it. A much greater variety and quantity of foreign goods is imported, and a greater demand is opened for the productions of the country. The city of Buenos Ayres is the seat of this commerce. From it, foreign and some domestic goods are spread through the interior, as far as Chili and Upper Peru, and, in return, the various productions are drawn to it. This trade is carried on principally by land, as is that between the different provinces, though some small portion of it finds its way up and down the large rivers forming the La Plata, which is itself not so much a river as a great bay. The abundance of cattle, horses, and mules, and of some other animals peculiar to the country, which are used in the mountainous regions of Peru, furnishes facilities for transportation not to be found in any other country so little improved; hence the price of transportation is very low, and the internal trade greater than it otherwise would be, though it had been materially lessened in some important branches by the war with Peru, and the system adopted in Paraguay.

The export and import trade is principally in the hands of the British, though the United States and other nations participate in it to a certain degree. It is depended on as the great source of revenue to the state; hence they have been tempted to make the duties very high, and to lay them upon both imports and exports, with the exception of lumber and military stores. This circumstance, connected with the fact that payment is demanded at the custom-house before the goods are delivered, has led to a regular system of smuggling, which is said to be carried to great excess, and doubtless occasions the official returns to fall short of the actual amount of the trade. This may be the reason why they were not given to us. The articles imported are almost every variety of European and East India goods, principally from England; rum, sugar, coffee, tobacco, cotton, and timber from Brazil; lumber of almost every description, codfish, furniture, gin, and some smaller articles from the United States, together with military stores, which, however, find their way into the country directly from Europe, and are thus furnished at a cheaper rate than we can sell them. The principal articles of export are taken from the various animals of the country, tame and wild, from the ox to the chinchilla, copper from Chili, and some of the precious metals drawn principally from Peru; but as gold is worth seventeen dollars per ounce, and passed by tale at that rate, very little of it is exported. Hence the currency of the country is gold, for they have no paper money. The "libranzas," or bills of credit, issued by the Government, are, however, an article of traffic among the merchants, as they are received in payment of one-half of the duties. No distinction is made in favor of the trade of any nation, save only that the British merchants have some peculiar facilities granted them in relation to their letters, which are an object of taxation, at least so far as applies to those sent out of the country.

In the official statements given to us, and to which I beg leave generally to refer for information as to the foreign relations, the productions, military and naval force, revenue, and population, the latter is stated at one million three hundred thousand, exclusive of Indians. This is understood as comprehending the population of all the provinces; but as some of them are not under the Government at Buenos Ayres, I have thought it proper to annex the several estimates I collected of the population of each province, as they may serve to give some general information on that point. The most immediate difficulty felt by the Government, whilst we were in the country, seemed to arise from the want of money; for, although the debt was small, their credit was low. It had not been found practicable to adopt a system of finance adequate to the exigencies of the times, though it would seem, from the statement given to us, that the revenue of the last year exceeded the expenses. The important events of the present year in Chili, of which you are informed, will doubtless have the effect to raise the credit of the country, and to lessen the pressure upon it, at least for a time, and will probably leave the Government more at leisure to attend to its internal affairs.

When we came away, it was understood that a committee of the Congress was engaged in draughting a new constitution, the power of forming and adopting it being exclusively vested in the Congress. Whether it will assume a federal or national character, is somewhat doubtful, as there are evidently two parties in the country, whose views in this respect are very different, and it is believed that they are both represented in the Congress. The one party is in favor of a consolidated or national Government, the other wishes for a federal Government, somewhat upon the principles of that of the United States. The probability seems to be that although there might be a majority of the people in the provinces generally in favor of the federal system, it would not be adopted, upon the ground that it was not so well calculated as a national Government to provide for the common defence—the great object now in view. The same general reason may be urged, perhaps, for giving to the latter, should it be adopted, less of a republican character than probably would have been given to it in more quiet and peaceful times. There is danger, too, as the power of forming and adopting the constitution is placed in the hands of a few, that the rights and privileges of the people may not be so well understood or attended to as they would have been had the people themselves had a more immediate agency in the affair. It is not to be doubted, however, that it will at least have a republican form, and be bottomed upon the principles of independence, which is contended for by all descriptions of politicians in the country who have taken part in the revolution, and will, it is believed, be supported by them, in any event, to the last extremity.

Their means of defence, of which they are fully aware, are, in proportion to their numbers, greater perhaps than those of almost any other people; and the duration and events of the war have strengthened the general determination never to submit to Spain. This determination rests upon the recollection of former sufferings and deprivations; upon a consciousness of their ability to defend and to govern themselves; and upon a conviction that, in case of submission on any terms, they would, sooner or later, be made to feel the vengeance of the mother country. These considerations, doubtless, have the most weight upon the minds of those who have taken a leading part. They, of course, use all their influence to enforce them, and thus to keep up the spirit of the revolution. In this they probably have had the less difficulty, as, although the sufferings of the people have been great, particularly in military service and in raising the contributions necessary for that service, yet the incubus of Spanish power being thrown off, and with it that train of followers who filled up almost every avenue to wealth and consequence, the higher classes have been awakened to a sense of advantages they did not before enjoy. They have seen their commerce freed from legal restraints, their articles of export become more valuable, their supplies furnished at a lower rate, and all the offices of Government or other employments laid open to them as fair objects of competition. The lower classes have found their labor more in demand and better paid for, and their importance in society greater than it formerly was.

They are yet, however, from their indolence, general want of education, and the great mixture of "castes" among them, in a degraded state, but little felt in the affairs of the Government. The stimulus now given will operate to produce a change in them for the better, and, it is to be presumed, will gradually have its effect, as their docility, intelligence, and activity, when called into service, give evidence that they are not deficient in natural or physical powers.

Labor, as it becomes more general, will become less irksome to individuals; and the gradual acquisition of property, which must necessarily result from it in such a country under a good Government, will doubtless produce the happy effects there which it has uniformly produced elsewhere, and more especially in countries where the population is small when compared to the extent of territory.

I am very sensible that I may have been led into errors of fact or inference. In that case, I can plead honesty of intention, and the difficulty of collecting at a single point, and within a limited time, correct information, or of analyzing that which was collected, respecting a people in a state of revolution, who are spread over an immense country, and whose habits, institutions, and language are so different from our own.

I have only to add, that we were politely received by the Supreme Director, who made every profession for our Government, and every offer of accommodation to us, as its agents, which we had a right to expect; and that the people manifested, on all occasions, the most friendly dispositions.

APPENDIX TO MR. RODNEY'S REPORT.

A.

Historical sketch of the revolution of the United Provinces of South America, from the 25th of May, 1810, until the opening of the National Congress on the 25th of March, 1816; written by Dr. Gregorio Funes, and appended to his History of Buenos Ayres, Paraguay, and Tucuman.

It is the advice of a sage that the history of revolutions should be written neither so long after they have happened that many of their events will be forgotten, nor so immediately after they have occurred as to preclude it from being executed with the requisite impartiality. In the last case, all who read it, sitting in judgment upon it, approve or condemn according to their feelings, and, in consequence, it is deemed a chaos of uncertainties. We have, therefore, determined to give merely a sketch of the revolution, and to refrain from such narration as would perhaps revive animosities which patriots wish never to see renewed.

A succession of reverses had deranged all the plans of defence adopted by Spain to resist the attacks of France. The pass of Sierra Morena being forced, the army of the enemy extended its conquests to the island of Leon. Affairs were in this desperate situation when the timorous Cisneros addressed his celebrated proclamation to the people, more for the sake of repelling the danger which menaced his authority, than of furnishing them rules to regulate their conduct in case of the French succeeding in their ambitious designs against the mother country. A martyr to the suspicions to which he had given himself up, as if he disdained artifice, he endeavored to gain credit with the people by palming upon them his statement of the utter imbecility of Spain, which they knew as well as he, for noble sincerity. In fine, he descended to propose a plan of national representation as remote from justice as from utility.

This was a conjuncture which the people of Buenos Ayres anxiously expected. That period had long passed away when America, without any object with which to compare herself, had believed men bound implicitly to be guided by the maxims of their predecessors. The revolution of North America, and the recent one of France, had revived among us the natural rights of man. The same regency, although thereby doing violence to its feelings, said to us, "that we were elevated to the dignity of freemen; that we were, not like our ancestors, oppressed by a yoke rendered more galling by their distance from the centre of power, viewed with indifference, and made vile by ignorance." In fine, in the reconquest of Buenos Ayres, by expelling the English, we had made trial of our strength; and convinced that we might now safely cast off the leading-strings of infancy, he believed that this was the time to shake off the authority of a decrepit and tyrannical mother. We were also impelled to this measure, from its appearing probable that Napoleon would render permanent the Government he had established in Spain.

A number of brave men* united themselves secretly for the purpose of extirpating tyranny, and at the risk of their tranquillity, and fortune, and life, formed the plan of this revolution. Though destitute of military force, they dared provoke a powerful viceroy; without experience, they yet lulled to sleep the vigilance of their governors; without money, they gained over many of the soldiery; without authority, they reigned in the hearts of their fellow-citizens. This being the situation of things, the volcano at last burst forth. A Junta of nine persons, with full powers,† assembled on the 25th May, 1810, agreeably to the summons of Cisneros, the viceroy. This was the first step in our revolution; a revolution effected without bloodshed, maintained by success, ardently desired by the good, and capable of producing the happiest effects.

Although the considerations we have mentioned would have justified the declaration of independence, the capital did not proceed to this extremity. It considered that to pass at once the immense interval between slavery and liberty would be a premature measure, and, contrary to the inviolable law of nature, that improvement shall be gradual.

Besides this, although they knew that the enjoyment of the social rights was an object so dear to the hearts of many Americans, they knew, also, that there were among them some timid men, who, exposing themselves to universal derision, reprobated the good purchased by any other than pacific means; others who, destitute of love of country, were strangers to the most heroic passions; and others so unenlightened as to deem servitude their natural and proper state.

As well to make an experiment upon these dissimilar classes of men as to leave the great measure of declaring independence untried till events should render it expedient, the capital limited itself, for the present, to the only plan sanctioned by prudence. This was, that the provinces, in the name of Ferdinand VII., should assume the direction of public affairs. Every thing prompted us to this innovation. The peninsular Government, its springs having lost their elasticity, appeared insufficient to secure the existence of the nation. The very provinces of Spain were, more or less, in open opposition to her authority. Her governmental orders were either entirely violated, or imperfectly obeyed. This monarchy was completely unhinged. The component parts of this vast body politic were so widely dispersed that they could have no tie capable of binding them together. This want of union rendered the nation weak. It was doubtful whether the Central Junta could, of itself, establish a regency. In fine, America was an integral part of the monarchy, and enjoyed equal rights with Spain.

This innovation excited greatly the feelings of the people, and gave birth to as little speculation. Men, who had submitted without a murmur to be treated as slaves, blessed the moment when, at least, they were no longer instrumental to their own sufferings. But, on the other hand, interest and arrogance caused the European Spaniards to regard with rage the newly-awakened energy of a people they had long contemned—an energy which menaced them with the deprivation of office and influence.

The oidores of Buenos Ayres were the first who manifested a disgust, unbounded and promotive of insubordination. The Junta excluded from the Government certain individuals‡ regardless of every thing but self-interest. For them it substituted others more worthy.

The royal marine, characterized by ignorance and indocility, also gave loose to selfish passions. It retired to Montevideo; endeavored to stir up the people to insurrection; implored succors from Brazil; dispersed the army; imprisoned its chiefs—even sent them to Spain: in fine, threw all things into confusion.

* These were Casteli, Belgrano, Chiclana, Paso, Vieytes, Pena, Danagueyra, Paso, Terrada, Tompson, Vieytes, Balcarce, Beruti, Rodriguez, Donado, Prigoyen.

† These were Colonel Seapedra, president; Casteli, Belgrano, Azeninaga, Alberti, Mateu, Larrea, Moreno, and Paso.

‡ They were sent to the Canaries, and were Cisneros, Velezco, Reyes, Billota, Carpe, Danaguexra, Escharraria, Medeano, and Cosis, the fiscal.

The state was upon the eve of a civil war. Lima, Montevideo, Paraguay, the chiefs of Cordova, Potosi, and Charcas, prepared themselves for a bloody contest with the capital and its adherents. But their animosity excited vigilance in the Government, and enthusiasm in the patriots.

To guide the people in the novel and daring career upon which they had entered, the Government and the clergy furnished them with productions written with ability and with energy. To enlighten the public, and, consequently, to triumph over the errors of education, was deemed a sacred duty. The conduct of the ecclesiastics was particularly praiseworthy, since they acted in opposition to the bishops of their diocesses, more occupied with the advantages of posts they feared to lose than interested for their flocks.

As the provincial chiefs in opposition to the Government were deaf to persuasion, it determined to obtain by force for the people the enjoyment of their rights. It organized an auxiliary expedition to operate against the enemies of liberty in the interior provinces. At this very time Concha, Governor of Cordova, and the bishop Orellana, excited by the ardent Liniers, viewed the revolution as a criminal enterprise against the state, and excited the people to disobedience and to vengeance. To cure them of this phrensy, and to convince them that they were laboring for their own ruin and that of the people, my opinion, delivered in a Junta,* was ineffectual. At last, these deluded men discovered, to their cost, that they were struggling in an unknown sea against a tempest they could not withstand. Abandoned by their own soldiers, who never heartily embraced their cause, they were taken prisoners.†

The Junta determined to cement the revolutionary Government with the blood of those mistaken men, and thus to terrify into silence the enemies of freedom. When informed of this resolve, my surprise and grief were equally great. It was on the eve of its execution that I was informed of this determination. To avert from a cause, so far untainted by injustice, the imputation of atrocity, nay, even of sacrilege—for such those accustomed to kneel before their bishops would have deemed this act; to prevent the secession from the patriot cause of many reputable and influential families,‡ whose reputation and feelings such an execution would have deeply wounded; in fine, impelled by humanity, I felt bound to urge these reasons upon Don Francisco Antonio Ocampo and Don Hipoleto Vieytes, chiefs of the expedition, and to supplicate the suspension of so odious a sentence. The impressions which these reasons, and others added by my brother, Don Ambrosio Funes, made upon their minds, produced the desired effect a few hours before the time appointed to inflict the punishment. The Government deemed this extreme moderation incompatible with the security of the state. The blockade of the capital by the royal marine from Montevideo; the intrigues of the European Spaniards, ever on the alert; in fine, opinions in favor of Liniers, whispered among our troops, the companions of his dangers and his glory, compelled the Government to choose between the death of these conspirators, and the ruin of dawning liberty. Placed in this dilemma, from a sense of duty, it did violence to its feelings and confirmed the sentence, except that part relating to the bishop. Thus died (prematurely) men who, in other times, might have been useful citizens.§

Among the chiefs assembled by Concha and Liniers, the most conspicuous were Sans, Governor of Potosi, and Nieto, President of Charcas. Nieto, licentious as was ever any minion of tyranny, oppressed with vexations each garrison under his command, imprisoning the soldiers in caverns, and even condemning them to toil in bakehouses. Thus this idiot expected to prop the tottering fabric of slavery, and to perpetuate meanness of spirit and misery. While these and other events agitated the centre of Peru, the Junta gave additional respectability to the auxiliary expedition. Casteli having resigned the command, Don Antonio Balcarce was appointed in his stead. The victory of Suipacha put an end to the enterprises of certain rash men. The major general, Cordoba, Sans, and Nieto, were shortly after put to death.

It was not so much from external obstacles, as from a weakness common to all states in times of revolution, that our affairs were not always prosperous. It must be perceived that we are now about to speak from intestine dissensions. When we threw off the yoke, we thought that, in organizing a Government, it was impossible to recede too much from the tyranny which had caused our sufferings and our shame. A youth of talents and information, says a modern author, astonished at reading, in each page of the ancients, a diary of what passed before his eyes in the late French revolution, happily thought of writing its history, with passages extracted from these authors; and, without any other labor than that of citation, composed an original work. So true it is, adds he, that there are no annals more authentic and instructive than those of the human heart. When we attentively consider our dissensions, it appears as if Cicero, and Tacitus, and Sallust were their historians.

Governments destitute of solid foundations will always be playthings. Scarcely had the first Junta begun to exercise its authority, when the clouds gathered and the lightnings flashed around them. One germ of discontent, not dissembled, was exclusion from a share in command of the deputies of the people, appointed to give a legal existence and form to the new political‖ structure. This exclusion excited personal resentments; and those who deemed themselves injured endeavored to avenge themselves in the name of the public weal. The events which occurred in consequence will be recounted in the course of this sketch.

These provinces were now the theatres of civil war. The Paraguayans had not yet resolved to sacrifice a tranquil slavery for a liberty precarious and tumultuary. The first Junta perceived that this state of that province was the consequence of fears inspired by its governor, Velasco, and felt it a sacred duty to open its eyes to its interest and honor. This was the object of another expedition, commanded by Don Manuel Belgrano. It was, at first, unsuccessful; but what three bloody battles failed to win, was the fruit of a negotiation most sagaciously conducted by the general. The Paraguayans began to be persuaded that the zeal of Velasco was refined selfishness, obedience to him meanness of spirit, and submission to Spain contrary to the public good. The movements of the enemy at Montevideo, until now, though seditious, were unimportant. The arrival there of a viceroy for Buenos Ayres inspired the hope of humbling us—idiots! to indulge such a hope. We knew Elio, and counted upon his follies as most efficient auxiliaries. This soldier, whose motto was "boldness," promised the regency to convert the capital into a dungeon of slaves. It was natural that silly and extravagant expectations should be indulged and promulged to his employers by a viceroy incompetent to fill the most petty office. Elio had the insolence to require the Junta to recognise him; but this body treated his demand with the contempt it deserved.

* This Junta met at the house of the Governor, Concha: Liniers, Orellana, two oidores, Nonorarios, Colonel Allende, the asesor Rodriguez, the alcaldes ordinarios, the Ministro de las Caxas, Moreno, and myself, were present. Talone was in favor of the capital. My opinion may be seen in the Gazeta de Buenos Ayres, or in the Periodico Espanol.

† Except the oidores and alcaldes ordinarios.

‡ Allende and Rodriguez were related to the principal families of Cordova, Liniers, and Concha, the most respectable of Buenos Ayres; some of the relatives of the two last had taken part in the revolution.

§ The execution took place between the Post Cobeza del Tigra and that of Lobaton.

‖ To unite the provinces in a Congress, by their representatives, was the first resolve of the capital. Circular letters having been written for this purpose by the Junta, elections were holden in the most tranquil cities. In these letters it was stated that the deputies, when elected, should be incorporated in the Government. It was now the middle of December, and the deputies (of whom I was one, representing Cordova) were not incorporated.

In consequence of this repulse, Elio declared the Junta rebellious, and answerable for all the blood that might be shed in the contest. His first effort was to reduce the Orientals to obedience. But these brave men taught him what daring spirits, in robust bodies, could effect. The conquest of Gualeguaichu and the victory at Soriana were merely preludes to actions more glorious.

Certainly the fury of Elio was far less dreadful to the state than the internal dissensions which now convulsed it. While the Junta of Deputies labored in performance of its duties, new plots were hatched, during a repose which was compulsatory, by a rival party. It was attempted, by black calumny, to abuse credulity in order to render the deputies suspected. It was whispered that they intended to sell their country to the Portuguese for money and office—a base slander,* which never would have obtained believers, were it not true at all times that the great characteristic in party is blind deference to leaders. The Junta did not yield to this persecution, but the deputies, stigmatized as traitors and tyrants, opposed no other shield against calumny than a faithful discharge of duty.

Nevertheless, they were still victims of detraction, when a revolution, konwn as that of the 5th and 6th of April, in which the Government had no share, took place. This event afforded no pleasure to the Junta; it knew that in the ordinary course of the passions one revolution engenders others of the same kind; for when parties are once formed, interest and justice become with them convertible terms. The Junta had always been persuaded that the true object of the revolution ought to be to secure the people the advantages of a free Government. It held the opinion that persons in authority, if unrestrained by the jealous and unceasing attention of colleagues, invariably become corrupt; that, after being guilty of usurpations, to become despotic, became necessary to insure impunity; and that from violations of the laws to despotism is but a step. Supported by these reasons, and the unanimous vote of the people, it introduced the government of Juntas into all the provinces.

Animated by the same spirit, it introduced, also, the liberty of the press. The Junta was of opinion that the time had arrived when thought ought no longer to be imprisoned by the will of the magistrate, who, in the words of a celebrated genius, "with the cord that binds it in his hand, measures and fixes the distance of its flight."

These cases were succeeded by others of a different nature and importance. To excite the Orientals to resist their foe, and not to be at the mercy of the furious Elio and his rapacious followers, among the different objects soliciting attention, deserve the preference. By repeating frequently the words Sparta, Rome, liberty, patriotism, and by aid lavish and opportune, we had at last the consolation of interesting them in the salvation of the country. The taking of Canelones by Don Benancio Benovidez, and the victory of San José, gained by the troops of Don José Artigas, will always excite delightful feelings. But the Junta expected to gather the best fruits after, from policy, it had transferred the command of the army, and sent reinforcements to Colonel Don José Rondeau. Nor was it deceived; the towns of Minas, San Carlos, and Maldonado yielded successively to the conqueror Don Manuel Artigas; and the Orientals, rising in mass, invested the walls of Montevideo. Success so brilliant filled Elio with consternation, and made him deem it necessary to stop the patriots in their prosperous career, by some great effort. Twelve hundred of his best troops, with a great train of artillery, occupied Piedras. Notwithstanding their superiority in numbers, arms, situation, and discipline, they were conquered by men who, animated by the glory of conquering, forgot their nakedness, weariness, and all the horrors of death. The General, Don José Artigas, manifested on this occasion that ardor and coolness with which he inflamed or moderated the passions of his troops, as circumstances required.

These victories, and General Rondeau's removal of his head-quarters to Mercedeo, for the purpose of besieging Montevideo, filled Elio, till then over-confident, with despair. He inquired of the Junta if an accommodation were possible, and offered to purchase it, even with the humiliating sacrifice of his office. While the Junta was deliberating upon this proposal, it received intelligence that Paraguay had at last awakened from its lethargy, and turned against its oppressors arms placed in the hands of its sons in order to be used against the country, thus profiting by its error. This pleasing information produced a reply to Elio, which showed him that nothing remained for him but submission.

This energetic reply lighted up anew his flame of war. Elio, hearkening alone to the rage which filled his bosom, prepared to bombard the capital. Michelena, with a squadron of five ships, appeared off the harbor, and informed the Junta of his hostile intent. This body, unintimidated, boldly answered, in reply, "Proceed, and receive practical lessons of the energy of a people whose courage and resources are incalculable." The bombardment was executed, but with more injury to the enemy than to the capital.

It is now time to turn our eyes to the army of Peru. Thus far it was successful. Casteli, with six thousand men under his command in the vicinity of Desaguedero, expected decisive events, which would cover our arms with glory;† but, instead of adopting measures suitable to his circumstances, he entered into useless negotiations, and obtained an armistice, which Goyeneche perfidiously turned to his own advantage. Six days before it expired, the armies of the country were attacked in Guagy and Chibiraga, points distinct and distant from each other. In the first battle, the enemy was victorious; in the second, (at Chibiraga,) neither party conquered, but the dispersion of our army left the foe master of the field of battle on the following day. Our auxiliary expedition being thus unfortunate, the enemies became masters of Upper Peru. The Junta was undismayed by this reverse of fortune. In its proclamation to the people, it reminded them that the Roman Senate, after the defeat at Cana, thanked the consul Varro for not despairing of the republic, and declared that it did not despair. This proclamation, circulated throughout the country, roused the people to generous exertions.

It is proper here to narrate the capture of the island of Rota. The besieging army of Montevideo was greatly in want of powder, and this island contained a quantity equal to what it required. Although the attack was extremely hazardous, it was made with sagacity and valor by Don José Quesado, commander of our troops, and crowned with success. He abandoned it, after spiking the cannon, bringing with him twenty quintals of powder.

We had not only to contend against the Spanish troops, but also to be on our guard against a stranger whose ambition was well known. Our revolution had early awakened the policy of the Portuguese, and the court of Brazil, under the pretext of preserving in favor of Ferdinand VII. the integrity of his dominions, desired to get possession of his South American territories, in order to secure the rights which might accrue to the Princess Carlota. The Junta considered that, if Portugal refrained from doing what both her fears and her ambition prompted, it would be a phenomenon in history. It, therefore, mistrusted this Power, and took all the precautions prudence dictated to render Elio's demands for assistance unavailing.

The court of Brazil caused its troops to enter the territory of the state, but, before it resorted to arms, made experiment of what it could effect by policy. Removing at last the veil that had enveloped its designs, it proposed to the

*In support of this calumny, a letter written by the English Captain Fleming to the Government of Chili was triumphantly urged. But Lord Strangford, the British ambassador near the Prince Regent of Portugal, in his official letter of September 7th to the Governor of Buenos Ayres, thus expresses himself: "I can, in the most authentic manner, in the name of my court, disavow the letter of Captain Fleming."

†As Casteli himself states in a despatch.

Junta to purchase, by voluntary submission, its acknowledgment of the independence of La Plata, and its solemn engagement that, even if Ferdinand recovered the Spanish throne, it should not be again subjected to the authority of the mother country. The Junta considered that it would merit public hatred and vengeance, should it hearken favorably to a proposal with which it could not comply without imbecility and baseness, although, since the victory of Goyeneche had made him master of Peru, almost environed with foes, the Junta thought only of putting into requisition all the resources of the country, and, when these failed, to bury itself beneath its ruins. A little less folly on the part of Elio would have placed him in a situation to open a negotiation (as he proposed) with the Junta, to have assisted and been assisted by it against the Portuguese, and to have settled satisfactorily all matters in controversy. From the various sources for bettering the situation of the country which suggested themselves to the Junta, it selected that of reforming the Government. We had long experienced the evils of a system disproportioned, incapable of commanding means adequate to the ends to be effected, and destitute of the power necessary for putting in motion and directing the machine of government. The exclusion of the deputies from a share in the Government, which we have before related, may have resulted from artifice, precipitation, or other cause; but it is certain that to have admitted them all would have been incompatible with the secrecy, celerity, and vigor, without which to govern well is impossible. To obviate the inconveniences resulting from the want of these essentials, the Junta determined to create an executive power which, in the language of the sapient Necker, "should in the body politic represent that mysterious power which in man causes the action to correspond with the will." The consideration that, when the executive authority has no just limits, the state is but a confused heap of oppressors and oppressed, induced the Junta, in order to temper it, to reserve to itself, with the title guardian of the public rights, the power of legislation; not, however, to its full extent, for it could be thus exercised only by a national Congress, but merely to provide for exigencies, to restrain the operation of laws prejudicial to the state, to deliberate upon important affairs, and to calm the distrust in their governors with which growing fondness for liberty inspired the people.

With these limitations the Junta created an executive power, vested in three persons, who were Dr. Don Juan José Paso, Don Feliciano Chiclana, and Don Manuel Sarratia. If these new magistrates would have respected the barriers that limited their power, they would have spared the capital a tumult, the deputies an affront, and their own reputations a death-wound. From a reprehensible desire of authority, without the proper counterpoise, they stigmatized the regulation made by the deputies, in virtue of the power they had reserved, "as a code calculated to precipitate the country into the abyss of ruin." The deputies being made the victims of public disorder, their place in the Government remained vacant. The manifestoes issued in justification of this measure could easily have been refuted; but the deputies, aware that, when the feelings of the people are in a state of irritation, it is in vain to appeal to them for justice, wisely trusted their defence to events which they were confident would, sooner or later, make apparent their innocence. They did not miscalculate: for the prosperity subsequently enjoyed by the country, under a political system very similar to the one they proposed, has completely refuted the calumnies of their adversaries.

It is impossible, in a sketch like the present, to give a full view of the perturbed state in which this violent measure left the capital. It was divided into factions familiar with every kind of petty artifice. Bitter invectives, false relations, exaggerated fears, were employed to obtain whatever they deemed promotive of their interests. "Each party," says an intelligent observer, "strengthens itself by railing at and calumniating its opponents. Party zeal gives reputation to factions, and to be deemed by them a man of worth, it is sufficient to be one of them." The most despicable persons were selected for chiefs, for the absence of talent and honesty insured their innocuousness. The situation of the capital was truly deplorable.

In this state of things, the sergeants, corporals, and soldiers of the 1st regiment openly mutinied and jeopardized their safety, by indiscreetly attempting to prevail against their officers. The capital was converted into a field of battle. The mutineers were compelled to surrender, and eleven of their number were executed to punish this outrage against the laws. The Government did not confirm their sentence with dry eyes, but it knew that rulers invariably bring their authority into contempt by giving impunity to criminals.

Fear and trouble mingle with the very elements of unstable Governments. The deputies of the people retired to their hearths, after they were left at liberty to do so, by their exclusion on the 5th and 6th of April from the Government. The intractable bishop Orellana, by his hypocrisy, obtained his restoration to a chair from which his crimes excluded him. These occurrences augmented distrust and jealousy. When Government adheres to a party, it makes, says a sage, the political bark to incline to one side, and accelerate a shipwreck in which it is also lost. It is true, though, adds he, that neutrality is not always warranted by justice, but rather by ambition, which, standing aloof from disorders, draws from them its greatest advantages.

While the bosom of the country was thus torn to pieces, the extremities were in no better condition. It is certain that, in consequence of an almost general insurrection of the Indians, the district of Paz was recovered, the city besieged, and the army of Lombera routed; it is also true that the brave Don Estevan Arce made himself master of Cochabamba. But, notwithstanding these triumphs, the conqueror of Guaqui retained his conquest. The retreat made from Potosi, by Colonel Don Juan Martin Pueyrredon, with the remnant of the army and wealth of the country, was executed so heroically that it deserves to be taken for a model. It is only given to intrepid spirits to make themselves respected in the hour of danger.

The Banda Oriental presented nothing which could tranquillize us. It is true that the Portuguese, though acting with their accustomed dissimulation, had not gathered its expected fruits. Their troops had approached Montevideo with the hope that, circumstances opening to them the gates, she would change her language, even if her feelings remained unchanged. Experience showed that the projects of cabinets sometimes fail. A treaty of peace made between this city and the capital, by which it was agreed that, upon our troops raising the siege, and retiring beyond the Uruguay, the Portuguese should evacuate the Banda Oriental, disconcerted all their plans. Still they did not despair. As remarkable for perfidy as we for good faith, by a scandalous invasion on their part, they renewed the war, and gave the troops of General Artigas an opportunity of showing these foes that none offended them with impunity. It was evident that to obtain Montevideo was the object of the Portuguese. Their seductive influence induced her to break the treaty, and renew the blockade of the capital.

It is only the pusillanimous that are disheartened by danger. Men count the number of their efforts by their reverses. Fortune enters into their calculations in doubtful cases, but they rely solely on virtue. The Government, convinced that victory is not essential, and that brave men, when reduced to the greatest straits, are most efficient, undismayed, strained every nerve to save us. The scarcity of money was supplied by a confiscation of enemy's property, and an annual contribution of six hundred and thirty-eight thousand dollars; an estado major-general was created; a methodical plan furnished for reforming the army; subordination was better established; the liberty of the press confirmed; the army of Peru reinforced; and additional troops opposed to the coalition of our enemies.

While these measures were adopting, a new occurrence relighted the torch of discord in the capital. By a regulation of the executive power, an assembly, to meet at stated periods, was organized, for the object of deliberating, d uring a session positively limited to eight days, upon great state affairs, and of selecting every six months a successor to the chief of the Government, whose term of service expired. As love of liberty had generated inquietude and distrust, it was difficult to take any step without interrupting tranquillity. Don Juan Martin Pueyrrdon was elected. The assembly considered that it could not without imbecility refrain from assuming supremacy over the General Government and all the provinces of the Union. This was stigmatized by the executive, as an excess subversive of the law which gave this body being. The assembly urged that the law cited against them was the work of force; force terminated the contest, the assembly was dissolved, and the citizens still more disunited.

Discord, the tendency of which is to subvert all authority, debilitates the state. But this does not happen when it is awakened by love of liberty. Nothing is more natural than that the people should observe with fear the hand which governs them, but it is a fear neither enervating courage nor weakening understanding. The confusion into which General Arce, after the rout at Astete, and General Artigas, after a victory over a division of Portuguese, put the generals Goyeneche and Sousa, ought to have made them know that attempts against liberty are always vain. The court of Brazil, convinced of this truth, perceived that it would be best for it to be upon terms of amity with us. It, therefore, by its plenipotentiary, Don Juan de Redemarker, submitted proposals to us, to which, under the guaranty of Great Britain, we acceded.

Although Goyeneche, in Upper Peru, was filled with grief by the desertion of his troops, and other repeated misfortunes, pride would not permit him to abandon his conquest. Thus circumstanced, availing himself of our retreat to Tucuman, from the right bank of the river Suipacha, he resolved to attempt the conquest of Cochabamba. With the greatest and best part of his troops he marched, routed General Arce, and approached the city. Antezana, president of its Junta, perceiving himself without resources, offered submission, and implored the clemency of the conqueror. This proceeding, though prudent, was viewed with extreme disgust by a magnanimous people who had acquired so much glory. Although destitute of solid support, they preferred the horrors of war to the advantages of a humiliating peace, and commenced an irregular fight, in which the women* intermingled with the men. The contest was very unequal; after some resistance they yielded with considerable loss. This gallantry was sufficient to incite Goyeneche to the most base and cruel vengeance. The town was delivered up to plunder for three hours, which afforded opportunity for the commission of every sort of crime. That the soldiers should have been guilty of monstrous excess, is not surprising, since Goyeneche, himself incited them by his example.† It is a fact, well authenticated, that, entering with one-half of his cavalry the gate of the mother church, the sacrament being exposed, he killed, with a stroke of his sword, the fiscal Lopez Andrea, who presented it trembling with terror.

He then pursued boldly the several precedents of tyrants: by banishments, confiscations, and executions, this homicide rivalled Nero in infamy. In the places subjected to his yoke, a gesture, a clouded visage, an indiscreet word, a tear stealing down the cheek, was a crime of state. It may be remembered that eleven of the dispersed soldiers of General Arce were sacrificed to his vengeance at Chuquisaca. It was necessary for the timid to be encompassed by men like themselves, that they might not encounter, on whichever side they turned, this head of Medusa which froze the heart. But, in general, he failed to obtained the expected fruit from his barbarous policy. He inspired more hatred than terror. On all sides his troops were attacked with fury.

While we are drawing near the moment when the arms of the country achieved more important victories over the enemy, let us notice other successes, more nearly relating to the capital.

The measures of the Portuguese we last mentioned, and the obstinate resistance of Montevideo, induced the Government to send Don Manuel Sarratea to the other side of the river, as its representative and general. The primary object of this mission was to renew the siege of Montevideo, and to set limits to extravagant pride. The success of this undertaking depended upon the co-operation of the eastern with the western troops. But the appointment of Sarratea was not approved by General Artigas, and his jealousy impeded the execution of this project. But at last, after some opposition from Agui and Salto Chico, the union which should ever subsist between the several members of the same state was in fact obtained. Some troops joined the army, though slowly, and bodies of men were stationed in the vicinity of Montevideo by General Rondeau. The governor, Vigodet, perceived that this new siege was about to produce inevitable misfortune. Knowing that all our forces had not united, he formed the design of surprising our camp, and executed it with vivacity, at the head of two thousand men. In this history are recorded few days more glorious than the 31st of December, 1812, in which our general, his subalterns, Soler, Ortiguera, Quintana, Eocalada, and other officers, manifested a valor and intelligence worthy our cause. Their efforts made the audacity of the enemy degenerate into cowardice. Being very roughly handled, the foe retreated, leaving dead on the field of battle Major General Muesas, with many officers and soldiers. Many prisoners were taken.

It was decreed that our freedom should be purchased with blood and with danger. The rejoicings for this victory were mingled with astonishment at the discovery of a most atrocious plot. A considerable number of European Spaniards, resident in Buenos Ayres, had confederated to cover it with havoc and mourning. These perfidious associates held their treasonable meetings in profound secrecy, and adjusted a plan so inhuman that posterity will be unable to read the account of it without shuddering. The members of the Government, the magistrates, the most zealous Americans, and even European Spaniards, friendly to independence, were to be beheaded on the scaffold. Those who escaped from the carnage were to be banished from their habitations, to make room for Spaniards from the interior. The provinces, these assassins expected, would speedily be subjugated to their authority. Martin de Alzaga, a man formed by nature for crimes of this sort, had the direction and execution of this atrocious conspiracy confided to him. For the sake of humanity, the tutelar genius of the country defeated the plan of these conspirators. At the very instant they were issuing forth to commence the work of desolation, they were discovered and arrested sword in hand. When this affair became public, indignation could be read in every countenance. By the assistance of the citizens, the principal criminals were apprehended. The Government, subjecting these disturbers of the public peace to the utmost rigor of the law, inflicted on those the punishment they designed for others.

While we were rejoicing at our escape from so atrocious a plot, we were still apprehensive of being assailed by an army which, considering our weakness as part of its strength, menaced us from Jujuy and Salta. Three thousand men, with three pieces of artillery, commanded by General Don Pio de Trestan, a native of Arequipa, and second in command of Goyeneche, fell upon our army of Tucuman, amounting to only sixteen hundred soldiers; the greater part of them heard in this battle for the first time the whistling of balls. Only the most daring could hope for victory. General Belgrano, who united the most insinuating sweetness of manners with the most rigid justice, possessing, too, the art of penetrating the designs of the enemy and concealing his own, at the head of a patriotic band of the vicinity, decided the fortune of the day. Colonel Don Raymond Balcarce also signalized himself; where the battle most raged, there was he to be found. The other officers also entitled themselves to their country's gratitude. As if they had not been humbled in the action of the 24th of September, the enemy offered us a new insult on the following day. Conquered as they were, without artillery, munitions, or baggage, they dared demand the surrender of a town to which the infantry had retired with part of the cavalry. The Major General Don Eustacio Diaz Velis, who commanded there, was one of those men who live only for their country. This energetic reply put to flight the hope which the enemies were silly enough to indulge, and forced them to a disorderly and shameful retreat.

* To commemorate the heroism of these families, and as an incitement to patriotism, an ayudante in each corps of the army of Peru, at roll-calling in the evening, calls out the women of Cochabamba, as if they ought to be presented, and a sergeant replies, they died in the field of honor.

† By the express orders of Goyeneche the monastery of Santa Clara was not plundered, because he knew that the most valuable property of the town was there deposited, and wished to appropriate it to his own use.

The news of this memorable victory reached the capital when it was convulsed by a new commotion. The spirit of party we have so much lamented on every change in the Government produced some disturbance. In this state of things, says an elegant observer, no one grasped the command but an adventurer destined to fall by reason of his very elevation. To give a successor to the chief of the Government, whose term of service expired, the assembly met and chose Dr. Don Pedro Medrano; a popular commotion ensued. The consistorial assembly reassumed the authorities of the people: a new Government was appointed, composed of the citizens Don Juan José Paso, Don Nicholas Pena, and Don Antonio Albares Jonte, and was recognised.

Power is a mere nullity, if those who ought to obey it think that in all cases they have a right to sit in judgment upon what it commands. This was the situation of the state. Instead of having recourse to the energetic measures necessary to support Governments, the new Government weakly resorted to decrying the one which had been subverted, to promising great advantages from the subsisting one. It believed that a general assembly, with unlimited powers, was indispensably necessary to give constitutional existence to the state, and summonses were issued for this purpose.

This step being taken, it turned its attention to the internal and external security of the state. The European Spaniards had not taken learning from the exemplary chastisements we had inflicted upon them. More obstinate than ever, they confederated again for our destruction; the conspiracy was discovered, five of the traitors were executed, and their bodies exposed to public view, as a salutary warning to rash men.

This desperate plot originated in a criminal combination between the Spaniards resident in Buenos Ayres and Montevideo. Terrified by the siege of the last-mentioned place, and goaded by pride, upon Don Manuel Sarratea's withdrawing from the command, terminated that quarrel, which, the impoisoned source of a thousand evils, prevented the complete reunion of the Oriental troops with the besieging army. The besieged, who always retained the hope of profiting by our discord, were filled with consternation by the defeat of this conspiracy. Ever obstinate, they repeated their sallies; but the besiegers, headed by Soler, Villarino, Terrado, Cruz, Ortiguena, and French, repelled them all.

The possession of Montevideo was important to the Spaniards in prosecuting their scheme of subjugating us. Availing themselves of their marine, they infested our coasts, and endeavored to recover in brutal inroads the reputation they had lost in regular campaigns. With the confidence their superiority inspired, they landed two hundred and fifty men in the vicinity of San Lorenzo. They speedily perceived that they had landed only to augment their misfortunes. Attacked by a force as inferior in numbers as superior to them in bravery, by General San Martin, who, contemning death, knew how to win the favors of inconstant fortune, they were completely routed.

This victory was soon followed by that gained by the arms of the country over the army of Tristan. This general, fortified in the city of Salta, perhaps hoped to repair his past misfortunes by future success in his criminal designs against his country. The conqueror of Tucuman sought him there with his army, filled with the enthusiasm liberty inspires. The signal for battle was given, and it continued for three hours and a half. The combatants availing themselves of all that genius, science, valor, nay even desperation, could contribute to victory, we at last gained the battle. In the heat of the fight, Major General Diaz Velis was severely wounded, but not prizing so much a prolongation of his days as to risk for it the loss of the battle, he concealed his wound, and remained on the field until, his strength entirely failing him, he was forced to retire. In this action General Don Martin Rodriguez, and the commandantes de division, Donego, Saperi, Pico, Forest, Alvarez, Pedriel, Zelaga, Balcarce, Rodriguez, Arivalo, &c., were much distinguished. General Belgrano, being strongly urged by Tristan and his troops to set them at liberty, complied. This general, doubtless, thought it would be glorious to give freedom to men who had endeavored to enslave us, and that it would be impolitic to let slip an opportunity of conquering by clemency the hearts of those whose bodies his brave troops had by force subdued. For this and other generous acts, they made a base return. Freed from captivity, they employed in seducing the people the time they ought to have devoted to proclaiming our generosity and manifesting their gratitude.

After the victory of Salta, the tyrant Goyeneche fled precipitately to Oruro, thus relieving from suffering Potosi, Charcas, Cochabamba, Santa Cruz de la Sierra, and other places. The fear this defeat inspired caused him to supplicate General Belgrano for an armistice. The moderation of this officer, which no success could affect, induced him to grant it; but the perfidy of Goyeneche soon frustrated it.

Our country was now advancing by rapid strides to independence; we were led to think so from these victories, and principally because the national assembly was organized and commenced its session on the 31st of January, 1813. This body thought it a glaring inconsistency for the nation to make such sacrifices for liberty, and still to shelter slavery in its bosom. The situation of the country not permitting this evil to be corrected at once, this assembly decreed that, from the day of its creation, all children of slaves should be born free; thus, in part, repairing the injury committed against nature, and immortalizing its birthday.

It did itself no less honor by the abolition of tributo and mita, which were odious permissions to commit every species of crime, and the abolition of which had been decreed in 1811. These beneficent measures were no less politic than just. The Indians, whose services we needed, were thus conciliated.

The celebrated victory of Salta filled with surprise the Viceroy of Lima, and made him resort to the usual measures of alarmed despotism. The General Pezuela took the command of the army of Goyeneche, and, with a reinforcement, took up his head-quarters at Oruro. Pezuela undoubtedly possessed military talents far superior to those of Goyeneche, and, if towns which had sworn to be free could have been subdued, he would have achieved the odious victory.

All measures preparatory to a battle between the opposing armies were taken. The victory gained and the flame kindled by the spark of liberty in all parts, not even excepting Lima, presaged a happy issue to the patriots. But perhaps, to give us lessons of moderation and prudence, the Almighty decreed that we should lose the battles of Vilcapugio and Hayouma. Upper Peru was thus snatched from our hands. Pezuela extended his conquests even to Jujuy and Salta, and the remnant of our army took shelter in its former place of refuge, Tucuman.

But this imprudent contest could not impede nature in her course. Our felicity was the offspring of reverses which corrected our inexperience. From this fatal moment, a new enthusiasm for the country, and a new order of things gradually established, produced the happiest effects. The Cochabambinos, full of the fury desperation inspires, retired to Valle-Grande. Although one of the reverses incident to warfare had tried their fortitude, the victory of Florida, gained over a body of one thousand men, by General Warnes, in conjunction with his Cruecenos, checked the daring march of our forces. The flame was rapidly communicated. The same Warnes marched to Chiquitos, where he shut himself up with the royal troops. General Camargo defended himself in Chayanta, destroyed several detached parties, and preserved the province from the detested yoke. Padilla established his head-quarters at Yampamez, routed Tacon in many encounters, and changed the aspect of the enemy's affairs. The Indians made great exertions to prevent the yoke from which they had escaped being again imposed upon them, and tasted the pure pleasures of liberty.

After garrisoning several places in Peru, Pezuela brought a force equal to what he left there to Jujuy and Salta. Parties of the inhabitants under the orders of the Captain Seravia, and of the advance under their commandante Guemez, after the droves of horses and provisions had been withdrawn to places inaccessible to the enemy, attacked them whenever they moved and wherever they were posted. Those of the enemy who imprudently left the main body of their forces were instantly made prisoners by our parties. Never was partisan warfare better conducted, and more successful. General Pezuela saw with bitterness his laurels wither, and, to escape the ruin with which a half-starved army menaced him, retreated, first, to his ancient posts, and then, filled with apprehension, retired to Peru to succor there the terrified royalists.

He misled some patriots by blandishments, places, and promises, but always, distrusting them, kept them in subaltern stations, although the importance of their services entitled them to the first offices. One of these, Don Saturnio Castro, a native of Salta, whose efforts had cost his country dear, felt his indignation redoubled when he cast his eyes upon his wounds, and, impelled by wounded self-love, hearkened to the salutary counsels of reason. In this state of mind, he determined to avenge his country and himself, by a plot against the oppressors. It was discovered, its author arrested, and condemned to death.

Pezuela was unnecessarily cruel and vindictive. Enthusiasm for the country daily gained ground. The city of Cuzco at last sundered its chains, and new Peruvian heroes espoused the cause. Pinelo, the presbitero, Dr. Munecas, the King's brigadier, Pumakagua, and Angulo, joined the patriots, and caused an almost general revolution in public opinion. The two first triumphed at La Paz, but their lives and those of their troops were more endangered after the victory than during the battle. The enthusiastic Spaniards conceived the project of burying them under the ruins of their laurels. These barbarians had familiarized themselves with every species of crime. They poisoned the springs, and formed two mines for the destruction of the patriots. Their foresight was not sufficient to apprize them of the horrors that environed them. One of these mines exploded, and the death of a hundred and fifty persons (some say three hundred) was the melancholy result of this treachery. The people, who could only think of taking vengeance for this last and worst of their atrocities, put to the sword all the Spaniards, with their governor, Valdehoyos. In recompense for the risks they had incurred, these brave men deserved to be the arbiters of their fortune. But she is by nature a jilt, who denies her favors when most needed. Pinelo and Munecas left La Paz, and, uniting at Desaguedero, formed a body of eight hundred men, with which they opposed the troops of Pezuela, who marched in pursuit of them; battle was given, and the enemy was victorious, by reason of superiority of numbers.

The Indian Pumakagua marched upon Arequipa, that noble city, which, stifling its feelings, was enslaved. With manly courage, he quickly engaged an army of more than a thousand men, routed it, took prisoners its chief, Picoaga, the governor, Moscozo, and Lavalle, who, being conducted to Cuzco, were put to death. More than two hundred Spaniards were sacrificed to a just indignation. The victor was compelled to march to Cuzco, by the defeat of Pinelo and Munecas. Ramirez, a name that will be eternally infamous, pursued the patriots furiously. The retreat of Pumakagua left the passage to Arequipa open to the royalists, and afforded an opportunity to repeat the enormities perpetrated at La Paz.

Another of the Angulos had displayed his energy at Guamanga, routing four hundred Taleberinos detached by the Viceroy of Lima; but the capture of Arequipa by Ramirez called his attention to Cuzco. This great city was a prey to disorder; nothing could support its wretched existence; there the three Angulos were beheaded, and their heads carried upon a pike to Sicuani.

A reform of the Government, reducing it to a single Director of the state, in the person of the citizen Don Gervasio Posadas, placed in the capital great obstacles to the vibrations of the passions. Titus Livius observes that Rome would have perished, if, from a premature love of liberty, it had in its infancy abolished regal power. The public authority was strengthened by the politic measure of trusting the affairs of the state to the activity of a single individual.

Our Oriental army rendered itself more respectable by a stroke which proved its vigilance and its firmness. The Spaniards of Montevideo, losing the hope of advancing their cause by open warfare, had recourse to assassination. A conspiracy of their agents was discovered in our camp, and the traitors sacrificed to the public security.

But this fortunate discovery did not free the state from all peril, for in its bosom a storm was brewing, and ready to burst. General Artigas, that singular man, who united to extreme sensibility the appearance of coldness; a most insinuating urbanity to decent gravity; a daring frankness to courtesy; an exalted patriotism to a fidelity at times suspicious; the language of peace to a native inclination to discord; in fine, a lively love of independence to most extravagant notions as to the mode of achieving it—this man, we say, disgusted with the Government, because it bestowed rewards upon those he expected to see chastised, had already sowed the seeds of civil war among the troops. His great ascendency over the Orientals compelled them either to seek his amity, or to tremble at his enmity. Those citizens who loved order, labored with zeal and dexterity to extinguish a flame menacing ruin to the state. This end appeared to be obtained by an Oriental Congress, which General Rondeau convened in the name of the Government, for the purpose of nominating deputies for a National Congress and a provincial governor. All was on the eve of being verified, when General Artigas, as chief of the Orientals, commanded, in the name of the same Government, that the electors should present themselves at his head-quarters, in order to receive instructions from him. This proceeding, so strongly savoring of despotism, offended every one. The electors assembled in the chapel of Maciel, and fulfilled their trust. The real disposition of General Artigas then discovering itself, he annulled the Congress, thus assuming absolute power. But this daring measure had no effect upon what this body had done; the selection of deputies and a governor was celebrated in all the encampments, and the lastnamed officer began to exercise his functions. General Artigas viewed these measures with a hatred lively as dissembled, and prepared to avenge himself. Under various pretexts he withdrew from his country, and at last, in the garb of a countryman, deserted his post, thus leaving exposed the right of our line. This rash proceeding made it apparent that he preferred his own interests to those of his country; but many officers, and others of the Orientals, did not follow this pernicious example.

It is not easy to conceive the terrible confusion into which this event threw the besiegers. Three times orders were given to raise the siege, and as often they were revoked, so great were the evils on each side; at last the encampments were abandoned, with incalculable loss and unutterable grief. The enemy, upon discovering this, were filled with surprise, though they did not abandon themselves to immoderate joy, because they feared it might be a feint; but the people, less cautious, hurried away by the desire to breathe fresh air, went in crowds without the walls. From proper foresight, the redoubts of our advanced parties had not been abandoned; French, officer of the day, ordered a most unexpected discharge of cannon, which made the enemy attribute to stratagem what resulted, in truth, from our weakness. The terror this created in the city prevented sallies being made.

This advantage, combined with the lucky arrival, on the same day, of supplies, and the consolatory information that a small squadron was equipping to transport a reinforcement, changed the appearance of things. The public mind was tranquillized; the fugitives returned in parties; the people of the vicinity tendered their assistance, and General Rondeau knew how to profit by these inestimable advantages; the siege was renewed more efficiently than it ever had been.

The Director, Posadas, viewed the desertion of General Artigas with a hatred carried beyond the bounds of prudence. Taking counsel from his anger, he thought that justice should take its course. By a solemn decree, he declared him infamous, deprived of his offices, and an outlaw, and incited the people to pursue him, as a duty they owed the country; in fine, believing that he could stifle rebellion in the blood of the rebel chief, he set a price upon his head, offering six thousand dollars to whoever would bring him in, alive or dead. Experience has shown that moderation would have been far wiser than this violence. The Director took a wrong course; whether Artigas was as guilty as he thought him, the reader can decide. But even if he was so, what other effect could impotent rigor produce, than contempt of authority and obstinacy in the delinquent? Even this was not all. The Orientals had enthroned Artigas in their hearts; as that which is abhorred is deemed always to be in the wrong, the very proofs upon which the Director founded his decree were, with the partisans of Artigas, so many evidences of his innocence. This proscription became that of a vast district, and reconciliation almost impossible. God grant that we may not see this sad truth perpetuated!

The army of the capital and the naval force of the country were at this time considerably augmented. The troops demanded to be led to battle; the fleet panted to dispute with the enemy the command of the river; in short, the fortune of war gave us decisive successes. Two men, with all the talents required by the ends for which they were destined, the Secretary Larrea and Colonel Alvear, being substituted for General Rondeau, concerted the capture of Montevideo, and all obstacles yielded to their activity and the accuracy of their calculations. A naval battle, in which Brown commanded our ships, and defeated shamefully the Spaniards, who were stronger in vessels than we, made us masters of the port. To give the finishing stroke to their misfortunes, Montevideo shortly after yielded, notwithstanding a criminal correspondence between Vigodet and the patriot Torguez. Thus was despotism deprived of its stronghold.

Our Peruvian army was now commanded by General Rondeau, who, having sustained with credit the siege of Montevideo, had not the glory of triumphing over it. The Government transferred the command of this army from him to the conqueror of Montevideo. It is certain that Alvear united all the qualities of a warrior, and possessed a military experience, which he owed more to genius than to years. But this change of command was viewed by the chief of this army as the measure of a policy without forethought, and an ambition without limit. Something further contributed to render it odious, and this was the alarming suspicion that the country was about to be shamefully betrayed by treachery. This suspicion was countenanced by the anticipated mission of Don Ventura Vasquez, confidential officer of the Government, to place in the hands of Pezuela certain letters; his exclusive nomination to treat with this enemy; the sending commissioners to the Spanish court; and the appointment of new officers in this army. The public mind was thus distracted with doubts and apprehensions, when General Rondeau abdicated the command; notwithstanding which, his subalterns coalesced, the regiments confederated, and Alvear was not admitted.

This event was foreseen. A general disgust portended and precipitated it. It has often happened that people have refused to submit to despotism, and not known how to use liberty. The general, thus rejected by the army, returned to the capital, and was created Director. This impolitic act challenged hatred where there was already sufficient to incite to vengeance.

This election caused an almost universal murmur, which presaged important movements. The reasons assigned in justification of this dissatisfaction were, that the army of Peru not being able to obey as Supreme Director one whom they had refused to recognise as their chief, all the terrible effects of anarchy were about to be experienced; that the capital and other parts of the country felt too much animosity against the party to which the director owed his elevation, to recognise him without discontent; and that, under protection of the army of Peru and General Artigas, they might dissolve an assembly disgraced by intrigue, in their opinion, and prostrate an idol to which the tongue paid homage, the heart disavowed; in fine, that the recollection of those acts by which the province deemed themselves outraged, might induce them to push resentment further than they ought.

These apprehensions were, in a great measure, realized. The army of Peru refused obedience to the new Director. Cordova, listening more to anger than to prudence, preferred danger to ignominy, and withdrew from its connexion with the capital. Santa Fé, counting more upon its courage than strength, adhered to the system of independence it had adopted since the troops of Artigas had invaded it.

The situation of the army of Peru was critical and dangerous. The anxiety which began to prevail as to the consequences of these dissensions; desertion veiled under the shadow of a new Government; succors withdrawn; in fine, the unfortunate action of Tejar, multiplied cares, and alarmed the imagination. Nevertheless, General Rondeau did not lose his natural equanimity. He knew how to make the discontented hearken to reason, and to give a favorable beginning to an enterprise. Putting his army in motion, he opened an entrance into Peru, by the victories of Puesto Grande and Mochara.

The new Director perceived the cloud that had gathered over his head, and hastened to use all expedients in his power to avert it. Convinced that hope and fear are the great exciting principles of human actions, he endeavored to operate upon the first by rewards, upon the other by chastisements. These instruments failed in his hands. The tragical death of the unfortunate Ubeda, on one of the most solemn days of worship, caused less terror than indignation; and the triumph over the Cabildo of the Capital, by compelling it to subscribe an odious proclamation against General Artigas, served only to make it resolve to prolong its existence in spite of this usage.

On the eve of a political disorganization the Director marched the veteran troops to subject the towns to a detested yoke. But the chief of the vanguard, Don Ignacia Alvarez, with three hundred and fifty men under his command, ashamed of being the instrument of his exaltation and vengeance, declared in favor of those he was sent to attack, and arrested the suspected officers, among whom was General Viana, who came to take the command.

He encamped, and was joined by several detachments from Mendoza. The Director, surrounded in his encampment, put into play whatever could contribute to save him in so critical a situation, but in vain; for fortune had determined to put an end to his glory and prosperity. The Cabildo of Buenos Ayres, instructed by Alvarez, and called by general acclamation to the command, assumed it. The civicos, with many officers of distinction, rallied around it as its protectors. So many obstacles filled the Director with despair. At last he yielded, and, cast out of his country, was forced to beg an asylum in a foreign land. This cable being broken, the national assembly, with its system of favoritism and peculation, was involved in ruin. All, even the Orientals, irreconcilable enemies of the capital, applauded a success which appeared to be the beginning of order.

In order to give a successor to the deposed Director, a body of electors was constituted, who chose General Rondeau chief of the army of Peru, and named as his deputy Colonel Alvarez, who took the lead in the recent subversion of Alvear's authority.

His election would not have secured the public tranquillity if the causes which disturbed it had not been removed. It was perceived that heretofore the Executive, availing itself of the distractions or patience of the people, had gradually rendered itself absolute. Reason required that this power should be balanced by another. Therefore, a provisional statute was formed, and a Junta of Observation erected, to watch the punctual fulfilment of this law, to cry out against the least infraction, and to resist every thing prejudicial to the general good. It was to be regretted that this statute gave more liberty than was compatible with the public good; but we had just escaped from one of those cruel situations in which the excesses of oppression prevent us from seeing those of its relief. A system of distrust and restriction made authority a mere political skeleton. We shall see the disorders which arose in consequence.

One of the earliest advantages expected to result from this new order of things was the re-establishment of that fraternal union with the Orientals, the rupture of which had cost the country so many tears. The Cabildo of Buenos Ayres, regarding with indignation the proclamation Alvear had extorted from them, commanded it to be burned by the common executioner in the Plaza de Victoria. The Government also substituted moderation for the ancient system; and if the Orientals, with their chief, had been capable of perceiving the greatest enemy of the country and themselves to be anarchy, doubtless a reconciliation would have been effected. But experience has shown that they had determined to bury themselves in an abyss of evils rather than yield. Without doubt, too, General Artigas believed that a calm would diminish the authority with which he had been invested in tempestuous times.

The Government, fearful of seeing civil war propagated in the centre of the neighboring provinces, marched troops to Santa Fé, under the command of Don Juan José Viamont. This city was a key with which General Artigas opened at pleasure the door to his seditious communications. In order to remove the distrust, and to prevent the opposition of those in the vicinity of this city, the Deputy Director promised them perfect liberty, and that the troops should not meddle with their domestic affairs. The death of the governor, Candioti, produced much disorder. Contradictory pretensions, well or ill-founded, acrimonious debates, stratagems inseparable from party, all attended the selection of the lieutenant governor, Don Juan Francisco Tarragona. The city of Santa Fé was much incensed at this appointment. What resulted from it will be seen.

Grieved at the melancholy posture of affairs in this section of the country, we were consoled by pleasing prospects in Peru; we will give briefly the principal ideas of General Rondeau's manifests. Pezuela, filled with consternation, abandoned his positions, and retreated to the neighborhood of Oruro. The desertion of his soldiers, and the difficulty of subsisting those that remained, announced his weakness. Our troops improved in numbers, in arms, and discipline. The insurrection of La Costa by Penaranda and Reyes; the approach of Dr. Munecas; the state of fermentation in which all the provinces were; the aids on their march from the capital—all indicated a prosperous warfare.

It was necessary that the chance of arms should be sometimes inconstant as the throw of dice, to give the melancholy shading of misfortune to this picture. Our reverses commenced with the battle of Venta y Media, where a party of the enemy, attacking Brigadier Rodriguez, were, most unexpectedly, successful. This event seemed to give its character and color to the succeeding ones. The active Pezuela fell upon our army with the rapidity of lightning. To avoid the encounter, General Rondeau removed his camp to a rocky situation, remote from Cochabamba. Here the enemy sought him, filled with the boldness success inspires. Battle being inevitable, Rondeau took post at Sipisipi, forming a camp according to military rules. Hostilities commenced. The enemy would not have had much cause for boasting, if fortune, which a general cannot command, had not favored his cause. His left wing outflanked, his right wing almost routed, his centre almost destroyed by our artillery; such, said Rondeau, was the state of the battle, when a series of inauspicious occurrences gave the victory to the foe, and deprived us of glory and of hope.

The victory of Sipisipi, by turning the brain of Pezuela, advanced the cause of liberty. Our situation was not so disastrous as that of the United Provinces of Holland, when they caused themselves to be represented under the image of a ship, without sails and without rudder, at the mercy of the waves, with this Latin inscription, incertum quo fata ferant. General Rondeau placed his head-quarters at Tupiza, with the remnant of his army, and endeavored to reorganize it. Our Government, as if foreseeing the unfortunate issue of the battle, had sent forward troops, arms, and munitions; nor were the towns of the Union, at this distressful period, backward in extending assistance. The brave Camargo, La Medria, Padilla, Warnes, and Munecas, by rapid incursions, showed that the cause of liberty would prevail in spite of our misfortunes.

The accession of strength our cause seemed to gain, even by reverses, ought to have made Pezuela see that his hopes of re-establishing despotism were chimerical; but he still cherished the delusion. He displayed his inhumanity by atrocious violations of his prisoners' rights, appearing to think that to become a rebel was to cease to be a man, and to forfeit all claims to justice and to compassion. Even that sex* regarded with some respect by the most abandoned, was not exempt from his rage. Many women, among them the most circumspect matrons, were banished, or immured in dungeons.

The dangers which menaced the political existence of the country demanded an Executive sufficiently energetic to maintain order and to triumph over the enemy. Unfortunately, the provisional statute had too much curtailed the executive power. It was embarrassed by so many restrictions as to be prevented often from availing itself of circumstances upon which success depends, and which must be seized the instant they present themselves, or the opportunity is forever lost. In a situation so critical, the Director Suplente appealed to the sovereign people, and asked for a reform of the constitution. The capital, always docile and provident, when not misled by designing men, actuated by that prudence which dictates pacific measures, approved the proposed change,and by direct vote appointed reformers of the constitution.

* Among many others, Dona Antonio Paredez, Dona Justa Varela, Dona Felipa Barrientes, ladies of the age of nineteen; Dona Teresa Bustos, the two sisters Malarias, and Dona Barbara Cevallos, were imprisoned; Dona Teresa perished in prison; Dona Barbara was banished to Oruro, being forced to abandon nine infant children; the Malarias were also banished.

One of the most urgent objects which claimed the attention of Government wast he city of Santa Fé. The disgust with which this city saw itself governed by a lieutenant governor it abhorred, the exile of many reputable citizens, the suggestions of the Oriental chief, all conduced to some violent measure. The inhabitants rising in mass under the citizen Don Mericana Vera, and aided by the troops of Baxada, civil war commenced. General Viamont was attacked by the disaffected with all the fury that marks insurrections, and, after bloody contests, capitulated. We know not why the capitulation was not fulfilled. Cordova adhered to its system of independence. La Rioja imitated its example, and the other cities became more or less anarchical.

All desired a tutelary power, which, being the creature of the people, should be energetic enough to render the laws respected. This authority could only be derived from representatives of the people. The people, convinced of the necessity of the change, elected them, and a sovereign Congress was opened at Tucuman on the 25th March, 1816. Its principal care was to select a Director who would draw closely the cord of union, and direct the efforts of all to their darling object—independence. Don Juan Martin Pueyrredon was chosen Director.

With many, the most desirable object was to obtain a moment of calm, during which the supreme authority might be consigned to able hands. It was, however, at the very moment that the National Congress was deliberating on this matter that the tempest was heard to roar with the most violence.

In consequence of the resignation of the directorship ad interim by Colonel Alvarez, the Junta of Observation, in conjunction with the Cabildo of the capital, elevated Brigadier General Antonio Balcarce to that station as his successor. This remedy was momentary. The measure was by no means in consonance with the wishes of the people; and, by a kind of fatality which often presides over events, it was not long before an explosion was produced among materials so well prepared. The electors and elected were soon discovered figuring together on the theatre of discord.

In the meanwhile, the new Director ad interim used every exertion to destroy the seeds of discord, which had already produced so much ill blood between the Orientals and the capital, and to render all parties sensible of the advantages of living under the same law. Although the first attempt made by him for this laudable purpose promised a favorable result, every means were found in the end unavailing to bring about a reconciliation.

This discord had been propagated in the manner of a contagion; and the remedies applied to restrain its devastations were found to possess no efficacy. The city of Santa Fé,* although just escaped from a bloody contest, and threatened by dangers of a more serious nature, still pursued its peculiar ideas of independence, with what may more properly be called obstinacy than constancy.

Cordova, always devoted to the maxims of federalism, notwithstanding her having sent deputies to the General Congress, considered her absolute submission to the capital as unworthy a free people, and still cherished the idea of this submission being temporary.

The other provinces, according to their respective situations and characters, expressed more or less their dislike to what they considered a species of subjection.

The causes of this political phenomenon, if sought for, will not be difficult to be found. The opinion most prevalent in the provinces was decidedly in favor of the federative system, and which they were desirous of seeing realized, even in anticipation of all the essential and first objects of their new career. It had been the darling wish of the provinces, almost from the commencement of the revolution; one which had still greater charms for them, since they had seen it realized with so much glory in the United States of North America. For the present, however, the Governments, the capital, and not a few of the more intelligent citizens, were opposed to this idea. Each of these parties supported its opinion by weighty reasons. From the statement of those I am about to make, the enlightened reader may judge between them.

Those in favor of the Government already established were of opinion that the federative system could not be legally substituted until sanctioned by a General Congress; assuming it as a principle that the constitution of a state should receive its existence from the hands of the nation itself, and not from partial concurrence and unconnected acts; that, when the nation first regained its liberty, and all the provinces were united under the same Government, the present was the form which they adopted, and under this form it was that the existence of the republic had been preserved in the midst of the most trying disasters; that, until all the provinces could be again united—a thing by no means hopeless—it would be improper to deviate further than was absolutely unavoidable from what had before existed; and that, at all events, if the preponderance of the capital was an evil, it was one which would soon be corrected, when that preponderance ceased to be necessary to the common safety. Further reasons, derived from views of policy, were added. According to the federative system, said they, each state is sovereign and independent as respects the rest; each may possess, and in reality does possess, separate interests; it is, therefore, to be feared that each will rather seek what it may conceive to be its own interest than the interest which is common to all, and, in consequence of this egotism and misplaced jealousy, be involved in a common ruin; that, in the midst of the alarming dangers which threaten this newborn state, the necessity of a complete union of all the parts, under the guidance of one head, for the better concentration and direction of its forces, is dictated by the plainest maxims of prudence; and where, it was asked, can this be placed with more propriety than in the capital, where the revolution itself received its origin, whence every great effort in the general cause has emanated, and which, from its position, its enterprise, and intelligence, is enabled to manage the common concerns of the nation for the present, at least, to the greatest possible advantage? The first thing to be done, continued they, is to place our independence out of danger; let this be accomplished before we disagree about the manner of using it. They further insisted that it was not altogether safe to confide in the example of the United States of North America, which had always been educated in the republican virtues, and to which we were not to be compared, reared, as we have been, under the rod of despotism; and that it would be unwise to trust the fate of the nation, in such dangerous times, to virtues which had not yet been sufficiently put to the trial; that it would be most prudent to leave to time and education, under the influence of a free Government, to produce the same character of enlightened patriotism. Those of the federal party contended on different principles. They admitted that the Government of Buenos Ayres, the capital of the former viceroyalty, had been the first to shake off the Spanish yoke, and by its influence had induced the provinces to follow its example. At the same time, they alleged the repeated protestations on the part of this Government that its preponderance should be but momentary; that a General Congress should be convened without delay, for the purpose of fixing the General Government on a permanent basis. It was by these protestations that the provinces had been induced to enter into the views of the capital, and to place their resources at its disposal. They complained that so long a time had elapsed without performing this engagement; that their situation thus far was but little different from that under the Spanish monarchy; that they had obtained but little more than a change of masters. They did not deny the difficulty of calling a National Congress during the stormy period of the revolution, but said that, in default of a Congress, the General Government of the capital ought to have ceased, and the provinces ceased to be swayed by it, seeing that the general voice was in favor of the federative system. Far from being inadequate to the exigencies of the times and the objects of the revolution, they asserted that the individual acts of the provinces had contributed most to raise the character of the republic, and to advance the general cause. If our dissensions, said they, have caused us discredit with foreign nations, it is to be attributed to the clashing of the Government of the capital with the feelings and wishes of the provinces; that, as there can be no effect without a cause, the federative system, by putting an end to these odious rivalries and jealousies, would prevent the recurrence of scenes so disgraceful. It is true, said they, the tumultuous proceedings of the capital had generally sprung from other causes, chiefly from the inordinate thirst for office in many of its inhabitants, the ambitious turning to their advantage even the extreme jealousy of their liberties on the part of the people. Was it just, it was asked, that the provinces should be compelled to follow these frequent and capricious changes, in which they took no part? But would not these evils have long since ceased with the establishment of the federative system? What temptations could there be to seduce the aspiring in the limited and definite powers which the federative system would present? On the contrary, what could be more tempting to the ambitious than a system which enabled those in power to be the masters and arbiters of the republic—one which would enable them to prefer their flatterers and favorites, and those who were neither, but merely happened to be about them, to able and meritorious citizens; and to consult their private wishes more than the public good? They alleged that, in fact, the capital had thus far paid much more attention to its own peculiar interests than to the rights of the provinces; that she had gratified the ambition and avarice of many in the provinces, in order, by enlisting the human frailties and passions on her side, to sow the seeds of discord and disunion in other parts of the confederacy, these persons engaging to repress the sentiments of the people, and draw them into a subordination which accorded only with their interested views. When these things, said they, are impartially considered, how can we draw closer the cords of union under a Government like the present, which, by its oppressions as well as by its favors, weakens that love of country which the federative system has a tendency to foster—a system which, at the same time that it leaves the citizen in the full enjoyment of that portion of liberty which the good of society does not require him to surrender, imparts enough for all the purposes of the general safety and happiness? But let it not be said, continued they, that there are no republican virtues amongst us. To what else is to be attributed the noble resolution we have taken, and which we have sanctioned by our oaths, to die rather than not live free and independent? To what else that energetic and heroic resistance which has given so many days of glory to our country? And even if it be admitted that we do not possess those virtues, are they to be inculcated by the example of a Government which teaches nothing but selfishness and corruption?

Thus reasoned the opposite parties. With respect to our own opinion, we should say, that from the impossibility of attaining this end without encountering the evils of anarchy and perhaps civil war, on account of the preponderating influence of the capital, it was perhaps the wisest course on the part of the provinces to make a sacrifice for the present of their obedience to that unity of action, without which our ultimate success must be doubtful. It is to be expected that our enemies will labor without ceasing to regain their lost domination, and, flattered by our dissensions, they will be continually engaged in forming new projects to enslave us, lured by the hope that we shall be able to bring forward but feeble and divided efforts in support of our liberties. I have thus traced without dissimulation the melancholy picture of our domestic discords.

A number of the citizens of Buenos Ayres, touched with the unfortunate antipathy of the provinces to join heartily in the cause of their common country, and fearing that our dissensions would form a bridge over which the enemy might pass to reduce us to subjection, united their wishes, and, honestly confessing that the balance of public opinion inclined to federalism, petitioned the governor intendant of the province to strip Buenos Ayres of its prerogative, and to place it on the same footing with the other provinces. They believed that this measure would put an end to their irritated jealousies, that a fraternal feeling would succeed, enabling them to complete the edifice which they had so gloriously begun. In an affair of so much importance, the intendant, in order to ascertain with accuracy the sentiments of the people, decreed that the petition be taken into consideration in a general assembly or Cabildo to be convened for the purpose, and one was accordingly ordered to meet on the 19th of June, 1816. This unexpected event lighted up anew the imperfectly extinguished fire of discord. The Junta of Observation, although agreeing in opinion with the intendant as to the propriety of taking the sense of the people, were not satisfied that this should be done by general suffrage; from apprehension of dangerous* and tumultuous agitations, they thought it would be more advisable to ascertain their will through deputies elected for the purpose. This contrariety of opinion fractured the state into parties, whose disputes were conducted with so much heat and violence, that it was seriously feared they would not stop short of an appeal to arms. Had this subject been considered unmixed with private and personal feelings, it would scarcely have given rise to a difference in thinking.

This contest, although suffered to remain in statu quo, left the minds of the parties too much ulcerated to permit them to settle down in peace and harmony. It was at the same time so far aggravated by another dispute, that the Junta of Observation, in concert with the Cabildo, assuming the tone of authority, proceeded to depose the Director ad interim. In his place was substituted a gubernatorial commission, composed of Don Francisco Antonio Escalada and Don Miguel Iregogen.

While these things were taking place, the troops of Buenos Ayres, under the command of Colonel Don Eustacio Diaz Velis, were approaching the city of Santa Fé, while at the same time a small squadron of vessels under the command of Colonel Don M. Iregogen placed it under blockade. The arms of these two cities rivalled each other in intrepidity and courage. It would be uncandid to conceal the admiration we feel in beholding a small town like Santa Fé, without disciplined troops, and with little assistance, causing itself to be respected by its enemy, and under the direction of its chief, supporting the cause of its independence. It is true the Santafécinos abandoned their city, believing that they carried it along with them wherever they could live free. It was not long before they besieged their invaders themselves, and caused them to experience the sufferings of famine; and by a lucky accident having made themselves masters of several of their enemy's vessels, together with the commander of the squadron, there appeared but little likelihood of their being about to succumb to their invaders.

Two important occurrences which had taken place in the city of Tucuman, were of a nature to divert the current of dissension. The first was the election of the supreme directorship of Colonel Don Juan Martin Pueyrredon; but the exigencies of the war claimed the first attention of the Director, the cities of Salta and Jujuy being menaced by the enemy; this of course delayed his return to the capital.

* Two petitions were presented, one with one hundred and one signatures, the other with one hundred and ten.

The other was the solemn declaration of our independence made by Congress on the memorable 9th of July, 1816. Six years had elapsed since that dark period when we were regarded in no other light than as a flock tamely obedient to the will of its owner; in which we quietly looked on while strangers directed the economy of our house; in which our own hands were employed to erect fortresses intended to enslave us. Six years of the most profound and universal interest, felt, I might almost say, even by the infant in the mother's arms, had awakened a crowd of new ideas throughout all classes of society, and inspired a general wish to rise to that condition which nature herself seemed to designate. These provinces, ashamed of having so long delayed to declare this emancipation, raised at last the sublime acclaim of liberty.

It was thought sufficiently probable that those important occurrences would have quieted the provinces, and convinced them of the necessity of a well-organized whole. Unfortunately, this was not the case. "From Cordova," said the Director, in his manifesto, "with what painful anxiety did I cast my eyes towards the agitated province of Buenos Ayres!" And not without cause; for, in going to enter upon his government, he was about to place himself upon the top of a volcanic mountain. It was, notwithstanding, his good fortune to succeed in conquering the antipathies of his most inveterate enemies. Would to God he had been equally successful in finding the means of restoring perfect tranquillity to the state! The wild and ungovernable Orientals and Santafécinos still, however, persisted in this restless and inconsiderate course. Over and above the numerous causes which rendered their rupture so calamitous, others followed of a nature to render them more lasting. The court of Brazil, about this time, raised the mask which had hitherto concealed the perfidious project it had long since formed of taking possession of the delightful countries on the eastern side of the river.

The court of Brazil had already made frequent attempts to obtain this territory, which, for more than a hundred years, it had coveted with so much greediness, but was as often compelled to abandon its prey, until our lamentable dissension at last seemed to guaranty the success of an invasion. The Director seized this opportunity to revive with General Artigas that ancient friendship whose combined force had, on former occasions, frustrated the shameful designs of the Portuguese. A deputy was despatched to him, carrying a supply of arms and munitions of war, and requesting him to state with frankness what were his wants; that these should be the measure of the aid to be furnished. But to speak of reconciliation with Artigas was to speak to the desert. His obduracy could neither be softened by concession, nor his pride be humbled by dangers. Although he received the donations, he heard the proposals with displeasure; preferring that history should accuse him of having sacrificed the occasion to his private hatred, his duties to his caprice, and his country to his interests.

With respect to the Santafécinos, the Director was not more actuated by a desire to prevent the disagreeable consequences of this city remaining in a state distinct and separate from all the other members of the republic, than anxious to place the forces under General Diaz Velis in security; with this view he despatched deputies with propositions highly advantageous to them, and which ought to have sufficed for the restoration of the ancient harmony and brotherhood. Before their arrival at Santa Fé, our army had already evacuated the place, and descended the river. The late invasion was by no means calculated to dispose their minds to reconciliation; and, even if the Santafécinos had given this proof of their love of order, it is probable they would soon have repented of an act which would have lessened them in the estimation of their protector, General Artigas; however this may be, the negotiation terminated without effect.

Although the city of Cordova, with her deputies in Congress, and submitting to the capital, inclined to the side of the Orientals and Santafécinos, her character would not permit her to abandon the last of these in the period of adversity; the dangers which threatened her neighbor served but to draw more closely the ties of amity, and which increased in proportion to the risk she encountered. A body of Cordovians, to the number of four hundred, under the command of Don Juan Pablo Bulnes, hastened as far as the city of Del Rosario in aid of the Santafécinos, but, finding no enemies, they returned home without any material occurrence.

The expedition of Bulnes was not undertaken with the approbation of the Governor of Cordova, Colonel Don José Dias; not because this officer was not inclined to the side of the Santafécinos and the cause of federalism, but because it suited the political course he had resolved to follow to give merely a negative consent; or, perhaps, seeing Bulnes at the head of a more considerable force than he himself could command, he did not think it prudent to oppose him. Be this as it may, it laid the foundation of a reciprocal animosity as indiscreet as badly intended. While Bulnes was on his return to Cordova, Dias was collecting a force to receive him. He was fearful that his rival might entertain the intention of deposing him, and placing himself at the head of the Government. These two bodies were in a little while arrayed against each other; and after acting a military farce—a few shot fired in the air—Bulnes was left in possession of the field of battle, and entered the city in triumph.

These agitations and disorders were in direct violation of the public authority. They proceeded from an active force, supported by the opinion which was most prevalent; in their consequences they were to be dreaded, both for the present and the future, as exhibiting the most dangerous examples. The rights claimed by the Government and the Congress were weighed in distinct scales from their own. The only remedy which the Congress could apply to these evils was in appealing to the good sense of the people. A manifesto was published, breathing, in eloquent language, the sentiment of love of country, lamenting and severely censuring the public disorders, thundering anathemas against the disturbers of the public repose, and exhorting all to obedience and submission to the supreme authority, which had only for its object to secure the safety and happiness of the republic. As might have been expected, little impression was produced by this publication among a people who considered themselves as betrayed when denied the form of government which they preferred. In fact, they regarded the manifesto like one of those autumnal clouds which lighten much, but bring them no rain.

A more successful measure was adopted with respect to the province of Cordova, which was the placing its government in the hand of Don Antonio Funes, (brother of the author of this sketch,) a native and inhabitant of the city of Cordova. This appointment, whether considered with a view to the capacity and virtues of the individual, or the prudence of the choice, was worthy of applause. He was a citizen who possessed talents by no means vulgar; of a mind refined by application to belles-lettres, and elevated by the study of the sciences, he was regarded as an honor to literature. A man of unusual nerve, of a character severe without austerity, more a lover of virtue than of his fortune, of his family, or of his life. Exemplary in the fulfilment of his social duties, his house wore the appearance of a sanctuary to which the unfortunate might resort for comfort and protection. From his politics, dark intrigues, cunning management, and all perfidious practices were excluded. A noble frankness characterized his deportment; detesting artifice, yet prudent and cautious in his speech, and in all times a friend of social order. Our revolution, on which justice had set her seal, could not fail to draw him to its side; he embraced its cause with sincerity, and propagated it with discretion; but the unsettled state of things which succeeded had induced him to bury himself in a retirement where, without being exposed to the clashing of contending parties, he might pursue the stoical severity of his life, and indulge his passion for literary pursuits. With a firmness superior to the reverses of fortune, he supported without murmuring the loss of nearly all that he possessed,* his credits to a great amount, and what was more severe, of two promising sons in the flower of youth, when the National Congress cast its eyes upon him as the most suitable person to oppose the torrent of disorders of which Cordova had become the theatre.

To a common mind, the situation in which the governor was placed would have presented almost insuperable difficulties, the city of Cordova being occupied by Bulnes, his son-in-law; and, in the very first step he would have to take, it would be necessary that he should be armed with a severity which knows no relationship but that of reason and the law. In the course of the revolution he had not declared himself in favor of any of the forms of government which this republic might think proper to adopt. His opinion was in favor of that which the will of the nation, solemnly expressed in Congress, should sanction; and until this could be known, he thought that no one, without violating the laws of order and just subordination, could forcibly resist the established authorities. In opposition to these sentiments, Bulnes made a show of force before his eyes, and his conduct gave few or no indications of a sense of honor, respect, or deference. The governor prudently concealed his determination until he should be supported by a sufficient force to enable him to carry it into effect. It was not long before a body of veteran troops, under the command of Colonel Sayos, came down from Tucuman to his assistance. Bulnes had the arrogance to take the field against him, but Sayos, in the presence of the governor himself, completely routed his forces, and put him to flight. A common mind would have been pleased with a flight which would have spared the painful conflict between the ties of relationship and the demands of justice. But this was a case calculated only to call forth the firmness and energy of the new governor. He caused a diligent pursuit to be made, until, placed in his power, he should be delivered over to all the severity of the law. The fortitude required by such occasions allows of no mixture of human weakness; and, as a celebrated orator has justly said, the magistrate who is not a hero scarcely deserves to be regarded as an honest man. The province for the present remained tranquil, and the cause of Bulnes was subjected to the legal forms by order of the Congress.

From the volcanic eruptions of the provinces, which about this time happily became less frequent, let us direct our attention to exterior affairs. The policy of assailing the enemy's commerce was found to operate as a powerful aid to our cause, and was about this time carried on with great success. The enemy's ports in the Pacific were greatly harassed by the flotilla under Commodore Brown. Nothing could more fully prove the state of subjection to which the people were reduced by Spanish tyranny; under its vile domination it seemed as if all the springs of the mind had been destroyed, and, instead of national feeling, there existed nothing but sordid personal interest. Near the isle of Ormigas, Brown captured five prizes; he dared even to brave the castles of the port of Callao, and to defy the Spanish armed ships. He found the port of Guayaquil in a still greater state of abandonment; here he entered in triumph, and carried off property to the amount of seven hundred thousand dollars.

While the Viceroy of Lima was thus harassed by sea, his armies in Peru and Salta experienced an almost uninterrupted series of disasters. Colonel Don Manuel Asensio Padilla sustained with much glory the standard of our country against the inhuman Facon. The valor and patriotism of this officer had attached to his person a considerable number of patriots, into whom he inspired confidence, activity, and courage. In order to throw some obstacles in the way of his triumphs, a body of about one thousand men was ordered to march towards Laguna. Here they were expected by Padilla, who had intrusted the defence of various posts to his captains, and one of them (which may sound somewhat singular to the reader) to the command of his wife, a very extraordinary woman, Doña Juana Azunduy. The enemy was completely repulsed after having made a furious assault, and this heroic female had the satisfaction of presenting to her husband the banner of the enemy, which she had taken with her own hands.† Padilla did not go to sleep beneath his laurels; without giving time to the enemy to collect his forces, he pursued them in every direction, and shut what remained of them in the town of Chuquisaca. Scarcely less glorious was the victory of Warnes, who destroyed another body of nearly one thousand men, commanded by Facon in person.

The perils of the war in the district of Jujuy and Salta drew from the inhabitants proofs of heroism, in support of their independence, equal to what was exhibited in declaring it. General Guemes, formidable alike for his constancy and valor, continually presented a threatening front to Pescuela, and by his activity deprived him of his conquests as fast as they were made. Abandoning Jujuy precipitately, Pescuela encountered losses of considerable moment. The guerrillas, led by Don Augustin Ribera, Don Diego Calla, Don Diego Tallangiana, Don Justo Ganzalis, Don José Miguel Valdiviesa, Don Francisco Guerreros, and Don Francisco Briondo, contributed much to diminish his credit and the weight of his authority.

These advantages in some measure made amends for the mortification of seeing the troops of Portugal in the territory of the state. From the time it was known that the Prince Regent of Portugal had raised the colonies of Brazil to the pre-eminence of metropolis, it was strongly suspected that he would attempt to aggrandize himself by the occupation of these countries. The powerful temptations which had continually attracted the Portuguese towards our territories had almost become one of the fixed principles of their policy; it was, therefore, not surprising that they should profit by an opportunity which seemed the most favorable for the gratification of their ambition. But as mere ambition furnishes no justification for the invasion of the territory of other nations, the Director considered it as his duty to remonstrate with General Lecos, commander of the Portuguese forces, on the step he was about to take, and to warn him of the consequences of the aggression. At the same time that he took this step, he communicated it to General Artigas and the Cabildo of Montevideo, requesting that at this moment of common danger, which required the combination of all their forces, their differences might be forgotten; and, in order to fix upon the principles of reconciliation, he deputed with full powers the Mealdes Don Juan José Durar and Don Juan Giro. In the preliminary conferences which took place, the errors of discord and the benefits of harmony between the two countries were represented in the most animated terms; and it was finally agreed that the eastern shore (Banda Oriental) should acknowledge the sovereignty of Congress and the authority of the Supreme Director of the sate; that members in proportion to its population should be sent; and that the Government should promptly furnish what assistance was necessary for its defence.

The joy produced by this event, which, in putting an end to the unhappy disputes that divided the country, appeared to restore its pristine strength and glory, was celebrated with pomp and magnificence. At the very moment, however, when the people were engaged in giving vent to their feelings, which were excited to a degree that might almost be considered immoderate, information was received that the Orientals had refused to ratify the convention, no doubt influenced by their chief. Artigas considering the natural tendency of the connexion and dependence of the eastern shore as destructive to the absolute sway which he had so long been accustomed to exercise, in his conception, the dangers and devastations of a war with the Portuguese were to be preferred to the influence of the capital.

The remonstrance of the Supreme Director with General Licos did not produce the effect on his mind which it merited. This chief contented himself with declaring that, in order to place the Portuguese frontier out of danger from the contagion of anarchy which threatened it, it had become necessary to take possession of a country which, in becoming independent, had given itself up to every species of disorder and misrule. The futility of this pretext was fully exposed by the Director in his subsequent official letters, and also by the eloquent editor of the Ministerial Gazette, Don Julian Albanes. Nothing can be added to the force of their reasonings. Taking it for granted that a sovereign has a right to interfere in the domestic quarrels of his neighbors, whenever he may think them of a nature to disturb the tranquillity of his own states, yet it is an undoubted principle of the law of nations, that he should first make suitable representations to the party offending, before actually resorting to the use of force. To occupy a country by force under the mask of peace, can only be learned in the school of Machiavel. There is certainly some difference between acting the part of a centinel, to watch for the preservation of self, and thus intruding into the country of another, hospite insalutato, with no object in reality but that of conquest. The dispute of the Orientals and the capital was a family quarrel, but a quarrel which had not dissolved the ties of the first with the nation. These people, as well by their own will as by the constitution of the state, were integral parts of the American confederation. Common decency, not less than respect for the laws of nations, would have forbidden this resort to violence, before all the proper measures had been taken, without effect, to place in a state of security the nation which declared itself in danger; otherwise, the world would be continually exposed to become the prey of the first occupant who could support his cause by force; like the ambitious Portuguese, there would never be wanting a pretext for invasion.

The management of the war, together with the other important cares of government, rendered it desirable that the Congress and the Directors should be nearer each other, in order, by their combined wisdom, to conduct the affairs of the state with greater promptitude and judgment. Its removal to the capital was, however, a step of no small danger. The sound of discord was still heard like the hollow murmuring of the waters after the tempest has subsided. It was much to be feared, in the agitations which might ensue, that this national assembly, which was considered by many of the friends of order as the last resort, would, like the similar attempts formerly made, prove abortive. Besides this, the provinces were desirous that the Congress should hold its sessions at a distance from the capital, in order that, being free from undue influence, and the fear which bayonets might cause, they would be able to pursue their course with the more perfect freedom. After much discussion, and important reasons urged on both sides of the question, they finally yielded to the solicitation of the Directors, who strongly urged their removal to the capital, and accordingly carried the resolution into effect in the midst of new commotions and disturbances.

One of them had its origin in the audacious mind of an inhabitant of Santiago de Lestera, named Don Francisco Borges. This indiscreet man had been engaged for some time in secretly exciting the minds of those who entertained an aversion to the constituted authorities. His intrigues engaged on his side not a few of his fellow-citizens, who, together with others in the neighboring towns, raised the standard of rebellion under his command. A corps of veteran troops was immediately despatched against them from Tucuman. Borges, more skilled in forming factions than in profiting by them when formed, was unable to maintain his ground: beaten, pursued, and taken prisoner, he paid with his life the price of his temerity.

The Governor of Cordova, although possessing more prudence and foresight than his predecessor, was unable to provide against a conspiracy which surprised him in his own house. Bulnes, from his prison colleaguing with some of those wretches who are everywhere to be found in an unsettled state of society, was enabled through this means to corrupt the garrison; and, not satisfied with obtaining his release, he assailed the house of the governor, whom he seized and placed in confinement, together with the military commandant, Sayos.

The chief of this plot was not possessed of sufficient talents to direct any important object, nor had the soldiers whom he had corrupted a sufficient interest to serve him. These were, with few or no exceptions, veteran Spanish troops who had deserted to us, and who had been placed under the command of a European, named Quintana, but who would willingly sell themselves to whoever offered most. Bulnes was deposed, and in his stead was chosen a certain Urtubei, a person in whom the conspirators fancied they could repose their confidence with greater safety. The situation of the conspirators was critical; they knew that their indecent and dishonorable conduct was detested by the inhabitants of Cordova, and that their force was inadequate to sustain them; they, therefore, justly feared the punishment which the Congress and the Director would inflict upon their crimes. In this embarrassment, they fell upon the plan of compelling Don Juan Andres de Pueyrredon, brother of the Director, to accept the office of governor of the province, in an open Cabildo or assembly, composed chiefly of the factious. It was not long before all those who were openly concerned in this disgraceful business were obliged to beg an asylum in Santa Fé, to which place they retreated. Colonel Sayos, who, with his officers, was ordered to be conducted to some remote place, contrived to gain over the guard to his side at the end of a few days' march. At this moment he was accidentally joined by Governor Funes, who, by the permission of Bulnes, was on his way to Buenos Ayres. They immediately set about collecting a force for the purpose of returning to put down the insurrection. This consisted, however, of very indifferent militia, upon which little or no dependence could be placed. Notwithstanding this, and the obstacles thrown in the way by a handful of vicious, unprincipled men, the governor succeeded in re-establishing order, and in entering upon the duties of his office.

The chief of the insurrection was arrested and sent to Buenos Ayres, where, together with several of the European soldiers, he was tried, condemned, and executed.

These discords in the east, the west, and the north, contributed chiefly to flatter the hopes of our enemies, and encouraged them to form new plans for our subjugation. Ten thousand Portuguese, under the command of General Lecor, in three divisions, were marched into the territory of the eastern shore. The first consisted of five thousand men under his immediate command, who directed his march by the way of Santa Teresa; the second, under the command of General Silviera, consisting of sixteen hundred, by the way of Serno Largo; the third, which formed the right of the enemy, under Curau, proceeded towards the town newly founded by Artigas, in the vicinity of the Uruguay. It was utterly impossible for the general to oppose this torrent. Although the Orientals were gifted with great strength of body and intrepidity of mind, yet neither their numbers, the nature of their arms, their discipline, nor their subordination, could enable them openly to take the field against invaders in these respects so much superior. This superiority very soon manifested itself. General Pinto, with nine hundred men, advanced as far as India Muerta, where he was attacked by General Ribera with eleven hundred men; and, although he sustained a vigorous fight, he was compelled to retire with less than one-half of his division. Possessing, however, that coolness which characterizes the brave in critical situations, he did not neglect to detach a part of his force to watch the operations of the enemy. Soon after this, a detachment consisting of a hundred men fell in with an equal number of Portuguese, who had marched out of Maldonado. Stung by shame, and roused to desperation by the disgrace of the last affair, they rushed with irresistible fury upon their enemies, who were literally cut to pieces.

General Forguese was opposed to General Silviera, at the head of eight hundred men, but was more distinguished for stratagem and astuteness than enterprise. It was of great importance to impede the march of Silviera, whose object was to form a junction with Lecor. Ribera having united his force to that of Forguese, they determined to attack, but, through some unaccountable accident, the former retreated to Rio Negro. The Portuguese army, although continually harassed by Ribera, reached the Barra de Casupa, at Santa Lucia la Grande. Ribera did not despair of being able to defeat the enemy; but, considering the smallness of his force, he besought the town of Montevideo to send the delegate Barcino with a reinforcement of four hundred men. The only force that could be spared was the corps of Libertos, commanded by Colonel B———; but, from a spirit of rivalry ill becoming the times, this officer was unwilling to serve under Ribera. This reinforcement being thus denied, General Silviera effected a junction with General Lecor, after which they proceeded to the capture of Montevideo, on the 19th of January, 1817, Barcino having abandoned it in much disorder.

The fortune which had formerly attended the Orientals was now reversed. They fled the presence of those whom they had been before accustomed to repel; or, if they showed resolution, it usually degenerated into rashness. The right wing of the Portuguese army, commanded by Curau, directed its march towards the place at which the chief of the Orientals was stationed, and arrived at the Arrayo de los Catalanos. This frontier was defended by General La Torre, with three thousand men. Full of an arrogant confidence, which did not permit him to calculate the risk, he determined on attacking the enemy. Mondragor, who commanded the cavalry, with more prudence, remonstrated against this step, alleging that, having had the good fortune to deprive the enemy of his horses, oxen, and carts, these ought first to be secured, before exposing himself anew to the chance of battle, which, considering the present situation of the Portuguese, must be extremely doubtful. La Torre, either not convinced by this reasoning, or despising it, exercised his authority, and imprudently fell upon the enemy with his whole force. The action was obstinate and bloody, but terminated in the most disastrous manner. General Artigas occupied a position some distance in the rear, with a small corps of one hundred men; the consequence of this unfortunate affair reached even his encampment: here he was surprised by four hundred men, and was only enabled to escape with the assistance of a Charua Indian, but with the loss of all his baggage.

In the midst of the progress of Lecor, he found himself all at once shut up in Montevideo, suffering hunger and all the privations of a siege; his situation becoming intolerable, he marched with two thousand men in search of cattle and other provisions. The indefatigable Ribera, who closely watched his movements, prepared an ambuscade with much sagacity at the pass of San Lucia, and, causing no small loss to the enemy, attained his object for the moment. Lecor was not compelled, however, to abandon his enterprise, but proceeded as far as the pass of Pinto, where he was again attacked by Ribera, and experienced a loss of two hundred men. These advantages were of too partial a nature to enable the Orientals to derive hopes from them in the face of an enemy so powerful. They contributed chiefly to raise the reputation of Ribera.

The cry now became universal on the part of the Orientals, and even of their chiefs, for a re-establishment of their union with Buenos Ayres, as the only means of finding shelter from the desolating tempest. In virtue of this state of mind, a communication was opened with the Director, who at once met so desirable a proposition, and immediately sent a supply of arms and munitions of war by way of Colonia. Although Ribera had given his consent to the union, he stipulated to withdraw it, in case it should not meet the approbation of Artigas. For this purpose, he communicated the stipulation he had entered into, in his absence, to that chief. To Artigas it was of little importance that such an event would be advantageous to the republic; he saw in it nothing but a diminution of his own consequence and power. In order to prevent the discontent which his refusal might produce, at the same time that with one hundred men he went down to dissuade Ribera, he caused his partisans to circulate the most scandalous abuse of the capital and its intentions, proclaiming that a union with the capital would be a union with perfidy and robbery, and that it would be exchanging their liberty for a shameful and atrocious servitude. These odious imputations could not fail of producing an effect upon the simple, well-meaning people, who reposed implicit confidence in Artigas, as well as in the minds of those who had, on former occasions, been ill-treated by the Government of Buenos Ayres, of which number was Ribera. The party in favor of union was, however, too strong to be easily dissuaded from its purpose. In fact, Barsinos Bansa, colonel of the Libertos, Ranios, commander of the artillery, a body of chasseurs, and some corps of militia, under the command of Don Tames Garcia, having elected the latter as their commander, entered into articles of union with Buenos Ayres. Ribera, offended with an act which was very little short of a revolt against him by a part of the troops under his command, hastened with three hundred chosen men to call them to an account for this procedure. After some warm altercation, Garcia, being the strongest, remained with the command, and Ribera, sending a copy of the offensive articles to Artigas, called for a detachment of five hundred men for the purpose of attacking his opponents. It was well known that Artigas would destroy without mercy those who set about diminishing his authority. In truth, this man, taking counsel only from his ambition, and from a mischievous Franciscan friar, who for a long time had swayed him, resolved to comply with the request of Ribera with all possible expedition. General Forges, one of the most repute among the Orientals, opposed with energy a measure which was about to awaken the horrors of civil war, and declared for a union with the capital. Of the five hundred, only fifty were despatched to Colonia, under the pretext of defending this place, which was threatened by a Portuguese flotilla, but with the real intention of uniting with Ribera, and to make war upon those who should be in favor of the union. The party of Artigas prevailed. The Director had hoped that the Orientals, won over by his friendly conduct, would lower their pretensions, but his patience was wearied out by so much obstinacy.

While these clouds obscured the east, the west appeared more serene; the Governor of Cuyo, Colonel Don José de San Martin, a man bold enough to conceive great designs, sufficiently a lover of glory to devote himself to them, and not wanting good fortune in their execution, had for some time past meditated in silence the reconquest of Chili. This country had been completely subdued by the Spaniards; more than one hundred of the most influential people had been banished to the island of Juan Fernandez; the inhabitants completely disarmed, and held under the most rigid subjection; their secret wishes, however, as may be readily supposed, were in favor of independence, and San Martin had every reason to believe that, if he could cross the mountains with a respectable army, he would have none but the Spaniards to contend with, and would find the people, as far as was in their power, disposed to co-operate with them. The situation of the United Provinces, continually threatened from Chili and Peru, plainly pointed out the immense importance of expelling the Spaniards from the former, by which means they would at the same time strike the severest blow to their enemy, and gain a powerful ally. A sense of duty also called upon them to assist their brethren, those who, on a former occasion, when Buenos Ayres was threatened by the Spanish general Elio, had contributed both men and money to her assistance. But the chief difficulty lay in procuring the means of raising such an army as would be adequate to the enterprise. The state, notwithstanding its recent declaration of independence, was at no time since the commencement of the war in a condition so deplorable; it might almost be said to be drifting at the mercy of the winds and waves. The province of Cuyo at the first glance seemed to promise less; its soil but indifferent, its population small, its products of late much reduced in value, and, as the frontier, continually exposed to the invasion of the Spaniards. But San Martin possessed the talent of winning the hearts of those with whom he was connected, of awakening the higher passions, and of enlisting them not by halves, but entirely in his plans. He had possessed himself so completely of the affections of the people of Cuyo, that they placed without reserve every thing they had at his disposal. They freely yielded up their male slaves to the number of six hundred; they furnished three thousand horses, ten thousand mules, and contributed their personal services for the construction of quarters, encampments, amories, and in conducting troops and munitions from Buenos Ayres. Much of this is doubtless to be attributed to the moderation and self-denial, both in public and private life, of the chief who commanded—the best security for the confidence of the people; but it is likewise to be attributed to a cause which does much honor to the province, to wit, its uniform patriotism and good conduct. Correct morals are most conducive to love of country, and love of country is not less conducive to good morals. Had they been less pure, this patriotism would have been less, and less also would have been the influence of San Martin. After a twelvemonth spent in collecting, organizing, and disciplining his army, which at the same time afforded Marco an opportunity of making the necessary preparations to oppose him, San Martin put in execution his daring attempt to cross the Andes. The mere idea of such an undertaking is enough to strike the mind with astonishment, as amounting almost to a violation of the laws of nature. We can form but a faint idea of this enterprise when we consider that the mountains to be crossed, for one hundred leagues, are the highest on the globe, with defiles so narrow as not to admit two persons abreast along the giddy verge of frightful gulfs, while the severity of the climate seemed to contend with the ruggedness of the passage; added to these, the difficulty of transporting artillery, at the same time embarrassed with the baggage and provisions for thirty days, and, after all, trusting to the uncertain chances of success after the termination of these labors and fatigues; in truth, when every thing is considered fairly, this achievement may justly rank with the most celebrated of those recorded in history. In thirteen days the army effected its passage with the loss of about five thousand horses and mules, and of a small number of men, chiefly blacks, who were unable to stand the cold. After some slight skirmishes, the army took up its position at Acoracogua.

The passage of the mountains was, in itself, an achievement of a nature to give assurances of the result. The heroic army which had vanquished the Andes, fighting under the banners of liberty and the country, could no more be resisted than a torrent of the mountains. The splendid triumph of Chacabuco, which took place soon after, raised San Martin to the pinnacle of glory, and gave a new aspect to the affairs of South America. "In twenty-four days," said the general, "we have terminated the campaign; we have crossed the most elevated mountains of the globe; put an end to the sway of tyrants, and given liberty to Chili." The President Marco was taken prisoner, and the remains of his forces took refuge in the fortress of Talcaguana. A Junta of the Chilians was convened at Santiago; through gratitude to San Martin, they offered to invest him with the directorship, which he declined; they then elected Don Bernardo O'Higgins. The Chilians afterwards sought, by various modes, to express their gratitude to the General of the Andes, by which name San Martin, by a kind of involuntary concurrence, was now distinguished; but, considering these offers as incompatible with the notions of greatness which he entertained, they were positively declined. It would be improper not to mention the restoration of the banished Chilians to their families, which was almost the first act of the Government. San Martin returned to Buenos Ayres to receive new orders and concert new plans with the Government, all eyes being now turned towards Peru, as the quarter in which their long-looked-for peace and liberty would be sealed. On approaching Mendoza, the capital of Cuyo, he was met by its inhabitants, the youth strewing roses in the road, and all demonstrating the most heartfelt expressions of regard; the inhabitants of Buenos Ayres were equally desirous of showing every mark of veneration for this hero; but San Martin, being apprized of their preparations, stole into the town unobserved. Some are disposed to condemn what appears to them an affected squeamishness and false delicacy, in thus declining honors which are known in general to be grateful to the human heart; but, for this very reason, in my opinion, it is great and noble to decline or despise them.

The cause of the state, in Peru, when conducted by the virtues, experience, and abilities of Belgrano, who, on his return from his important mission to Europe, had once more assumed the command, was again seen to revive. In the rencontres already related we have seen that victory had also returned to our side. General Serna, who succeeded Pescuela, was not possessed of the abilities of his predecessor. Although the celebrated leaders Padilla and Merceces were killed, Warnes and Ganderilla and Fernandez supported the cause of their country. By these the sanguinary Facon was pushed to the very verge of the precipice; but this victim was reserved for another hand: a ray of lightning sent from Heaven put an end to his days and his cruelties. His army was reduced almost to nothing.

General Serna discovered only a vain and arrogant confidence in his own powers. He had scarcely assumed the command, when he conceived the design of attempting the reconquest of Salta and Jujuy, and even of Tucuman. The history of his predecessor ought to have opened his eyes. These places had proved the sepulchres of the Spaniards, and he might cause them to be so again. These admonitions were disregarded by Serna, who, more haughty than the knight of La Mancha, entered Jujuy at the head of an army of upwards of two thousand men. Governor Guemes rendered the possession of the place little better than a trap for his destruction. He and his brave countrymen invested him so closely, that he soon began to repent of his folly. His forces were incessantly harassed by a great number of guerrillas, and much reduced by the actions of San Pedrita, Huniaquaca, Tarija el Barrada, and others. From the deserters, who were continually coming over, with misery painted in their countenances, it appeared that they were perishing of famine in their trenches. Guemes, with his brave officers, Roxas A——, Tarenos, La Madrid, Cardad, &c., compelled Serna to retire, at last, with great loss, and to renounce his designs upon the cities before mentioned. These flattering occurrences were only interrupted by the lamentable rivalry of the Orientals with the capital. Although Artigas, by means of his chiefs, succeeded in gaining over the greatest part of those whom his conduct had alienated, there were still many who remained firm in their resolution of a separation from his authority—a conduct which they considered necessary to the safety of the republic. Of these, not a few were of the province of Entre Rios, by their chiefs, Erenu and Samanuego, who, lowering their tone, acknowledged that they had been wrong, and sought the friendship of the Director. A circumstance which might possibly lead to the overthrow of an ambitious man, and assure the liberty of the country, was not to be despised. Resentment for personal insult might also, perhaps, have had its influence with the Director; he had just received from Artigas a letter couched in the most declamatory and abusive language, accusing him of paying no regard to his offers, by letter, of sending deputies to the union, charging him with connivance at the supplies furnished the Portuguese, with being in their interest, and threatening to pursue him even into the capital itself.

The Director, with a view of securing the Baxada de Santa Fé, which commands the interior country of Buenos Ayres, and at the same time of furnishing assistance to the inhabitants of Entre Rios, despatched a body of troops under Montes de Oca. These were furiously attacked by a detachment from Artigas, and completely defeated. This unfavorable occurrence did not deter the Director from his design; he despatched Colonel Marcos Balcarce with reinforcements to take the field anew. The Orientals, inflamed by that rage which characterizes civil wars, and the more on this occasion, as they regarded themselves as ungenerously attacked by their countrymen, at the moment they were fighting the enemies of the republic, with an impetuosity bordering on desperation fell upon the army of Balcarce, and, after a short but brave resistance on the part of the latter, victory declared itself for the Orientals. Let us deeply lament the fatal policy or necessity of delaying, with our own hands, the progress of events by which we are to gain our independence, and turning upon one another those arms which ought to be reserved only for our common enemies.

About the same time news of a much more serious nature reached the capital, and produced the most painful sensations. While San Martin and O'Higgins were endeavoring to reduce the last stronghold of the Spaniards in Chili, (the fortress of Talcaguana,) the Viceroy of Lima, with all possible despatch, threw fifteen hundred men into that place, which, in point of strength, may be compared to Gibraltar. The army of Chili, under the command of San Martin, was increased to nearly double its number by the new levies among the Chilians; but time was requisite to train and discipline them. O'Higgins took possession of the town of Conception, of which Talcaguana is the seaport. Here a great part of the summer was passed away in skirmishes, in which the enemy were generally worsted. San Martin was, however, occupied in designs of greater magnitude. He was unremittingly engaged in preparing to strike the same blow in Peru which had so successfully paralyzed the power of Spain in Chili. The want of transports was the principal cause of delay, as a march through the desert of Atacama would be impracticable. The viceroy, dreading the enterprise of San Martin, and knowing the materials by which he was himself surrounded, conceived it most prudent to risk the fate of Peru in Chili. Accordingly, after an effort which, in the present fallen state of the Spanish power, might be considered great, he collected about five thousand men, who were hastily embarked for Talcaguana under Osorio, leaving Peru entirely defenceless. Osorio had scarcely reached that place, when he commenced preparations for proceeding directly to the capital of Chili. He calculated with confidence on the superiority of his troops over those whom experience had not yet taught him to respect. He also flattered himself with being able to overtake the army of O'Higgins before he could form a junction with San Martin. Osorio, taking with him nearly all the garrison of Talcaguana, together with two thousand of the natives of Chili, marched rapidly through the province of Conception with an army of nearly eight thousand men. Before he passed the Maule, the patriot army had already formed a junction, and consisted of an equal number of regulars, besides considerable bodies of the militia of the country. In a few days it was completely organized and consolidated; but so large a body of men, when collected, soon began to experience considerable wants. The capital of Chili confidently trusted to the abilities and valor of San Martin; while the circumstance of the wants of his army, when made known to them, afforded an opportunity of displaying a magnanimity which we have unjustly supposed to have been buried beneath the ruins of Greece and Rome. San Martin announced that his army was ready to take the field against the enemies of the country, and that all were willing to sacrifice their lives in its defence, but that it was in want of bread and other supplies. The effect which this intimation produced in the noble-minded people of Chili is best displayed in the reply which they made through the different officers of the municipality and corporations.

"Your excellency," said they, "has just informed us that our brethren in the field of battle are in hourly expectation of being called upon to shed their blood and sacrifice their lives for our preservation. Your excellency recalls to our recollection the sad image of Chili laid waste, for two and a half years, with an atrocity truly Spanish; and our children, our fathers, and our wives, terrified at the chains and gibbets preparing for them by the monsters that have reached the plains of Talca, turn their tearful eyes towards the brave that, on the banks of Tangeuca, have sworn to perish sooner than behold their desolation. But your excellency, at the same time, intimates to us that these brave men are in want of bread and other supplies, in order to sustain the rigorous arms destined to exterminate our enemy; and that the public fund having been exhausted, there scarcely remained a sufficiency for the hospital where the wounds received in our defence are to be healed." "And what does your excellency expect will be the reply of the Chilians to a representation so mournful and affecting? That all our fortunes, without reserve, belong to our country. That, from this moment, we request that your excellency will be pleased to accept the spontaneous offer of whatever silver we have in our possession, together with the vow which we make before our country and the universe, that, so long as the war shall last, and the wants of Chili may require it, there shall not be seen a single article of plate in our houses.

"The people of Chili are unwilling that the silver of the churches should be touched until that which belongs to individuals shall be entirely exhausted. We shall then humbly say before the Supreme Being—To preserve the precious gifts of life and liberty which thou hast bestowed upon us, we present ourselves naked to implore thy protection, while we endeavor to support thy ordinances with the aid of those things which we had set apart to adorn thy worship. Our vows and ardent adoration shall henceforth be the most pure and becoming homage we can offer thee.

"In the meanwhile, will your excellency be pleased to accept the offer, on the part of the secular and regular clergy, of whatever articles of plate belonging to them in particular, and which do not appertain to the ceremonies of religion, and whatever belongs to the magistrates and corporate bodies, which we offer in our name and in the name of the people of Santiago?

"Your excellency will therefore be pleased to accept these offerings, and to inform our brethren that they may rely on the utmost exertions of our gratitude."

This unexpected but sublime display of gratitude was replied to by the Director in a suitable manner. Accepting their offer, he declared himself unable to find expressions sufficiently strong to do justice to the magnanimity of their conduct; but, for the purpose of commemorating so glorious an action, he ordered the following inscriptions to be engraven on the two columns which adorn the eastern and western entrances of the city:

"On the 5th of March, 1818, the people of Santiago voluntarily stripped themselves of all their plate and utensils of silver, protesting that they would acquire no others until their country shall be out of danger."

"Nations of the universe! strangers who enter Chili! say whether such a people deserve to be slaves!"

The patriot army lost no time, after its junction, in marching to meet the enemy. The army of Osorio had already passed Talca; it was not long before a continual skirmishing took place between the invaders and the patriots. These were kept up for several days, until the 19th, when an affair of some importance took place between the advanced corps under O'Higgins and a part of the Spanish army, in which the latter was compelled to fall back with considerable loss, being pursued into the very streets of Talca. The whole Spanish force had been compelled to fall back upon its steps. Osorio now discovered that his contempt of San Martin's army had led him into error; it was so much superior to his, particularly in cavalry, that the chances of success would be decidedly against him, knowing that, in all probability, San Martin would attack him the next morning with his whole force; and that, if defeated, with a large river and numerous bodies of militia in his rear, retreat would be no longer possible. In this critical situation, by the advance of General Ordines, he determined to select two thousand of his best troops, and try the fortune of a night attack, which, if successful, would enable him to retire without fear of pursuit. The principal part of the army had, in the evening, halted within a short distance of Talca; the remainder of the infantry having arrived, and the ground being reconnoitered, orders were given about nine o'clock for each division to occupy the position assigned to it. The right wing had already been posted, and the left was also in motion, when the enemy rushed upon them in the most furious and unexpected manner; the baggage and artillery were first thrown into confusion, which was soon communicated to the troops on their march; these, after a short resistance, broke and dispersed in every direction, in spite of the exertions of their leaders. The Director of Chili, who commanded in person, was severely wounded in the arm in his efforts to rally them. The right, however, under the immediate command of that excellent officer, Colonel Las Heras, retired in good order, and, together with some other bodies, collected by the exertions of San Martin and his officers, continued the contest for some time, but were compelled at last to give way. The next morning presented a spectacle truly melancholy—an army, of which the day before our country might justly have been proud, the best appointed that had ever taken the field on the side of independence in South America, stripped of its artillery and baggage, and more than one-half dispersed, and this without having been beaten.

San Martin conducted the fragments of his army to the narrow pass of Angulemu, which lies on the route to Santiago, and which the enemy could not avoid without making a very considerable circuit. Here he remained in the most painful situation, deprived of his baggage, and his men in want of every thing. In the mean time, the stragglers dispersed through the valleys of Chili spread the most disheartening accounts among the inhabitants, and so complete was supposed to have been the defeat of San Martin, that the partisans of Spain, wherever any of them happened to be, could scarcely refrain from openly declaring themselves. San Martin, with the Director, whose presence was required in the capital, made it a hasty visit, for the purpose of inspiring confidence in the people, and of procuring the means of recomposing his army. He now judged it most prudent to fall back upon the capital, where his army could be recruited with greater celerity, and intending, in case of defeat, to retire into the city, which the Director was actively engaged in placing in a state of defence. The army, under the creative hand of San Martin, with a celerity almost incredible, in the course of a few days, and after a march of eighty leagues, once more presented a formidable front on the plains of Maipu. The most animated proclamations were circulated through the country by him and the Director; hope was seen to revive, and the patriot army was animated by a desperation gathered even from its late disgrace. The news of this lamentable occurrence, arriving at the same time with that of the misfortunes of the eastern shore, cast a gloomy shade over Buenos Ayres. The most melancholy anticipations filled the breast of every American, while the Spaniards among us discovered their joy, on some occasions, with very little discretion. Our apprehensions induced us to believe that the affairs of Chili were still worse than the Government had been willing to communicate; the very importance of the contest in that country was enough to produce doubts in the minds of the most sanguine. Osorio, finding the success of his attack to have so far exceeded his expectations, determined to follow up his blows, but, having himself experienced a considerable loss, he was somewhat retarded in setting off; his march was, notwithstanding, rapid, having approached the Maipu in twelve days after the dispersion of the patriot army. On the 3d and 4th of April there were frequent skirmishes, and early in the morning of the 5th the two armies came in sight of each other, the body of the Spanish forces having crossed the Maipu. The whole morning was passed in manœuvring; each chief in vain endeavored to gain some advantage over his opponent. San Martin rode incessantly along his lines, addressing each individual corps, and infusing into them his own feelings, while the patriotic songs and marches resounded through the army. Seeing, at last, that there was no probability of his being attacked that day by the Spaniards, and finding his men roused to the highest pitch of enthusiasm, he gave orders to advance. With the exception of a small height, which the enemy had occupied with some pieces of artillery, the ground was nearly level and well adapted to military manœuvres. The infantry was placed under the command of General Balcarce, Colonel Las Heras on the right wing, and Colonel Alvardo on the left; the artillery and cavalry posted on each wing, and a strong reserve in the rear under Colonel Quintana. In this order the army moved towards the enemy, who opened a dreadful fire from his infantry, and from several pieces of artillery posted on the small elevation before mentioned, but without arresting its progress; a body of the enemy's cavalry charged at the same time, but were driven back by those of the country, who pursued them even under their guns. The action now became general and bloody; our line, at last, appeared to vacillate; but at this moment, the reserve being ordered up, the whole returned to the charge, and, with an irresistible impetus, carried every thing before them. The resistance of the enemy was, however, so obstinate, that they had to be literally pushed from the ground with the bayonet. The regiment of Burgos, composed of the best troops of Spain, and twelve hundred strong, was not broken until after repeated charges, which San Martin is said to have led in person. The remnant of the enemy's force then threw themselves into some narrow lanes, made by walls, and, under their shelter, commenced the contest anew, but were at length entirely overcome. This action lasted from noon until six o'clock in the evening, and was contested on either side with a courage and firmness worthy of the great prize that was at stake—not merely the independence of Chili, but perhaps of South America. The history of wars furnishes us with few instances of a victory more complete; the whole Spanish army was annihilated; artillery, military chests, every thing belonging to it, fell into the hands of San Martin. Its chief alone fled with some horsemen, when he saw that the day was lost. Ordonez, the second in command, one hundred and ninety-eight officers, three thousand rank and file, surrendered their arms; and two thousand of their dead covered the field of battle. The loss of the country did not exceed one thousand in killed and wounded. The capital, from its extreme depression, was now elevated to the highest pitch of joy. The streets, before silent and fearful, were suddenly filled by the inhabitants, like the blood which, after some moments of deep suspense and anxious fear, rushes again from the heart to the extremities of the body. The scene which ensued can only be conceived by those who have witnessed the sublime effusions of popular feeling, when each thinks his own happiness, that of his posterity, his friends, and his country are entirely involved. There was a general and almost universal exclamation, "AT LAST WE ARE INDEPENDENT!" while San Martin was hailed as the genius of the revolution.

Manifesto directed to all nations by the General Constituent Congress of the United Provinces of Rio de la Plata.

Honorable fame is the jewel which mortals prize above existence itself, and which it is their duty to defend above every earthly good, however great and valuable. The Government of Spain has accused the United Provinces of Rio de la Plata, before the nations of the world, of perfidy and rebellion; and has denounced as perfidious and rebellious the memorable declaration of independence of the 9th of July, 1816, by the National Congress of Tucuman; imputing to them ideas of anarchy, and intentions of introducing seditious principles into other countries, at the very moment of soliciting the friendship of those countries, and their recognition of this declaration, that they may assume a place among the nations of the earth. The first among the most sacred duties of the National Congress is to do away so foul an imputation, and to justify the cause of our country, by publishing to the world the motives and the cruelties which concurred to impel to the declaration of independence. This is not a submission which concedes to any one the right to dispose of a condition purchased by America with torrents of blood, and every species of sacrifice and endurance. It is a duty of imperious obligation which it owes to its wounded honor, and to the respect due to other nations.

We shall waive all discussion with respect to the right of conquest, of papal grants, of other titles by which the Spaniards have supported their domination: it is unnecessary for us to recur to principles which may give rise to theoretic disputes, or to questions which have found advocates. We appeal to facts, forming a lamentable contrast between the sufferings endured by us, and the tyranny of the Spaniards. We shall expose to view the frightful abyss into which these provinces were about to be precipitated, had not the wall of their emancipation been interposed. We shall give reasons, the soundness of which no rational being can question, unless it be his aim to persuade a nation to renounce forever all idea of felicity, and adopt for its system ruin, opprobrium, and shameful acquiescence. We shall exhibit this picture to the world, that no one may contemplate it without being deeply affected with the same feelings that belong to ourselves.

From the moment the Spaniards took possession of these countries, they thought only of securing their power, of exterminating, and degrading. Their systems of devastation were immediately set on foot, and were continued, without intermission, for three hundred years. They began by assassinating the Incas of Peru, and they afterwards practised the same upon the other chiefs who fell into their power. The inhabitants of the country, attempting to repel these ferocious invaders, became victims to fire and sword, by reason of the inferiority of their arms, while their cities and villages were consigned to the flames, everywhere applied without pity or discrimination.

The Spaniards then placed a barrier to the increase of the population of the country; they prohibited, by vigorous laws, the entrance of strangers into it, and in latter times they opened it to the immoral, to convicts cast out of the Peninsula. Neither the vast but beautiful deserts, formed here by exterminating the natives; nor the benefit which might accrue to Spain herself, by the cultivation of plains fertile as they are extensive; nor the existence of minerals, the richest and most abundant of the globe; nor the attraction of innumerable productions, some until then unknown, others precious from their intrinsic value, and capable of animating industry and enlivening commerce, carrying the one to its highest pitch, and the other to the utmost extent of opulence; nor, in fine, the unceasing exertions necessary to keep the fairest regions of the earth submerged in wretchedness, had sufficient influence to change the dark and portentous policy of the court of Madrid. From one city to another of this country there are hundreds of leagues lying waste and uninhabited. Entire nations have disappeared, buried under the ruins of mines, or perishing in an atmosphere poisoned with antimony, under the diabolical institution of the mita. Neither the lamentations of all Peru, nor the energetic representations of the most zealous ministers, have been sufficient to put a stop to this system of extermination.

The science of working mines, regarded with indifference and neglect, has remained without undergoing those improvements common to other nations in an enlightened age; thus rudely wrought, the richest have disappeared, either by the dilapidation of excavated hills, or by the influx of water. Other rare and valuable productions of the country have remained in the great storehouse of nature without having excited the attention and zeal of the Government; and if at any time an enlightened individual presumed to publish these advantages, he was sure to be reprehended by the court, and compelled to be silent, lest, possibly, a diminution of the demand for some of the productions of Spain might ensue.

It was forbidden to teach us the liberal sciences; we were only permitted to learn the Latin grammar, the philosophy of the schools, civil and ecclesiastical jurisprudence. The viceroy, Don Joaquin Pirio, gave much offence by permitting a nautical school at Buenos Ayres; and, in compliance with a mandate of the court, it was ordered to be shut, while at the same time it was strictly prohibited to send our youth to Paris for the purpose of studying the science of chemistry, in order to teach it on their return.

Commerce was ever a monopoly in the hands of merchants of the Peninsula, and of their consignees sent by them to America. All public offices and employments belonged exclusively to the Spaniards; and although Americans were equally called to them by the laws, they were appointed only in rare instances, and even then not without satiating the cupidity of the court by enormous sums of money. Of one hundred and seventy viceroys that have governed in this country, but four of them have been Americans; and of six hundred and ten captains general and governors, all but fourteen have been Spaniards. The same took place in every other post of importance, and even amongst the common clerks of offices it was rare to meet with Americans.

Every thing was disposed on the part of Spain, in America, to effect the degradation of her sons. It did not suit the policy of Spain that sages should rise up amongst us, fearful lest men of genius should bethink them of advancing the condition of their country, and of improving the morals and excellent capacities with which its sons have been gifted by their Creator. It was her policy incessantly to diminish and depress our population, lest one day we should imagine aught against her domination, guarded by a force contemptible for regions so various and vast. Commerce was exclusively confined to herself, from a mean suspicion that opulence would make us proud, and render us capable of aspiring to free ourselves from so many vexations. The growth of industry was checked, in order that the means of escaping from our wretchedness and poverty might be denied us; and we were excluded from all participation in public employments, in order that the natives of the Peninsula might have entire influence over the country, so as to form the inclinations and habits necessary for retaining us in a state of dependance, that would neither permit us to think nor to act but in conformity to the modes dictated by the Spaniards.

This system was acted upon with the utmost rigor by the viceroys; each of them was invested with the authority of a vizier; their power was sufficient to annihilate all those who dared to displease them; however great the vexations they practised, we had to bear them with patience, while these were compared by their satellites and worshippers to the effects of the wrath of God. The complaints which were addressed to the throne were either lost in the distance of many thousand leagues over which they had to pass, or they were smothered in the offices at Madrid by the protectors of those who tyrannized over us. Not only was this system not softened, but there was no hope of its moderating in the course of time. We had no voice, direct or indirect, in legislating for our country; this was done for us in Spain, without conceding to us the privilege of sending delegates or councillors to be present, and to state what would be suitable, or otherwise, as is practised by the cities of Spain. Neither did we possess such influence in the Government set over us as might serve to temper the severity of its administration. We knew that there was no remedy for us but to bear with patience; and that for him who could not resign himself to every abuse, death was considered too light a punishment; for, in such cases, penalties have been invented of unheard-of cruelty, and revolting to every sentiment of humanity.

Less enormous, and less pertinaciously persevered in, were the outrages which compelled Holland to take up arms, and to free herself from Spain; those which induced Portugal to shake off the same yoke; those which placed the Swiss, under William Tell, in opposition to the Emperor of Germany; those which induced the United States of North America to resist the encroachments of Great Britain; or those of any other countries which, without being separated by nature from their parent states, have separated themselves in order to shake off an iron yoke, and to take into their own hands the care of their own felicity, than what we have experienced. We, however, separated by an immense ocean, inhabiting a country gifted with every variety of climate, possessing distinct wants, and treated like flocks and herds, have exhibited the singular example of patient endurance under such degradation; remaining obedient, even when the most seducing circumstances presented themselves for casting off the yoke, and driving the Spanish power to the other side of the ocean.

We address ourselves to the nations of the world; and to manifest so much effrontery as to think of deceiving them in matters to which they have been witnesses, is impossible. America remained tranquil during the whole war of the succession, and awaited the termination of the contest between the houses of Austria and Bourbon, in order to follow the fortunes of Spain. A favorable occasion then presented itself to free ourselves from so many vexations, but we did not seize it; on the contrary, we exerted ourselves in her defence, arming in her cause alone, and with a view of maintaining our connexion with her. Without having any concern in her differences with European nations, we have embarked in her wars; we have suffered the devastations; we have borne, without a murmur, all the privations to which we were exposed by her nullity on the ocean, one of which was the interruption of the usual communication with her.

In the year 1806 our country was invaded; an English expedition surprised and captured Buenos Ayres, the capital, through the imbecility of the viceroy, who, though without European troops, had numerous resources fully adequate, which he knew not how to avail himself of. We prayed assistance from the court, to enable us to defend ourselves against a new expedition which threatened us; and the consolation we received was, a royal mandate to defend ourselves as we could. The following year the eastern shore (Banda Oriental) was occupied by a new and more formidable expedition: the town of Montevideo was besieged and taken by assault; here the British troops were augmented, and a powerful force prepared for making another attack on the capital, and, in fact, the attack was made a few months afterwards; happily the valor of our citizens triumphed over the enemy in the assault, compelling him, after a brilliant victory, to evacuate Montevideo, and the whole of the eastern shore.

A more favorable opportunity of rendering ourselves independent could not have been desired than that which now presented itself, if the spirit of rebellion or perfidy had been capable of moving us, or if we had been susceptible of those principles of anarchy and sedition imputed to us. At that time we had abundant cause for doing what we have since done. It was by no means our duty to be indifferent to the state of degradation in which we had so long existed. If at any time victory authorizes the conqueror to be the arbiter of his own destinies, we might justly then have fixed ours; we were, with arms in our hands, triumphant, and there was not a single Spanish regiment to oppose us; and if neither victory nor force can give right, ours was still greater no longer to tolerate the domination of Spain. We had nothing to apprehend from the forces of the Peninsula; its ports were blockaded, and the seas commanded by the fleets of Britain. Notwithstanding the favorable conjuncture thus presented to us by fortune, we chose to preserve our connexion with Spain, hoping, by this distinguished proof of loyalty, to effect a change in the system of the court, and render it sensible of its true interest.

But we flattered ourselves with vain hopes. Spain did not regard this conduct as an evidence of the generosity of our dispositions, but as a bare act of duty. America still continued to be ruled with the same tyranny, and our sacrifices, though most heroic, had no other effect than to add a few more pages to the history of that oppression under which we had so long groaned.

Such was the situation in which we were found by the revolution of Spain. We, who were habituated to yield a blind obedience to all her mandates, readily acknowledged Ferdinand VII. of Bourbon, although raised to the throne by a tumult at Aranjuez, which deposed his father. We saw him soon after pass over into France; we saw him there detained with his parents and brothers, and deprived of the crown which he had just usurped. We saw that Spain, everywhere occupied by French troops, was shaken to her centre, and that in her civil convulsions the most distinguished individuals, who governed with wisdom in the provinces, or served with honor in her armies, fell victims to the insensate fury of rivals; that, in the midst of these vibrations, governments rose up in each of those provinces, styling themselves supreme, and claiming sovereign authority over America. A Junta of this kind, formed at Seville, had the presumption to be the first to demand our obedience, and we were obliged by our viceroys to recognise and yield it submission. In less than two months another, entitled the Supreme Junta of Gallicia, pretended to the same right, and sent us a viceroy, with the indecent menace that thirty thousand men should also be sent, if necessary. The Junta Central next erected itself; we immediately obeyed it, without having had the slightest share in its formation, zealously and efficaciously complying with all its decrees. We sent succors of money, voluntary donations, and supplies of every kind, to prove that our fidelity would stand any trial to which it could be subjected.

We had been tempted by the agents of King Joseph Bonaparte, and great promises were held out to us of bettering our condition, should we unite ourselves with his interests. We knew that the Spaniards of greatest note had already declared for him; that the nation was without armies, and without the vigorous direction requisite in moments of so much difficulty. We were informed that the troops of Rio de la Plata, who were prisoners at London, after the first expedition of the English, had been conducted to Cadiz, and there treated with the greatest inhumanity, and that, in a state of nakedness, they had been sent off to fight against the French. Yet our situation continued unchanged until the Andelusias having been occupied by the French, the Junta Central was dispersed.

Under these circumstances, there was published a paper, without date, and signed only by the archbishop of Laodicea, who had been president of the extinguished Junta Central. By this paper a regency was ordered to be formed, and three persons, as those who should compose it, were designated. An occurrence so unexpected could not but cause us to hesitate and ponder over it seriously. Our situation became alarming, and we had reason to be apprehensive of being involved in the misfortunes of the capital. We reflected upon its uncertain and vibrating state, more especially as the French had already presented themselves before the gates of Cadiz and the island of Leon: we distrusted the new regents, who were unknown to us; the most distinguished Spaniards having passed over to the French, the Junta Central dissolved, its members denounced as traitors in the public papers. We saw the inefficacy of the decree published by the archbishop of Laodicea, and the insufficiency of his powers for the establishment of a regency; we knew not but that the French had taken possession of Cadiz, and completed the conquest of Spain in the interval which must elapse before these papers could come to our hands; and we doubted whether a Government formed out of the fragments of the Junta Central would not soon meet with the same fate. Considering the perils which surrounded us, we resolved to take upon ourselves the care of our own safety, until we should obtain better information of the true condition of Spain, and whether her Government had acquired stability. Instead of discovering this stability, we soon learned the fall of the regency, and saw it succeeded by continual changes of government in moments the most arduous and critical.

In the meanwhile we formed our Junta in imitation of those of Spain. It was purely provisional, and in the name of our captive King. The viceroy, Don Baltazar Hidaldo Cisneros, despatched circulars to the provincial governors, in order to light up the flames of civil war, and arm provinces against provinces.

The Rio de la Plata was immediately blockaded by a squadron: the Governor of Cordova immediately set about raising an army: the Governor of Potosi and the President of Charcas marched with another to the confines of Salta, and the President of Cuzco, presenting himself with a third army on the margin of Desaguedero, entered into an armistice of forty days, and, before its term had elapsed, recommenced hostilities, attacked our troops, and a bloody battle ensued, in which he lost fifteen hundred men. Memory is horror-struck in recalling the abominable cruelties then perpetrated by Goyeneche in Cochabamba. Would to God it were possible to forget this ungrateful American, who, on the day of his entrance into the city, ordered the respectable Governor Intendant Antesana to be shot, and, observing with complacency, from the balcony of his house, this iniquitous assassination, ferociously cried out to his troops not to shoot the victim in the head, as it was wanted to be stuck upon a pike; and when it was severed from the body, the headless trunk was dragged through the streets, while at the same time the brutal soldiers were barbarously permitted to dispose at pleasure of the lives and property of the inhabitants during many successive days.

Posterity will be shocked by the ferocity manifested towards us by men who ought to have been interested in the preservation of the Americans; and they will regard with astonishment the madness of attempting to punish as a crime an act marked with the indelible seal of fidelity and love. The name of Ferdinand of Bourbon preceded all the acts of the Government, and headed its public documents. The Spanish flag waved on our vessels, and served to animate our soldiers. The provinces, seeing themselves reduced to a kind of orphanage by the dispersion of the National Government, by the want of another of a legitimate character, and capable of commanding respect, and by the conquest of nearly the whole of the mother country, had raised up for themselves an argus to watch for their safety, and to preserve them entire, so that they might be restored to the captive King, in case he should regain his liberty. This measure was sanctioned by the example of Spain herself, and produced by her declaration that America was an integral part of the monarchy, possessing equal rights, and which had already been practised in Montevideo, at the instance of the Spaniards themselves. We offered to continue our pecuniary aids for the prosecution of the war and a thousand times published the uprightness and sincerity of our intentions. Great Britain, to which Spain was then so much indebted, interposed her mediation and good offices to prevent our being treated in a manner so harsh and severe. But the Spaniards were fixed in their sanguinary caprice, rejected the mediation, and despatched rigorous orders to all their generals to prosecute the castigation of the Americans with redoubled activity; scaffolds were everywhere erected, and ingenuity was taxed for inventions to frighten and afflict.

From thenceforward no pains were spared, and no means left untried, to divide and engage us in mutual extermination. They have spread abroad the most atrocious calumnies against us, attributing to us the intention of renouncing our holy religion, and of encouraging an unbounded licentiousness of manners. They have made a religious war against us, contriving by a thousand ways to disturb and alarm the conscience, and causing the Spanish bishop to publish ecclesiastical censures and excommunications, and to sow, through the means of some ignorant confessors, fanatical doctrines, even in the penitential tribunal. By means of those religious discords, families have been divided against themselves; they have occasioned dissensions between father and son; they have broken asunder the delightful ties which unite husband and wife; they have sown rancor and hatred between the most affectionate brothers; they have, in fine, endeavored to poison all the harmony of society.

They have adopted the dreadful system of putting men to death indiscriminately, for no other purpose than to diminish our numbers, and, on entering our towns, have been known to put to death even the unfortunate market people, driving them into the public square in groups, and shooting them down with cold-blooded, wanton cruelty. The cities of Chuquisaca and Cochabamba have more than once been theatres of this shocking barbarity.

They have compelled our soldiers, taken prisoners, to serve against their wills in the ranks of their armies, carrying the officers in irons to distant outposts, where it was impossible for them to preserve health for a single year, while others have been starved to death in dungeons, and many have been forced to labor on the public works. They have wantonly shot the bearer of flags of truce, and have committed the utmost horrors upon chiefs after their surrender, and other principal personages, notwithstanding the humanity that had been shown by us to those prisoners who fell into our hands. In proof of this assertion, we need only mention the Deputy Matos of Potosi, Captain General Pumacagua, General Angulo, and his brother, the Commandant Munecas, and other partisan chiefs, shot in cold blood, many days after having surrendered as prisoners.

In the district of Valle-Grande they indulged themselves in the brutal sport of cutting off the ears of the natives, and then transmitting a pannier full of them to head-quarters; they afterwards destroyed the town by fire, burnt about forty populous villages of Peru, and took a hellish pleasure in shutting up the inhabitants in their houses before setting them on fire, in order that their unhappy victims might be burnt alive.

They have not only shown themselves cruel and implacable in murdering our countrymen, but they have thrown aside all regard to decency and morality; causing old men of the religious profession, in the public places, and women, to be made fast to a cannon, but first stripped naked, and their bodies exposed to shame.

They have established an inquisitorial system for all these punishments; they have dragged out peaceful inhabitants from their houses, and transported them across the ocean to be tried for pretended offences, and have executed without trial a multitude of citizens.

They have chased our vessels, sacked our seacoast, murdered defenceless inhabitants, without sparing clergymen, and those in extreme old age; by the order of General Pezuela, they burnt the town of Puno, and, meeting with no others, they put to the sword old men, women, and children. They have excited atrocious conspiracies among the Spaniards residing in the midst of us, imposing upon us the painful necessity of putting to death the fathers of numerous families.

They have compelled our brothers and sons to take up arms against us, and, forming armies by the impressment of the natives of Peru, have compelled them, under the command of Spanish officers, to fight against our troops. They have excited domestic insurrections, corrupting with money and every species of seduction the pacific inhabitants of the country, in order to involve us in a frightful anarchy, and to enable them to attack us weakened and divided. They have displayed a new invention of horror, in poisoning fountains and food, when beaten in La Paz by General Pinelo; and the mildness with which they were treated, when compelled to surrender at discretion, was rewarded by the barbarous act of blowing up the barracks, which had been previously mined for the purpose.

They have had the baseness to attempt to tamper with our governors and generals, and, abusing the sacred privilege of flags of truce, they have repeatedly written letters inciting to treason. They have declared that the laws of war, recognised by civilized nations, ought not to be observed towards us; and, with contemptuous indifference, replied to General Belgrano that treaties could not be entered into or kept with insurgents.

Such had been the conduct of Spaniards towards us when Ferdinand of Bourbon was restored to the throne. We then believed that the termination of our troubles had at last arrived; it seemed to us that the King, who had been formed in adversity, would not be indifferent to the miseries of his people; we therefore despatched a deputy to him to make known our situation. We could not doubt but that he would give us a reception worthy a benign prince, and that he would feel an interest in our supplications, as well from gratitude as from that beneficence which the Spanish courtiers had praised to the skies. But a new and before unknown ingratitude was reserved to be experienced by the countries of America, surpassing all example that the history of the worst of tyrants can present.

Scarcely had he returned to Madrid, when he, without ceremony, at once declared us insurgents. He disdained to listen to our complaints, or hearken to our supplications, tendering a pardon as the only favor he could offer. He confirmed in authority the viceroys, governors, and generals, who had perpetrated the bloody deeds before detailed. He declared as a crime of state the having pretended to form a constitution for ourselves, that we might be placed beyond the reach of the capricious, arbitrary, and tyrannic power to which we had been subjected for three centuries; a measure which could displease none but a prince who is inimical to justice and beneficence, and consequently unworthy of ruling.

With the aid of his ministers, he at once set to work in collecting forces for the purpose of being sent against us. He caused numerous armies to be transported to this country, in order to complete the devastations, conflagrations, and robberies so well begun. He availed himself of the moment when complimented by the principal European Powers, on his return from France, to engage them to deny us every succor, and to look on with indifference, while he was gratifying the cruelty of his disposition in destroying us.

He has established a peculiar regulation for the treatment of American privateers, barbarously ordering their crews to be hanged. He has forbidden the observance towards us of the Spanish naval ordinance, established in conformity with the laws of nations, and he has denied every thing to us which we invariably allow to his subjects captured by our cruisers. He sent his generals with decrees of pardon, which they caused to be published, with no view but to deceive the simple and ignorant, in order to facilitate their entrance into cities and towns; but giving, at the same time, private instructions authorizing and commanding them, after having thus obtained possession, to hang, burn, sack, confiscate, assassinate, and to inflict every possible suffering on such as had availed themselves of such supposititious pardons. It is in the name of Ferdinand of Bourbon that the heads of captured patriot officers have been stuck up on the highways; that a distinguished partisan leader has been actually impaled; and that the monster Centano, after having murdered Colonel Gamargo in the same manner, cut off his head, and sent it as a present to General Pezuela, informing him that it was a miracle of the Virgen del Carmen.

It has been by a torrent of evils and bitter afflictions such as these, that we have been compelled to take the only course that remained to us. We reflected deeply on our situation and future fate, and, turning our eyes to every quarter, we were unable to see any thing but the three elements of which it must necessarily be composed—opprobrium, ruin, and abject submission. What could America expect from a King, actuated, at the very moment of seating himself on the throne, by sentiments so inhuman?—of a King who, previous to commencing his devastations, hastened to prevent the interposition of any other prince to restrain the effects of his insensate fury?—of a King who has no other rewards but chains and gibbets, for the immense sacrifices of his Spanish subjects in releasing him from captivity?—subjects who, at the expense of their blood and of every privation, have redeemed him from a prison in order to bind his temples with a crown? If these men, to whom he owed so much, thus received death, were doomed to perpetual imprisonment or to base slavery, for no other crime than that of having framed a constitution, what might we not expect to be reserved for us? To hope for a benign treatment from him and from his bloody ministers, would have been to seek among tigers for the mildness of the dove.

Then, indeed, would have been repeated towards us the ensanguined scenes of Caraccas, Carthagena, Quito, and Santa Fé; we should then have spurned the ashes of the eighty thousand persons who have fallen victims to the fury of the enemy, and whose illustrious names with justice call for revenge; and we should have merited the execrations of every succeeding generation, condemned to serve a master always disposed to illtreat them, and who, by his nullity on the sea, has become impotent to protect them from foreign invasion.

We, therefore, thus impelled by the Spaniards and their King, having declared ourselves independent, and in self-defence against tyranny, have staked our honors, our lives, and our fortunes. We have sworn before the Supreme Judge of the universe, that we will never renounce the cause of justice; that we will not permit the country which he gave us to be buried beneath ruins and submerged in blood by the hands of executioners; that we shall never forget the obligations that we owe to save her from the dangers which threaten her, nor the sacred right to require of us all necessary sacrifices to prevent her from being soiled by the foul footsteps of tyrants and usurpers. This declaration is engraven on our hearts, that we may never cease to combat in her cause. And at the same time that we unfold to the world the motives that have induced to this step, we have the honor to make known our desire of living in peace with all, and even with Spain herself, from the moment she thinks proper to accept our offer.

Notes which the Secretary of State in the Department of the Government and of Foreign Relations places in the hands of Messrs. the Deputies of the United States of North America, for the information of the President of those States.

The nation is styled the United Provinces of South America.

The number and denomination of each, with its intendencies and chief towns of districts (cabezas de partido) according to the former state of the viceroyalty, appears in document No. 1.

In 1814, five more provinces were erected, whose names are, Tucuman, Mendoza or Cuyo, Corrientes, Entre Rios, and Oriental del Rio de la Plata.

The capitals of the two latter are the town of Conception del Uruguay, or Arroya de la China, and the city of Montevideo.

Out of the fourteen provinces into which the territory of the ancient viceroyalty is now subdivided, there are nine in the hands of the patriots, which are stated in said document under the title of free provinces; and those occupied with troops, or under the influence of the Spanish army, are the other five, whose names are, Potosi, Plata or Charcas, Cochabamba, La Paz, and Puno.

In all the territory of the ancient royalty there is but one archbishopric, which is that of La Plata, and six bishoprics, which are stated in said document under the denomination of suffragans.

The territory of the United Provinces contains one hundred and forty-five thousand square leagues; their population according to the nearest estimate, amounts to one million three hundred thousand, without including the aborigines. Their productions, manufactures, and articles of commerce, will be seen in statement No. 2.

The political state of the provinces called free is quiet and tranquil; they are under the influence of the supreme direction of the states, which resides in Buenos Ayres. They have their governors in the intendencies, or capitals, lieutenant governors in the chief towns, villages, &c. The province of Assumption del Paraguay is an independent state, as also the Oriental del Rio.

The funds, public revenues, and annual expenditures, will be seen in the statement No. 3, with the notes on the same.

The land military force of the united territory appears in the statements Nos. 4 and 5; the latter shows the amount of arms and munitions of war which it possesses in its armies, parks, in its manufactories, and its armory.

The naval force will be seen in the statements Nos. 6 and 7.

The authority of the Supreme Director, of his secretaries, and of the tribunals of justice, are detailed in the provincial regulations, a copy of which is annexed under No. 8.

There is a tribunal of prizes, which is composed of the Secretary of the War Department, the President of the Chamber of Appeals, the Asesor del Govierno, and the Auditor General of War; there is another tribunal, which takes cognizance of appeals from the decisions of the former, and is composed of the Supreme Director of the State, the Secretary of State for the Government and for Foreign Affairs, and the Secretary of the Treasury. This tribunal takes cognizance also in case of supplication; and all being subject to the reglamento del corso (No. 9,) and other special regulations, which, although not appearing in the provincial regulations established by Congress, have notwithstanding been approved by the same.

At the present moment the formation of a constitution for the state is in progress. A committee consisting of members of Congress are assiduously engaged, and will soon present a project of the constitution.

The population of the city of Buenos Ayres, according to the census of 1815, amounted to fifty thousand nine hundred and ninety-nine inhabitants. This census was inaccurate and underrated. Since then, the emigration of foreigners has been unusually great, as also the emigration of numerous families from the Banda Oriental and Entre Rios, so that its population is at present estimated at sixty-two thousand souls.

Besides other institutions, this capital has what is called the colegio seminario; another institution for the education of youth, called the Union of the South, will be opened on the 25th May next, with a general plan of education, particularly of the languages and sciences; there is also an academy of jurisprudence, one of drawing, four of the study of medicine, and a board for the examination of those who prepare to practise.

There are three printing offices, a public library with twenty thousand volumes, schools for teaching the first elements in every parish; there is a society of men of taste for the stage, another of friends of the country, another of agriculture, a cannon foundry, a manufactory of small arms, one of swords, an armory, three parks of artillery, three powder magazines, and a variety of manufactories in different branches.

The independence of the state was declared at Tucuman the 9th of July, 1816, the congress being assembled at that place, and there sanctioning it. To obtain its acknowledgment by foreign Powers, communications and invitations have been made to them, and in Europe there is an envoy extraordinary to its several courts: he is Doctor Bernardine de Rivadavia.

These provinces have been de facto independent of Spain since the year 1810, when they openly made war upon her in Peru, in Paraguay, and in Montevideo. Early in 1813, as soon as the province of Potosi was taken possession of by the patriots, they coined money there impressed with arms of the state, hoisted the national flag, and took other public steps which were equivalent to the most solemn declaration of the new rank which they assumed.

They armed a considerable number of privateers, which have ruined the Spanish trade, and they have even blockaded some ports in the Peninsula.

It was not the proclamation of independence which gave origin to the rights of the Americans; it merely recognised them as they had before existed, and had been claimed since the memorable epoch of the 25th of May, 1810.

It appears unnecessary to make any further explanations of those facts and circumstances, which, having come within the knowledge of the commissioners, particularly of late, must have afforded the information desired.

NOTES.

1st. The public lands of the state, which consist of hundreds of leagues in the vast extent of the provinces, and whose value may be estimated at many millions of dollars, are not included in this statement.

2d. The whole of the property and funds exhibited relates only to the province of Buenos Ayres, excluding those of Entre Rios, Sta. Fé, and Corrientes; without making mention of the estimates of the rest, which amount to many millions, in the produce of their peculiar branches and property of different kinds, on account of some of them being occupied by the enemy, and not possessing sufficient data to state the particulars with accuracy; nevertheless, according to the table of estimates made by the general of accounts in the year 1810, taking the whole of the provinces of the ancient viceroyalty, which at present compose the union, it appears that, at that date, the liquidated estimates, without including incomes, lots of ground, capitals at interest, and other funds, but merely the administrable proceeds, amounted to six million eleven thousand eight hundred and two dollars.

3d. No mention is made in this table of the annual revenues of the Cabildo of this capital, which, in 1817, amounted to $367,263, because, as municipal funds, they have their peculiar destination; leaving, however, a considerable residue, which, in case of necessity by the state, may be appropriated to its use, as also those of the other Cabildos of the union, of which, from the distance and shortness of time, it has not been possible to give an exact account.

4th. The amount of public debt acknowledged by the state, accrued in former years, until the close of last December, paid during the administration of the present Director, is $1,135,483 5¾.

5th. Although the post office establishment produces, at present, after deducting all expenses, a small balance in favor of the state, this is owing to the franks on ultramarine communications, and the interruption of intercourse with the provinces occupied by the enemy; but, in case of their becoming free, the administration of this capital alone will produce a surplus of $30,000, and the interior provinces in proportion.

BUENOS AYRES, March 18, 1818.

BUENOS AYRES, April 22, 1813.

I send you, gentlemen, the statements and notes which exhibit the present situation of the United Provinces of South America, in order that, with the information they may afford, his excellency the President of the United States of North America may proceed in his steps in relation to these countries in the way most conformable to his high intentions, and to the greater prosperity and aggrandizement of the new world.

God preserve you many years, &c.

Provisional regulation, sanctioned by the Sovereign Congress of the United Provinces of South America, for the government of the state, to be observed until the adoption of the constitution.

SECTION I.—OF MEN IN SOCIETY.

CHAPTER 1.—Of the rights which belong to all the inhabitants of the state.

Art. 1. The rights of the inhabitants of the state are those of reputation, liberty, equality, property, and security.

Art. 2. The first has an acceptation so uniform as to render its explanation superfluous. The second is the good opinion of his fellows, which every man strives to win by the rectitude of his conduct. The third is the right of acting according to the dictates of a man's own will, so long as he neither violates the rights of the public nor those of individuals. The fourth consists in the law being equal to all, preserving alike the rights of the weak and the powerful. The fifth is the right of full and unmolested enjoyment of property. The sixth is the guaranty granted by the state to every one that his rights shall not be violated, unless the conditions be broken upon compliance with which their enjoyment is by law made to depend.

Art. 3. Every inhabitant of the state, be he American or foreigner, citizen or not, shall enjoy these rights.

CHAPTER 2.—Of the religion of the state.

Art. 1. The Apostolical Roman Catholic religion shall be the religion of the state.

Art. 2. Every man ought to respect the public worship and the holy religion of the state; the violation of this law shall be deemed an infraction of the fundamental laws of the country.

Chapter 3.—Of citizenship.

Art. 1. All the municipalities of the provinces shall form immediately a public register, to consist of two books: in one of which it shall be an indispensable duty to write the names of all the citizens, with a statement of the age and origin of each; in the other shall be written the names of those who have lost the right of citizenship, or are suspended from its enjoyment.

Art. 2. Every citizen shall obtain a certificate, signed by the alcalde ordinario de primer voto, and attested by the notary of the municipality, of his enrolment in the register aforesaid; without which evidence he shall not vote at the elections hereinafter mentioned.

Art. 3. Every free man, born and resident in the territory of the state, is a citizen, but shall not exercise the rights of citizenship until he shall attain the age of twenty-five, or be emancipated.

Art. 4. Every foreigner, of the same age, who may have established himself in the country, with the intention of fixing there his domicil, and, having been resident there for four years, shall have become possessed of four thousand dollars worth of property, or, not holding property to such amount, shall exercise some trade, or pursue some occupation useful to the state, shall enjoy the right of suffrage in the assemblies of the citizens, provided he knows how to read and write.

Art. 5. After ten years' residence, he shall be eligible to all public employments, except those of the administration of the Government; but, to entitle him to the right of suffrage, and to render him eligible, he must first renounce all other citizenship.

Art. 6. No European Spaniard shall enjoy the right of suffrage, or be eligible to office, while the independence of these provinces is unacknowledged by the Government of Spain;

Art. 7. With the exception of Spaniards of this class, who have declared in favor of liberty, and have rendered distinguished services to the state; these shall enjoy citizenship, proper letters of naturalization being first obtained.

Art. 8. Those born in the country, of African blood, whose ancestors may have been slaves in this continent, shall have the right of suffrage, their fathers being freemen, and shall be eligible to office, provided they be in the fourth degree from said ancestors.

Art. 9. Those Spaniards and other foreigners who solicit citizenship must first prove their good conduct.

Art. 10. They shall both swear to defend, even to the extent of sacrificing property and life, the independence of the United Provinces of South America against that of the King of Spain, his successors, and the metropolis, and every other foreign Power. The Supreme Director shall have the power to appoint one or more commissioners to administer the oath.

Art. 11. Letters of naturalization shall be granted only to those who have resided four years within the territories of the state, unless eminent merit, distinguished services, or the public weal demands that such residence be dispensed with; it shall be left, for the present, to the wisdom of the Supreme Director to determine when it shall be expedient so to dispense with it.

Art. 12. The proofs of adhesion to the sacred cause of national independence, and other requisites expressed, shall be made before the governors or lieutenant governors of the provinces in whose territories the applicant may reside, with formal hearing before the sindico procurador, on being notified by the municipality, and the said governor; and, in default of this, the application shall be rejected. The letters of naturalization shall be published in the Ministerial Gazette.

Chapter 4.—Of the privileges of citizenship.

Art. 1. Every citizen is a component part of the national sovereignty.

Art. 2. In virtue of which, he has the right of suffrage, and is eligible to office in those cases designated by this provisional regulation.

Chapter 5.—Of the several modes in which citizenship may be lost, and its enjoyment suspended.

Art. 1. Citizenship shall be lost by naturalization in a foreign country; by accepting offices, pensions, or titles of nobility from another nation; by the illegal infliction of corporal or infamous punishments; by fraud in a debtor, until, the reproach being wiped away, a new qualification be obtained.

Art. 2. Citizenship shall be suspended when a debtor to the state is under execution; by accusation of a crime, provided it be well founded, and the punishment prescribed be corporal or infamous; by being a hired domestic servant; by not holding property, or pursuing some occupation lucrative and useful to the country; by madness or insanity.

Art. 3. Any magistrate who deprives a citizen of his right of citizenship, except for the causes enumerated in article 2, shall be punished by being deprived of his own.

Art. 4. Those judges who shall neglect to convey to the several municipalities information of the names which ought to be erased from the register, mentioned in article 1, chapter 3, in consequence of legal conviction of crime, shall be deprived of the right of suffrage, and be ineligible at two succeeding elections.

Chapter 6.—Of the duties of every man in the state.

Art. 1. Every man in the state owes, in the first place, complete submission to the law doing the good which it enjoins, and avoiding the evil which it prohibits.

Art. 2. Obedience, honor, and respect, are due to the magistrates, as ministers of the law and first citizens.

Art. 3. Every man, unless he be a foreigner, shall cheerfully make all the sacrifices required by the country in its necessities and dangers, not even excepting that of life.

Art. 4. It is his duty to contribute to the support and preservation of the rights of the citizen, and to the felicity of the state.

Art. 5. To deserve the delightful and honorable title of man of worth, being a good father of a family, a good son, a good brother, and a good friend.

Chapter 7.—The duties of society.

Art. 1. Society ought to secure to its members the enjoyment of the rights of man.

Art. 2. It ought to alleviate the misfortunes of the citizens, and to use adequate means for their prosperity and instruction.

Art. 3. Any regulation or statute contrary to the principles established in the preceding articles shall be of no effect.

SECTION II.—Of the Legislative Power.

Chapter 1.

Art. 1. The legislative power is resident originally in the nation; its permanent exercise, the mode, and its limits, shall be established by the constitution of the state. In the interim, this provisional regulation shall be in force, which shall be neither amended, interpreted, or have any addition made to it, except by the sovereign Congress; two-thirds of its members concurring in the measure, and circumstances demanding its adoption.

Art. 2. Until the constitution makes proper provision, all the statutes and regulations, as well general as particular, of the ancient Spanish Government, which may not be hostile to the liberty of these provinces, nor in contrariety to this provincial regulation and also such of the regulations, made since the 25th of May, 1810, as are in conformity with it, shall subsist.

Art. 3. The Supreme Director of the State, the judges, and public officers of every denomination, may communicate to Congress, and consult with that body, upon the doubts that may occur in the application of the laws and regulations, general or particular, whenever they consider them in conflict with declared rights and the actual system of the Government; and the resolutions adopted in consequence shall be communicated to the executive power.

SECTION III.—Of the Executive Power.

Chapter 1.—Of the mode of choosing the Director of the state, and of his powers.

Art. 1. The supreme executive power, until by it elsewhere placed, is in the nation, and shall be exercised by a Director of the state.

Art. 2. Until a constitution be adopted, the Congress shall name, from among all the citizens of the provinces, him most worthy and best qualified for so high an office.

Art. 3. In case of the absence of the Director in the defence of the state, or of other legal impediment in the exercise of this office, the Congress shall make suitable provision.

Art. 4. Those citizens who are natives of the country, and who have resided in it at least five years immediately preceding the election, can only be elevated to the Supreme Directorship.

Art. 5. The compensation of the Director of the state shall be twelve thousand dollars annually, and he shall receive no other emolument.

Art. 6. The person filling this office shall continue in it until a constitution be adopted, or until such time, anterior to it, as Congress may deem proper.

Art. 7. His title shall be that of Excellency; his guard and honors those of a captain-general of the army, respect being had to the ordinance.

Art. 8. Upon his entrance into office, he shall, before the Congress, or such commissioner or commissioners as they may appoint, assisted by all the corporations of the place, take the following oath:

"I, ———, do swear, by God, our Lord, and these Holy Evangelists, that I will discharge faithfully, and conformably to law, the office of Supreme Director of the state, to which I have been appointed; that I will observe the provisional regulation adopted by the sovereign Congress, the 3d of December, 1817; that I will protect the Apostolical Roman Catholic religion, being ever watchful to secure it respect and observance; that I will defend the territory of the provinces of the union against all hostile aggression, adopting such measures as I may deem suitable to preserve its integrity and independence; and I will retire from this office when the sovereign Congress shall so order. If I do thus, God prosper me; if not, to him and my country will I be accountable."

Art. 9. He shall watch over the execution of the laws, and the right administration of justice, urging its functionaries thereto, and to the carrying into effect the regulations of Congress, giving for the last object the necessary orders.

Art. 10. He shall submit to the consideration of the national representatives projects and reforms conducive to public happiness.

Art. 11. He shall be commander-in-chief of all the forces of the state, and shall have under his orders the navy, the army of the line, and the national militia of every description, for the protection of civil liberty, the defence, tranquillity, and good order of all the territory of the union.

Art. 12. He shall be the organ, and shall represent the United Provinces, for the purpose of treating with foreign Powers.

Art. 13. When he deems a rupture with any foreign Power inevitable, he shall submit to Congress the causes which impel to it.

Art. 14. If, upon a view of these, or for other reasons, Congress should decree war, the Supreme Director shall proceed to its solemn declaration, being authorized to raise land and sea forces to direct their movements, and to adopt all the measures necessary to the common defence and the annoyance of the enemy, respect being always had to art. 4, chap. 1, sec. 6, of the army and navy.

Art. 15. He shall have the power of commencing, conducting, and signing treaties of peace, alliance, commerce, and other foreign relations, which, however, to be valid, must be approved by the Congress within the time stipulated for their ratification, he transmitting in this stage of the negotiation all the documents relating to it.

Art. 16. In those cases in which secrecy is not essential to the happy result of negotiations, he shall submit to Congress their object and their state, to procure from this body such assistance as may facilitate them.

Art. 17. He shall receive the ambassadors, envoys, and consuls of other states, and shall nominate those whom it may be proper to send to foreign courts.

Art. 18. He shall appoint to all military offices and employments, generalships of the army, and naval forces, conforming to the existing ordinances of the army and marine, so far as they may be applicable.

Art. 19. He shall have the power of rewarding meritorious officers by promotion, and by bestowing medals of such form and design as he may deem best, without any allowance in money, however, independent of the pay.

Art. 20. He shall have the general superintendence over all the branches of the national property and revenues, over mints, mines, posts, and highways.

Art. 21. He shall appoint for the present to all offices vacant in the cathedrals of the United Provinces, and to all other benefices to which may pertain the right of presentation.

Art. 23. He may suspend public officers for just cause, giving afterwards an account to Congress.

Art. 24. If the suspension be merely for reasons of policy, the sovereign Congress itself shall take it into consideration.

Art. 25. If it be for imputed criminality, the sovereign Congress shall appoint a commission, which shall not be of their body, before which the agente de la camara shall accuse the person suspended; and the said commission, having heard the parties, shall declare whether or not he deserves to be removed from office.

Art. 26. He shall have the power of removing officers to other offices; and if, in consequence, they should be greatly prejudiced, they may bring the affair before Congress.

Art. 27. He shall nominate the three Secretaries—of State, of the Treasury, and of War, and their several officers; being responsible for the bad selection of the first.

Art. 28. He shall grant passports for travelling from the provinces of the state by sea and land, and licenses for the loading, unloading, and departure of vessels.

Art. 29. He shall be particularly careful to preserve unimpaired the credit of the state, being attentive to the collection of its revenues, and to the faithful payment of its debts, to the extent its exigencies will admit.

Art. 30. He may, of his own authority, expend freely the said revenues in defence of the state, during the war it is now waging for independence, with previous information in writing from the Secretaries of the Treasury and of War.

Art. 31. He shall confirm or revoke, in conformity to the opinion of his asesor, (who shall be the auditor general of war,) sentences passed on individuals by the military tribunes established in the armies, or in the capital, or by the ordinary councils of war in the other towns of the districts.

Art. 32. He shall have the power of suspending the execution of the capital sentences, of pardoning or commuting punishments on the anniversary of the national independence, or on the occurrence of any signal event, which shall augment the glory of the state, hearing first the information communicated by the tribunal before which the convict has been tried.

Art. 34. He shall every year transmit to the national representation an exact statement of all the receipts into the different treasuries of the state, and of the municipalities of the several provinces, in money or in credits, together with the expenditures, debts, and credits, giving timely orders to those who ought to prepare said statement.

Art. 35. The orders of the Supreme Director shall be obeyed exactly in the whole extent of the United Provinces.

Art. 36. He shall grant letters of naturalization for the present, and until a constitution be adopted.

Chapter II.—Limits of the Executive Power.

Art. 1. The Supreme Director shall not send expeditions by water, or by land, against any of the provinces in Congress united, or others of this continent who are engaged in sustaining their independence, without the consent of Congress previously obtained.

Art. 2. He may, nevertheless, do so in those cases in which it is absolutely necessary to act promptly, giving afterwards a particular account of such proceedings to the Congress.

Art. 3. He shall, in no case, hold command of a particular regiment.

Art. 4. He shall not exercise any jurisdiction, civil or criminal, in virtue of his office, nor upon petition of the parties; he shall not alter the system prescribed by the law for the administration of justice.

Art. 5. He shall, in no way, interfere with the causes cognizable by the tribunals of justice, either when pending, or when sentence has been pronounced, or carried into execution.

Art. 6. When the urgency of the case compels him to arrest any citizen, he shall, within the third day after, place him at the disposal of the proper officers of justice to await their judgment; giving, at the same time, a full statement of the motives of the arrest, and all other circumstances connected with it.

Art. 7. With the exception of those cases in which a compliance with what is required in the preceding article would endanger the public security, in which case he shall hold the arrested in custody, with the consent of his assessor, and the fiscal of the chamber of appeals, who shall share with him the responsibility for the time necessary to take the requisite measures for safety, placing him then at the judge's disposal.

Art. 8. He shall neither impose new taxes, contributions, nor loans, nor augment those subsisting, directly or indirectly, without a previous resolution of the Congress.

Art. 9. He shall issue no order, nor make any communication, without the previous subscription of the secretary of the department to which the business belongs; in defect of which subscription, the order or communication shall be void.

Art. 10. He shall not grant to any person in the state monopolies, or exclusive privileges, except to the inventors of arts, or to establishments of public utility, with the approbation of Congress.

Art. 11. The epistolary correspondence of the citizen is a thing sacred, which the Director shall neither violate nor intercept without incurring responsibility.

Art. 12. In cases, nevertheless, of well-founded fear of treason, or subversion of the public order, at the discretion of the Director, the Secretary of State and Sindico Procurador de Commun, who, in this case, shall each have a vote, being bound to secrecy and under equal responsibility, the former shall have the power of proceeding, with his said associates, to open and examine correspondence. The same power, under the same responsibility and like obligation to secrecy, in the governors and lieutenant governors of the several provinces, with their secretaries and sindico procuradores; in defect of whom the two first capitularies shall act.

Art. 13. Those who upon a scrutiny, as aforesaid, of correspondence shall appear to be guilty of the crime of treason, or subversion of public order, shall be proceeded against, and secured according to the greater or less imminence of the danger.

Art. 14. Except in the cases mentioned in article 30 of the preceding chapter, the Director shall not dispose of the funds of the state for extraordinary expenses, without the previous consent of the three secretaries, the assessor general, and the fiscal of the camara, and without its being made appear before the escribano de hacienda that the expenditure proposed is useful and necessary.

Art. 15. He shall not exercise the prerogative given him in article 32 of the preceding chapter, in case of treason, and other excepted cases.

Art. 16. He shall not bestow any office, civil or military, upon any person related to him in the third degree of consanguinity, or in the first of affinity, without the knowledge and approbation of Congress.

Art. 17. With the exception of those who, being already in service, may have been recommended for promotion by their respective chiefs, respect being had to seniority according to their merits.

Art. 18. He shall not confer the grade of brigadier, or of colonel-major, without the knowledge and approbation of Congress.

Art. 19. Excepting the case in which, for some brilliant action in war or extraordinary military service, it may be proper to reward immediately a chief whose grade is next to one of those above mentioned.

Chapter III.—Of the Secretaries of State.

Art. 1. The three Secretaries of State shall discharge all the duties assigned them in the last ordinance regulating their offices, which shall be in force, except where in contrariety to these articles.

Art. 2. They shall not, in any case, business, or circumstances, deliberate without the previous order and notification of the Director.

Art. 3. They shall have the power of communicating, of themselves, the orders issued by Government in the affairs of men, or importance, being bound to make an entry thereof in the book of entries, as is provided.

Art. 4. They shall not attest decrees or regulations, contrary to the provisional regulation, not even at the request or command of the Director; if compelled so to do, they shall make proper protests, and give immediate information of the affair to Congress.

Art. 5. They shall be removable at the will of the Director, equally with their subordinate officers.

Art. 6. When the removal is in consequence of inability, want of competent information, or any other defect compatible with integrity, they shall be indemnified with other employments suitable to their circumstances and merit. They shall incur no stigma by such removal.

Art. 7. When any one of these secretaries is removed for malversation, or upon petition of a party aggrieved, Congress shall take cognizance of the case.

Art. 8. The Supreme Director may, ex officio, or upon accusation, proceed summarily against the secretaries, giving an account of the proceeding to Congress.

Art. 9. For the trial of the secretaries, Congress shall appoint a commission, either of their own members, or of others, or it shall be appointed by such other body as they may substitute.

Art. 10. Sentence of acquittal, pronounced by the commission, shall not necessarily be followed by a restoration to office.

Art. 11. The secretaries may, for good cause, challenge the commissioners, and they may appeal from the sentence to three individuals, to be chosen out of nine, whom the Congress, a second time nominating, shall appoint.

Art. 12. The salary of these secretaries shall be three thousand dollars annually to each; the official title señor.

SECTION IV.—Of the Judicial Power.

Chapter 1.

Art. 1. The judicial power is in the body of the nation, until by them elsewhere placed; it shall be exercised for the present, and until a constitution be adopted, by the court established in article 14 of the following chapter; by the courts of appeal (las camaras de apeleciones,) and by the other judges. For those cases which have no court assigned by the law, Congress shall provide.

Art. 2. The judicial power shall be entirely independent of the executive and its principles; its form and extent shall be subject to the laws by which it is established.

Chapter 2.—Of the Courts of Justice.

Art. 1. The courts of appeal (las camaras de apelaciones) shall have the same territorial jurisdiction as heretofore; shall be composed of five individuals, and one fiscal; when united in a body, shall have the title of excellency, (excelencia,) individually, that of usted simply; their salary shall be fifteen hundred dollars each, free from payment of first-fruits, (media annata,) and all other charges.

Art. 2. The presidency of the courts in the interior, and at certain public assemblages, shall be held in turn by the five members every four months, according to seniority; the president shall take the votes, attend to the despatch of business, preservation of order, exercising all the powers of the ancient regentes, so far as they conform to this provisional regulation, and shall have the title of señor in official matters.

Art. 3. No one hereafter shall be named, even provisionally, for any of the offices of the courts of appeal, unless he be more than five-and-twenty years of age, and a lawyer who has practised at least six years.

Art. 4. When vacancies happen in these courts, no nominations of persons to fill them shall be made by the Director; in each vacancy, four persons being selected by the same tribunals from among the lawyers of the district, after examination and comparison of talents and services, and proposed to him.

Art. 5. The numerical order in which the aforesaid four persons are proposed shall give no preference; two of these shall be from the place where the court sits, the remaining two from other parts of the district.

Art. 6. These offices shall be holden during good behavior, but there may be removal from one court to another; and these officers shall be subject to scrutiny in their conduct every five years, or oftener, if justice should require it.

Art. 7. The court shall have two relatores, to be chosen after competition had; the salary of each shall be fifteen hundred dollars, and they shall have no other emolument.

Two assistants, one of the law civil, the other of the law criminal, dividing between them the business relating to the public revenues at the discretion of the fiscal. The salary of each shall be twelve hundred dollars, without the ancient perquisite of vistas (presents.)

Two bailiffs, (porteros,) who shall each have a salary of five hundred dollars, and who shall execute alternately for a week the office of alguacil.

Six attorneys, (procuradores,) whose intervention shall extend, when parties choose, to the subaltern judges of original jurisdiction, but not to the consulado; and the juggados de algadas y disputaciones de comercio.

And two notaries, (escribanos,) who shall only receive fees for services actually rendered, according to the regulation, (arancel,) without those called tiras,* which are henceforth forbidden.

Art. 8. They shall take cognizance, not only of all causes and business of which according to prior laws, the now abolished audiences had cognizance, but also of such as the provisional regulation designates.

Art. 9. Appeals from the decrees of the tribunal de algadas de comercio, because of their nullity or notorious injustice, shall be decided in the aforesaid courts of appeal (camaras.)

Art. 10. The trial of appeals (algadas) shall be taken in turn by the members of the court of the district in which the appeal occurs.

Art. 11. Questions that may occur between the ordinary and mercantile jurisdictions shall be decided by the aforesaid president, (camarista presidente,) conforming to the character by which the consulado is established.

Art. 12. They shall take cognizance, for the present, of first appeals in cases of smuggling, and other branches of the revenue, leaving their trial, in the first instance, to the intendentes de provincia; but in cases of capture, or detention of vessels by public or private armed ships, the cognizance shall continue in the tribunals in which it is already vested.

Art. 13. When a second appeal is taken, because of nullity, or notorious injustice, the courts, after hearing had, shall transmit an account of the proceedings, with the documents, to the Director.

* Fees paid when appeals were taken.

Art.14. Who, with the advice of his assessor general, (asesor general,) shall nominate immediately a commission of five lawyers, who shall decide the cause, and, having done so, shall be dissolved; while exercising this office they shall have the title of excellency.

Art. 15. There shall be named by the Director of the state, in the capital of every province, upon the recommendation under oath of its court, a lawyer, who shall exercise the functions of judge of appeals throughout the said provinces.

Art. 16. His salary shall be eighteen hundred dollars, free from first-fruits and other charges.

Chapter 3.—Of the Administration of Justice.

Art. 1. Justice shall be administered according to the principles and method which have been heretofore observed, so far as is compatible with the subsequent provisions.

Art. 2. The judges of appeals in the several provinces shall take cognizance of all appeals in civil cases from the ordinary alcaldes and other ministers of justice.

Art. 3. Appeals to the camaras, to the full extent given by law, shall be allowed to those interested in all cases, except those in which the amount of property involved is one thousand dollars, or less, when two similar sentences shall be conclusive.

Art. 4. They shall have cognizance of criminal causes of every kind, referring to the courts of appeal (las camaras) those which according to law ought to be referred to them.

Art. 5. Parties in the said causes shall have the privilege of resorting directly to the courts of appeal (las camaras,) passing by the provincial judge.

Art. 6. The ordinance of the 20th of April, 1812, shall be abolished.

Art. 7. In criminal cases the accused shall have the privilege of choosing a person to assist him, (padrino,) who shall be present at his confession, and at the examination of the witnesses, without prejudice to the lawyer established by law, and the practice of the courts.

Art. 8. The assistant mentioned in article 7 shall take care that the confession and depositions of the witnesses shall be heard by the notary or judge, clearly and distinctly, in the terms in which they may be expressed, without modification or alteration, assisting the accused, whenever, from fear, want of intellect, or other cause, he is unable, unassisted, to make himself understood.

Art. 9. Criminal causes of all classes, which may be pending without this new mode of defence, shall be prosecuted according to the usual course of law.

Art. 10. The taking of oaths shall be restored without innovation in all cases, except that of the accused's confession of his own criminality.

Art. 11. Sentences to hard labor, to whipping, or a banishment, shall not be executed without previous consultation with the courts of appeal (las camaras) under the penalty of two thousand dollars, and perpetual disqualification to be inflicted upon the judge violating this important article.

Art. 12. Except in those extreme cases in which the public safety is so greatly endangered by popular commotion, or other cause, as not to admit of executions being deferred; information being always given to the camaras.

Art. 13. All sentences in criminal causes, to be valid, must be pronounced according to the express letter of the law; the infraction of this article shall be a crime in the magistrate, punishable by the payment of costs, and all losses incurred in consequence.

Art. 14. By the last article, it is not intended to repeal the laws authorizing the infliction of punishment, at the discretion of the judge, according to the nature and circumstances of the offence; neither is it intended to re-establish any others which, from their cruelty, have been abolished, or softened by the practice of the superior tribunals.

Art. 15. No individual shall be arrested without semi-plenary proof of guilt, at least, which shall be stated in the previous process.

Art. 16. At the end of the third day the accused shall be informed of the cause of his arrest; and if the judge arresting be not authorized to take any further steps in the case, he shall refer it to the officer to whom its recognizance belongs.

Art. 17. No accused person shall be prevented from taking the sacrament after his confession, nor at any time for more than ten days, without just cause, which shall be entered of record; information of the obstacle to his communicating being given to the accused every third day while it continues.

Art. 18. Persons being for safe keeping, and not for the punishment of the accused, whatever, under the pretext of securing, serves only maliciously to harass, shall be punished by the superior tribunals, and proper indemnity being given to the aggrieved.

Art. 19. To decree arrest, seizure of goods, and examination of papers, against any inhabitant of the state, his name, or the marks which distinguish his person, and the object of the proceeding, must be mentioned in the decree.

Art. 20. When goods are seized, an inventory shall be carefully made of them in the presence of the accused, a duly attested copy of it shall be given to him, and they shall be placed for safe keeping in the custody of the notary employed in the case; or, in defect of him, of the judge decreeing the seizure, and two witnesses.

Art. 21. When, at the time of seizure, it is impracticable to make the aforesaid inventory, the goods shall be secured under two keys, one of which shall be taken by the judge, the other by the accused; when this is not practicable, the chests shall be closed and sealed in his presence; and the doors of the house, as soon as circumstances will admit, shall be opened in his presence, and the inventory made.

Art. 22. When the seizure must be made in the absence of the accused, the judge shall name a respectable and substantial citizen, who shall act for him, and be recompensed in proportion to his labor; but if the absence of the accused arises from sickness, he shall appoint such person as he pleases as his substitute.

Art. 23. The judge or deputy arresting any citizen (not being taken in the act) without conforming to article 15 of this chapter, shall be removed; he who fails to do what is prescribed when goods are seized, shall be responsible to the owner, and make good any loss accruing in consequence.

Art. 24. The tribunal de concordia being abolished, the judge having original jurisdiction, before taking cognizance of a cause, shall use all possible means of reconciling the parties.

Art. 25. Notaries shall serve personal notices on the parties, who are to subscribe them. In case of resistance, or incapacity to sign, the service shall be supplied by a witness, with a statement of the defect.

Art. 26. If the notary shall not find the party to be notified at his house, he shall seek him there twice more; if then he does not find him there, he shall leave a paper signed by him, which shall contain the decree, or other matter he goes to serve; and it being made to appear in the process that due diligence has been used to execute it, the same effects shall result as if the party had been personally notified.

Art. 27. Every omission of the notaries, in a matter so interesting, shall be punished by the judge before whom the cause is pending, according to the enormity, and other circumstances of the case.

Chapter 4.—Of the Governors of Provinces.

Art. 1. The governors and lieutenant governors shall not, in virtue of office, have any jurisdiction, civil or criminal; retaining, however, all the powers relating to revenue, police, and war.

Art. 2. The code of the intendencies shall be observed by them, and all others, to whom it relates, save only what relates to the junta superior de hacienda, which shall be abolished, and also what may be contrary to this provisional regulation.

Art. 3. Neither the governors nor lieutenant governors shall use the power which the 15th article of the said code gives for confirming the decrees of the Cabildos.

Art. 4. In those cases, however, of well-founded fear that the public order will be subverted by executing said decrees, they may suspend them, being responsible should the Director not previously approve the proceedings.

Art. 5. All that is prohibited in chapter 2, section 3, to the Supreme Director of the state, shall be also forbidden to the governors and lieutenant governors, so far as it is applicable to their respective offices.

Art. 6. The office of deputy assessor of the intendencies, as established by the code mentioned in art. 2, shall be suppressed. Those who have obtained this office shall be attended to by the courts (camaras) in their recommendations for other employments.

Art. 7. The governors, while in office, shall appoint as secretaries such persons as they please, who must, however, be lawyers, and who shall assist them in the departments of Government enumerated in article 1 of this chapter; they shall, when they have thus nominated, inform the Director, that he may grant proper commissions.

Art. 8. The salary of such secretary shall be, for the present, twelve hundred dollars a year, including the six hundred provided by the code mentioned in article 2, for the expenses of the secretaryship, free from first-fruits and other charges.

Art. 9. No public officer of the Government mentioned in the chapters of this section shall receive any emoluments, except in case of services rendered in defect of the notary, other than those assigned by law to his office.

SECTION V.—The Mode of choosing Public Officers.

Chapter 1.—Of the manner in which the Governor, Lieutenant Governor, and Subdelegados shall be chosen.

Art. 1. Governors, lieutenant governors, and subdelegados shall be appointed by the Director of the state, from the lists of persons eligible, either within or without the particular province, which the several Cabildos, the first month after election, shall form and transmit to him.

Art. 2. These lists, which shall be printed, shall not contain more than eight, nor less than four persons for each province.

Art. 3. Of those comprehended in one list, no more than two shall be chosen, unless a third should be included in the lists of another province.

Art. 4. The appointments of subdelegates of districts having a numerous population, without Cabildos, shall be made provisionally, until municipalities are established in them.

Art. 5. The aforesaid officers shall hold their offices for the term of three years; at the expiration of which, they shall be subject to scrutiny into their conduct, (residencias.)

Art. 6. The salary of governors of provinces, in territory actually free, shall be three thousand dollars, and that of lieutenant governors two thousand.

Art. 7. If any individual, by artifice, intrigue, bribery, or other unlawful means, procures the insertion of his name on the aforesaid list, it shall be erased therefrom by the Director of the state, and he shall be declared incapable of holding any office, there being sufficient evidence of his guilt.

Art. 8. If the capitulares are, in any way, delinquent in forming the said lists, they shall incur the punishment in the last article mentioned.

Chapter 2.—Election of Cabildos.

Art. 1. Election to deliberative offices (empleos consiples) shall be by the people, in the cities and towns where Cabildos are established; but the notifications to electors shall not extend to those who reside beyond their precincts.

Art. 2. The citizens, nevertheless, of the vicinity and county, in the exercise of the rights of suffrage, may vote, if they so think proper, at said election.

Art. 3. The city or town shall be divided into four sections, in each one of which the citizens comprehended in it shall vote for as many electors as correspond to the number of inhabitants in said district, in the proportion of one elector to every five thousand souls.

Art. 4. In the cities and towns whose population may not be sufficient for the appointment of five electors, five shall, however, necessarily be chosen, each votable voting in his own section for such persons as he deems proper.

Art. 5. At this election shall preside a capitular, associated with two alcaldes de vaino and a notary, or, in defect of him, two inhabitants of the vicinity, in the quality of witnesses; and it shall be holden on the 15th day of November.

Art. 6. The votary being concluded in the several sections, all the votes shall be collected in the sala capitular; and, being publicly counted by those who have presided as aforesaid, associated with the alcalde de primer voto, those shall be elected who have a majority in their favor.

Art. 7. The electors shall meet on the 15th of December, in the same sala capitular, to make the election for the ensuing year; and, it being made, they shall notify the elected, in order that they may be ready to enter upon their offices as soon as the term of service of the Cabildo they are to succeed expires; information being given to the governor and to the Director of the state.

Art. 8. The Cabildos, the second day after entering into office, shall elect the alcaldes de barrio, hermandad, and pedaneros, who may be necessary to maintain order and administer justice, according to the powers vested in them, in all the curacies and departments of the country comprehended in their respective territories.

Art. 9. They shall form a book for the said elections, which shall be made to fall upon persons of the best repute for talents and integrity, residents in the vicinity, and who know how to read and write; and they shall transmit a list of the persons elected to the governor or lieutenant governor of the province, for his information.

Art. 10. They shall appoint an assessor, (letrado,) who must be of the corporation, and one of the alcaldes ordinarios.

Art. 11. The Cabildo shall establish the salary of the assessor, it being charged upon the funds of the municipality; if it has not been previously established, when such funds are inadequate, information shall be given to the Supreme Director, in order that he may make proper provision.

Art. 12. The governors and lieutenant governors, and Cabildos already established, under the highest responsibility, shall be required to inform the Congress of the places in which, from their possessing the requisite population, it may be proper to erect new corporations, with the titles of cities or towns.

Chapter 3.—Mode of appointing Ministerial Officers.

Art. 1. Those public officers who are required to be lawyers, with the exception of the asesores de Cabildo, and secretarios, asesores de intendencias, shall be nominated by the Director, upon the recommendation, under oath, of the courts of appeal for the respective districts. The order in which persons may be named in the aforesaid recommendation shall give no preference.

Art. 2. Recommendations for appointments to military offices of every grade and description shall be strictly made according to the order and scale which the ordinanza general del exercito prescribes.

Art. 3. Appointments to offices relating to revenue, police, dockyards, manufactories, the office of captain of the port, and the like, shall be made by the Director, upon the recommendation of their respective chiefs, according to seniority, when there is an equality as to ability and services.

Art. 4. The list of persons recommended shall be published by the chief recommending in the office or department where the vacancy happens, at least eight days before he transmits it to the Director, that opportunity may be afforded to those aggrieved by it to obtain suitable redress.

Art. 5. When his interposition is proper, the Director shall interpose, and, proceeding summarily, declare the recommendation just, if he so finds it, and go on to nominate, or return it to the chief making it, to be amended.

Art. 6. In commissions, the qualifications and condition of the person commissioned shall always be expressed; without which, he shall not be enrolled in the tribunal of accounts and the offices which belong to it, nor receive the salary to which he would be otherwise entitled.

Art. 7. Appointments to the offices of chiefs of every description shall be made by the Director, respect being had to the right of choice in those in the vicinity where the vacancy happens (if such right exist) and timely information being given, as far as the public interest will admit; the Director shall be responsible for the bad selection of the said chiefs.

Art. 8. All other offices in the state, the appointment to which is not by law otherwise vested, shall be open to the Director, to be filled by him with such citizens as he may deem most suitable.

Art. 9. All ministerial offices shall be holden during good behavior.

Chapter 4.—Of the mode of electing the Deputies from the Provinces to the General Congress.

Art. 1. Prior to the meetings of the primary assemblies (asambleas primarias) to be holden for the election of the deputies of the provinces, there shall be taken an accurate census of all the inhabitants of each district, unless it has been already done, at least eight years from the present time, with a statement of that portion of the population inhabiting cities, towns, and villages.

Art. 2. The primary assemblies in the cities and towns which have municipalities shall be held in four sections, in each of which shall preside one member of the municipality, and two juezes de barrio, of the greatest probity, assisted by a notary, if there be a competent number of these officers; if otherwise, in the presence of two witnesses.

Art. 3. In every section, the votables shall vote for so great a number of electors as shall correspond to the total of population, in such manner as that there shall be one elector for every five thousand souls; but if the city or town does not admit of division into four sections, all the citizens shall vote in one place.

Art. 4. In the country the same proportion shall be observed at elections, but the method as to the sections shall be different.

Art. 5. In every primary assembly there shall be sections, and each citizen shall vote therein for an elector.

Art. 6. The principal judge of the curacy, and the curate, with three neighbors of probity to be appointed by the municipality of the district, shall meet at the house of the first, and shall receive the votes as they are given in, depositing them immediately in a small chest under three keys, which shall be distributed between the judge, the curate, and one of the aforesaid neighbors.

Art. 7. The vote may be given either verbally or in writing, open or closed, as may be most agreeable to the voter; in it he shall name such person for the office of elector as he shall think proper.

Art. 8. The voter, after he has given in his vote, and, if verbally, after its insertion in a schedule, shall retire; the judge shall attend particularly to this, to prevent confusion and altercation.

Art. 9. If any one be charged at such election, or afterwards, with either offering or taking a bribe, he shall immediately make verbal defence before the five judges of the section; the accuser and accused being confronted, and the charge being substantiated, he shall forever after be incapable of voting, and be ineligible to any office; false accusers shall suffer the same punishment as those they accused would have done had the charge been substantiated.

Art. 10. The voting shall positively be concluded at the end of two days. The votes of each section shall remain shut up; and the following day the alcalde, with two of the three associated neighbors aforesaid, shall take the chest containing them to the seccion de numero, the curate then delivering that key which was intrusted to him.

Art. 11. The district of united curacies which shall include in its territory five thousand souls shall be the seccion de numero.

Art. 12. If there should be no town in the district of the seccion de numero, the municipality of some neighboring territory shall designate the curacy, which shall be the head of the section, preferring always the most populous and deciding questions which may arise in it.

Art. 13. To the head of the seccion de numero shall be brought the chests of the secciones de proporcion, and they shall be received by the judge, the curate, and the three associated neighbors aforesaid, who, opening them, shall count the votes, declaring and certifying the majority. All this shall be done publicly.

Art. 14. Those chosen electors shall be informed of their election, and shall immediately repair to the place where the electoral assembly is to be held.

Chapter 5.—Of the Electoral Assemblies.

Art. 1. The electoral assembly shall meet in the town-house of the city or town which has a municipality, where they shall assemble on the day appointed, according to distance and other circumstances, without delay.

Art. 2. The governor, lieutenant governor, or subdelegado, who may be at the head of the municipality, shall preside at the first act of the electors, which shall be to nominate a president from among themselves to preserve order. He having the majority of votes shall be president; and, upon his election, the president pro tem. shall give place to him, and retire immediately.

Art. 3. The proceedings of the electoral assembly shall be put in writing by the notary (escribano) of the municipality; and this assembly shall only have the power of doing, previously to the business for which they are chosen, such things as are necessary to establish the regularity and validity of its election, without occupying for such purpose more time than is necessary, or four-and-twenty hours.

Art. 4. It shall proceed immediately to the election of deputies for the Congress, and the election shall result, for the present, from a simple plurality of votes.

Art. 5. If the case should be such that, by the scattering of the votes, and adherence to them after the third voting, no simple majority results, then those between whom there is an equality of votes shall draw lots, and this shall decide.

Art. 6. No elector shall vote for himself. Within three days the election shall positively be concluded, and the result published. The president shall immediately inform each person selected of his election, transmitting a proper certificate, authenticated by the notary, of the fact.

Art. 7. As the number of deputies to form the General Congress must depend upon the census spoken of in article 1, chapter 4, there shall be such regulation that for every fifteen thousand souls there shall be one representative named.

Art. 8. Should there be any fractions, the following rules shall be observed: 1. If, in the seccion de numero, there should be any fraction not exceeding two thousand five hundred souls, only one elector shall be voted for; but, if it exceed that number, two. 2. If, in the district of fifteen thousand souls which each deputy shall represent, there should be any fraction exceeding seven thousand five hundred souls, there shall be named for them in the electoral assembly one deputy; but, if the fraction should be less, they shall not have such additional representative, but be considered as represented by the deputies of the provinces.

Art. 9. Each province may lessen the number of its representatives, conferring the necessary powers and giving the proper instructions to those they may deem sufficient, if the want of sufficient funds, distance, or other just cause, prevent their naming the number adequate to their population, with the express condition that in such powers the cause of the diminution be stated.

Art. 10. No one while in the office of representative shall hold any other public office, employment, or commission. If he accept any other, he shall lose the first; but if his constituents, after his so losing it, re-elect him, he may in this case hold the two offices, exercising the last by deputy.

SECTION VI.—Of the Army and Navy.

Chapter 1.—Of the Marine and Regular Troops.

Art. 1. In all that relates to the naval forces, the last ordinance of marine (ordinanza de marina) shall be observed, so far as it is conformable to the actual circumstances of the state.

Art. 2. The Director shall have the whole military authority, and be commander-in-chief of the navy, the army, and the militia: he shall appoint a commandant of each, the estado mayor general serving at present in lieu of them.

Art. 3. The provision in article 3, of the limits of the executive power, shall extend equally to the chief of the estado mayor general and the generals of the army.

Art. 4. New regiments shall not be created while those already created are not filled up.

Art. 5. The supernumerary officers of all descriptions, who, at different epochs of the Government, may have been dismissed from active service, either with reason or without, (which shall be ascertained,) upon declaration of their readiness to serve, shall be classed for appointments to vacancies in their regiments, without prejudicing those actually serving in them, or to other vacancies suitable to the circumstances of the individual.

Art. 6. If the supernumeraries in the preceding articles mentioned should have received whole pay, or half, or one-third, the Directors of the state shall require from the officers of the treasury a catalogue of them, and the orders that may have been received for their payment, correcting them according to what results from the provision in said preceding article.

Art. 7. Until there be a complete regulation on this head, there shall be no appointment to offices of profit except those of escala natural in the regiment, upon the recommendation of their respective chiefs, according to the ordinance, and through the medium of the estado mayor general, to whom the scale of classification, mentioned in article 5, shall be sent, that it may appear who are in service, and who are not.

Art. 8. Until the establishment of the uniform systems mentioned in article 17 of this chapter, the tribunal militar, established under the regulation under which it was governed, shall continue in lieu of the ancient commission, it being the duty of the defender of the accused to be present at confession.

Art. 9. That article of a prior regulation, which imposes upon deserters the punishment of death for the first offence, and which declares that the plea of pay being withheld shall not avail, being abolished in future, the ordinanzo militar shall govern, and the punishment it provides for cases of desertion be alone imposed.

Throughout the state shall be observed the ordinance of 30th January, 1814, as to supplying vacancies caused by desertion. [Note.—The following article was in the original erroneously marked the 10th.]

Art. 11. Governors, lieutenant governors, and sudelegados shall be ever watchful for the apprehension of deserters; if they fail in this particular, it shall be one of the first duties, when residencia* takes place, to inflict upon them exemplary punishment.

Art. 12. If neglect in this particular be proved against them before their offices expire, it shall be the indispensable duty of the Director to remove them.

Art. 13. The alcaldes de hermandad and pedancas de los curatos, for like neglect, shall incur for the first offence a fine of one hundred dollars, to be applied to defray the expenses of recruiting; and, upon the repetition thereof, be removed.

Art. 14. The soldier who shall inform against a deserter, shall, upon his apprehension, be rewarded with ten dollars, and the abatement of two years of his term of service.

* Residencia.—According to the Spanish law, officers, at the expiration of term of service, are bound to reside for a certain period in the places where they exercised their offices, to give an opportunity to proceed against their malversations.

Art. 15. The subaltern officers shall read frequently to the soldiers of their respective companies the ordinances of the penal laws, from article 26 to article 43, inclusive, of tit. 10, trat. 8.

Art. 16. This ordinance being in a great measure altered, shall be, without delay, reduced to order by another, which shall be formed by a military commission of three individuals, to be named by the Director, associated with the asesor general of war, and, being framed, shall be transmitted to Congress for its sanction.

Art. 17. The Director shall also name another commission of five individuals, military men of the most extensive information, who shall form a uniform military system, embracing the regular forces of the state and national militia.

Art. 18. He shall also appoint another commission, composed of as many individuals as he thinks proper, to form a uniform system for the regulation of the marine, in all branches embracing arrangements as to ports, the establishment of nautical and mathematical schools, and transmitting it, when formed, to Congress.

Art. 19. He shall establish in the capital a permanent academy, appointing its president for the instruction of cadets of the regiment of infantry and cavalry, upon a plan to be furnished by the estado mayor general, and approved by the Director.

Chapter 2.—Of the National Militia.

Art. 1. Every individual of the state being in America, every foreigner enjoying the right of suffrage, every European Spaniard, with letters of naturalization, and all free persons of African or mixed blood, inhabitants of the cities, towns, villages, and country, from the age of fifteen to sixty, unless incapacitated by infirmity, are soldiers of the state, bound to support the independence which has been declared.

Art. 2. From the aggregate of all these inhabitants shall be formed, with all possible speed, in all the respective provinces, by the respective governors, lieutenant governors, and subdelegados, a body of national militia of infantry or cavalry, according to the quota of the province, and upon that footing as to force which the Director shall determine by regiments, battalions, squadrons, or independent companies, subject to the regulation of the 14th January, 1801, made for the provincial militia, the estado mayor general giving information of variations and additions when deemed necessary.

Art. 3. The governor, lieutenant governor, and subdelegado of each province shall be commander-in-chief of its militia, while in office, and shall make all recommendations for promotion to the Director, through the medium of the estado mayor general, in the department of Buenos Ayres. The governor shall, in like manner, command the militia, if he be a military man; if not, the commandante general de les armes shall command.

Art. 4. In the national militia shall be included all persons who have obtained commissions in it since the date of the last-cited regulations, being Americans or European Spaniards, with letters of naturalization.

Art. 5. It shall be one of the first duties of the governors, lieutenant governors, or subdelegados to preserve the national militia in a state of good discipline.

Art. 6. The principal object of this militia shall be to defend the state, and to aid and reinforce the army of the line when it shall be necessary.

Art. 7. When it may be necessary to detach a portion of the militia to reinforce the army of the line, the abovementioned chiefs shall do so with persons having no just ground to claim exemptions from the service, supplying immediately the place of the force detached, in order to preserve entire the national force of the province.

Chapter 3.—Of that portion of the Militia termed Civicos.

Art. 1. Of the inhabitants of the several cities, towns, and villages, shall be formed the corps of civicos, by regiments, battalions, or independent companies.

Art. 2. This militia shall be solely of such as have property worth one thousand dollars at least, of the owners of open shops, and of all who exercise a trade, or pursue some public occupation.

Art. 3. In the department of Buenos Ayres the civicos shall be subject to the Cabildo in subordination to the Supreme Director.

Art. 4. Of the residue of the inhabitants, the Cabildos shall have the command of as many as they can organize, without prejudice to what belongs to the governors, lieutenant governors, and subdelegados, in virtue of their offices.

Art. 5. The appointment of officers (to captains inclusive) shall be made by the Director, upon the recommendations of the chiefs of regiments, which the Cabildos shall transmit through the medium of the estado mayor general. The Cabildos shall, by themselves, recommend for officers of higher grades.

Art. 6. Those persons only of the regular army incorporated as chiefs, as sergeants, or corporals, for the purpose of instruction, shall be out of the ordinary civil jurisdiction, in order better to prevent unjust imprisonment.

Art. 7. The principal duties of the civicos shall be to maintain good order in the towns, to assist in the administration of justice, and defend the country.

Art. 8. No soldier of the army, of the line or militia, national or civic, to whom arms have been intrusted, shall use them factiously against any inhabitant of the state.

Art. 9. The persons thus misusing them shall be tried and punished within the third day by the judge to whom the cognizance of the offence belongs, for the satisfaction of public justice, deeply interested in personal security.

SECTION VII.—Personal Security and the Liberty of the Press.

Chapter 1.

Art. 1. For those actions offending neither against public order nor interfering with private rights, men are solely accountable to God.

Art. 2. No inhabitant of the state shall be obliged to do that which the law does not clearly and explicitly command, nor restrained from that which it does not, in like manner, prohibit.

Art. 3. Crime is solely the infraction of laws in full force, since, without this requisite, they are not obligatory.

Art. 4. No inhabitant of the state shall be punished without previous legal sentence and regular process.

Art. 5. All orders that shall be issued by magistrates in the regular exercise of authority, to promote public order, or to regulate the business pertaining to their office, shall be in writing.

Art. 6. Excepting orders relating to the army in matters belonging to the service, as to which the ordinance of the provinces of the union shall be observed.

Art. 7. Every citizen may keep in his house powder and arms, for the defence of his person and property, in those urgent cases in which he cannot avail himself of the protection of the magistrate.

Art. 8. The Government shall not take possession of such arms unless the public defence should require them, paying their just value.

Art. 9. The house of a citizen is a sanctuary, which it shall be a crime to violate; it shall not be forcibly entered except in case of resistance to legal process.

Art. 10. The right of forcible entry, given in article 9, shall be exercised with moderation, personally, by the judge issuing the process; and, in case of his being utterly unable to act in person, the order, delegating the power, shall be in writing, with all necessary specifications, a copy being given to the individual when apprehended, and to the owner of the house, should he so require.

Art. 11. No citizen shall resist the arrest of his person or the seizure of his goods, when decreed by a competent magistrate; but he shall have the right of claiming the full benefit of the provisions in favor of personal security, contained in chapter 3, section 4, of this provisional regulation.

Art. 12. Every man shall have the liberty of remaining in the territory of the state, or of departing therefrom, as he thinks proper, so long as the public security is not thereby endangered, or its interests prejudiced.

Art. 13. The preceding provisions in favor of personal liberty shall never be suspended.

Art. 14. Except in those extreme cases in which the public security may require such suspensions, the public authorities, driven by so lamentable a necessity to this measure, shall give an account of it to Congress, who shall examine into its cause and the time of its duration.

Chapter 2.—Liberty of the Press.

Art. 1. The decree concerning the liberty of the press, which was issued October 26, 1811, and which is incorporated in this chapter, shall be observed.

Art. 2. To facilitate the use of this liberty, it is declared that any individual, be he native or foreigner, may freely erect printing-presses in any city or town of the state, with this sole condition: that he shall give previous information to the provincial governor, lieutenant governor, and Cabildo, and that every thing printed shall bear the name of the printer, and of the place where the press is erected.

Art. 3. The intendentes de policia shall be particularly careful that in periodical works and public papers the greatest possible decorum shall be preserved, without failure of the respect due to magistrates, to the public, and to individuals.

Art. 4. In cases of violations of article 3, it shall be the duty of the said intendentes to give notice to the tribunal of the liberty of the press, which, conformably to the laws establishing and regulating it, shall scrupulously examine the matter.

Decree of the Liberty of the Press of October 20, 1811.

Art. 1. Every man may publish his opinions freely and without previous license, (previa censura;) all laws and regulations contrary to this liberty shall be of no effect.

Art. 2. The abuse of this liberty is a crime when it invades private rights; its prosecution belongs to the persons interested, and to all the citizens when it endangers the Roman Catholic religion, the public tranquillity, or the constitution of the state. The magistrates having cognizance shall impose the punishment according to law.

Art. 3. To guard against abuses in the classification and graduation of crimes of this kind, there shall be created a body of nine individuals, with the title of protectors of the liberty of the press. In order to its formation, the Cabildo shall present a list of fifty respectable persons not employed in the administration of the Government; from these, selections shall be made according to plurality of votes. The electors shall be the prelado eclesiastico, alcalde de primer voto, sindico procurador, fiscal de la camera, and two respectable persons of the vicinity, nominated by the Cabildo. The escribano de pueblo shall certify the election and respective commissions, which shall be delivered to the elected without loss of time.

Art. 4. The power of these protectors shall be limited to determining whether or not there be criminal matter in such publications as may be submitted to them. The punishment of the crime, after the evidence is declared, shall belong to the magistrates. The protectors shall hold their offices for one year, at the expiration of which there shall be a new election.

Art. 5. The third of the votes in favor of the accused shall be a sentence of acquittal.

Art. 6. Any party interested appealing, the protectors shall choose, by lot, nine individuals of the forty-one remaining on the list out of which they themselves were selected; these shall review the matter, and their sentence, if in favor of the accused, shall be irrevocable. In cases of challenge for just cause, the places of the challenged shall be supplied in the same manner.

Art. 7. The same method shall be followed in the provincial capitals, substituting for the prior de consulado, the deputado de comercia, and for the fiscal de la camera the promotor fiscal.

Art. 8. Works which treat of religion shall not be published without scrutiny by the diocesan. In case of accusation, the work shall be re-examined by the same ecclesiastic, assisted by four of the protectors, and the majority of votes shall constitute an irrevocable sentence.

Art. 9. Authors are responsible for their works, or the printers, not making it appear to whom they belong.

Art. 10. This decree shall be observed till Congress otherwise determine.

Final Chapter.—General Provisions.

1. The reglamento de policia, (regulation of police,) issued the 22d day of December, 1812, for the capital and province of Buenos Ayres, shall subsist for the present under the following limitations:

The powers of the intendente de policia shall remain vested as they are, in the governor of the province; the three commissaries, with the powers and duties designated in the said regulation, shall continue for the present under the inspection of the governor, and among them seniority as to the possession of office shall alone give preference; except their salaries, they shall receive no emolument for services performed in quality of commissaries. The governor shall undertake no work requiring expenditure of public money, without previous consent of the Cabildo and the approbation of the Director. Every payment shall be made according to the mode prescribed in the said regulation. No payment shall be made at the treasury, without the approbation of the Supreme Director, and the treasurer shall replace money paid by him contrary to this article. The 3d, 4th, and 5th articles, which establish an assessor, portero, and escribano de ramo, shall be repealed, the last office being exercised by a like officer of the General Government. The 8th, 10th, and 14th, shall only have effect so far as they are compatible with personal security, liberty of the press, and other rights of man, which have been declared. The 41st of the circular instruction to the alcaldes de barrio shall be observed so far as it is compatible with the chapter upon the liberty of the press. All the change that may have been made contrary to the said reglamento de policia, and to what the estatuto provisional (provisional statute) of May 5, 1815, in article 1, final chapter of general provisions, provides, shall be amended; the office of four commissaries last established being suppressed.

2. The Cabildos of the other cities and towns of the state shall appoint a commission of four persons of the vicinity, of the best information and the greatest zeal for the public good, who, keeping in mind the said reglamentos of the capital, shall form one suitable to the circumstances of the place, transmitting it to Congress for their approbation.

3. Securities for the due discharge of duty shall be required from all officers, according to the nature of each office; the laws formerly requiring them being hereby restored. Those exercising offices for the due performance of which security ought to be given, are peremptorily required to give it within six months from the date of this provisional regulation, the Director and governors attending to this, with the privilege of taking four securities, each security binding himself for one-fourth of the whole amount.

4. To the officers of the treasury, (ministras de hacienda,) and the officers of the custom-house, (administradores de aduana,) shall be restored the coercive jurisdiction for the recovery and collection of debts, certain and liquidated, in favor of the state.

5. The laws and decrees made by the last convention (asamblea) as to religious profession shall be of no effect.

6. Contributions imposed in one province for its special benefit shall not extend to the other.

7. All the provinces in the union, cities and towns, having Cabildos, may, without the necessity of obtaining permission, giving, however, previous information to the Director, make all the establishments they may deem useful and promotive of their industry, prosperity, arts and sciences, without prejudice to the friends of the state.

8. All those in possession of letters of naturalization, which have not been issued by the former General Constituent Assembly, by the present Congress, or the Supreme Director for the time being, in virtue of the decree of the 29th August, shall present them to the present one for ratification, should they deserve it, without which they shall be of no effect.

9. All the officers of the Government, including the Supreme Director of the state and his secretaries, shall, upon termination of office, be liable to inquiry into their conduct; the Director and his secretaries before Congress, the others before judges to be appointed by the Congress; the last shall be liable to such inquiry for four months after termination of office.

10. The present provincial regulation shall be observed throughout all the territory of the state from the time of publication, which the Director shall cause to be made in a convenient form; those articles of the provisional statute (estatuto proviscina) passed by the Junta de Observacion, not comprehended herein, being repealed, and all anterior laws, regulations, and decrees in opposition to it, being in like manner repealed.

Sanctioned by the General Congress, sealed with the provisional seal, signed by the president, and countersigned by his secretary, in Buenos Ayres, the third day of December, A. D. one thousand eight hundred and seventeen.

PEDRO LEON GALLO, President.

Doct. Jose Eugenio Eleas, Secretary.

The Director (ad interim) of the state, in Buenos Ayres, to the citizens of all the provinces.

Buenos Ayres, August 8, 1815.

I could wish, by means of a detailed manifesto, to explain to the people every step which has been taken for the purpose of establishing concord with the Chief of the Orientals, and the difficulties which have constantly opposed themselves to so desirable an object; by this means, also, holding out a warning to all minds of the evils which must flow from these unfortunate differences. But, for the present, this is not possible, nor so necessary as the immediate communication to all of the results of our last negotiations.

No mystery has been attempted in this business; even the minutest particulars have been made known to all such as were desirous of being informed; but, at a distance, every thing is liable to misrepresentation: it is, therefore, my duty to provide against it. For this purpose, I confine myself, for the present, to the publication of the documents necessary for the information that may be desired. These will save me the trouble of a statement that may possibly deserve the imputation of being made with passion; while the citizens of all the provinces will thus be left at liberty to form their opinions according to the dictates of their reason, without being led astray by partiality.

It is notorious that I sent deputies to the Chief of the Orientals, in order that we might fix upon some plan of establishing such an understanding and harmony as would be sufficient to avoid reciprocal aggressions until the General Congress should be assembled, and arrange our differences on permanent principles.

The propositions reciprocally made did not satisfy either. The decision was reserved for a future Congress.

Such was the state of things, when there appeared in this city four deputies, sent from an assembly of the Orientals, and, united with these, Cordova, Santa Fé, and Corrientes, with official instructions from General Artigas, which authorized them to enter into stipulations. The documents subjoined have originated from this procedure.

Finally, after refusing to sign the statement No. 2, of the document No. 3, they returned, giving assurances, by word, that they went in peace, and they were answered, "Peace be with you." People of the provinces! it is for you to judge; the case is yours, and your safety is the supreme law of the state.

IGNACIO ALVAREZ.

Plan for the establishment of harmony, presented by the deputation of the Chief of the Orientals to the Government of Buenos Ayres.

Buenos Ayres, July 3, 1815.

There shall be a union, offensive and defensive, between the provinces under the direction of the Chief of the Orientals and the Government of Buenos Ayres.

The troops of Buenos Ayres which passed over to the eastern shore of the Uruguay shall be considered as purely auxiliary, until the occupation of Montevideo. There shall be restored of what was carried away from that place three thousand stand of arms, one thousand swords, twelve pieces of light artillery, of twos, fours, and sixes. There shall be mounted on the fortifications the number of pieces of artillery that may be requisite, the principal portion to be brass, with the necessary material for all and each of said cannon; nine gun-boats, with all requisite supplies; powder, fixed ammunition for cannon of every calibre, also for small arms, and fifty-five thousand flints; one-half of the mortars taken away; the bombs and grenades, with every thing for using them, together with the printing press.

To Santa Fé there shall be delivered five hundred stand of arms.

To Cordova a like number.

The remainder of the articles withdrawn from the Oriental province of the Uruguay shall remain in Buenos Ayres as a deposite, for the purpose of aiding the other provinces, to be used at the instance of the Chief of the Orientals, and for the aid of the province of Buenos Ayres itself, according to its future exigencies.

The deputation has the honor to state to his excellency the Director of Buenos Ayres that they will cheerfully enter into any discussions to which their propositions may give rise with the magistracy of this capital, according to the 25th article of the 1st chapter, section 3, of the provisional statute.

Official letter of his excellency the Director of the state to the Chief of the Orientals.

BUENOS AYRES, August 1, 1815.

The deputation sent by your excellency to this Government presented your esteemed communication of the 29th ultimo, which, at the same time that it served as the credentials of the mission, manifested the desire of conciliation which animates your excellency. I was, indeed, induced to expect from this that the mission had been directed to propose more reasonable grounds of accommodation than those offered by yourself to my deputies, Colonel Pico and D. Riverola. Judging by my own heart, I considered the negotiation already ended. I requested the deputies to give me their proposals in writing; and the following day they reproduced, in substance, the same as before offered, with the addition of several supernumerary articles. I immediately took steps to assemble the authorities, according to the provisions in such cases of the 25th art. chap. 1st, section 3d, of the provisional statute, by whom the subject has been maturely considered, and the plan proposed anew on your part duly weighed. They have resolved to give for answer that the claims of your excellency ought to be left to the supreme judgment of the General Congress of all the provinces; that if, in reality, the sovereignty of this august body is to be recognised, it is proper to wait for its determination, which will irrevocably terminate our differences. We concurred in our private opinions how injurious to the common cause these discords must be, particularly in this important portion of the country. The sending to your excellency the beforementioned deputies was an act dictated by the necessity of coming to an amicable understanding, so that the expedition expected from the Peninsula should find us acting in concert, as I have expressly stated in my communication of the 11th of May. In such circumstances, it was plainly for the common interest that we should at least agree not to make war upon each other, even if we should be unable to agree upon any thing else. It never could be just to expose the fate of all the provinces, by disputes between the Orientals and Buenos Ayres, for advantages reciprocally claimed over each other. But, since the danger which threatened us is dissipated, let us await the decision of the Supreme Congress on our cause. If we are liberal in our principles, and are not disposed to wrong the other provinces, let us give them a share in the adjudication of rights, when it so properly belongs to them.

Buenos Ayres, by the sacrifices she has made, has been reduced to her present state of honorable poverty; her efforts were made as a member of the union, and as the capital of all; as a member, she has brought all her wealth into the common fund; as the capital, she has received contributions from the other members without discrimination. But for none has there been so much expended as for Montevideo. Your excellency, in her name, demands those articles which have been taken away, and generously bestows a thousand stand of arms upon Cordova and Santa Fé, the remainder to remain in deposite in this place, to be used at your instance (see intervention) to aid the other provinces. The difficulty consistsin this, that if all the other provinces should follow the examples of the Orientals, and demand what they have contributed, Buenos Ayres will also come in for a share, and it will be her duty to make an equal distribution of the property which has been saved in the general bankruptcy to each creditor according to the amount of his credit. But Buenos Ayres cannot be both party and judge; it is therefore evident that the next Congress is the only tribunal for the decision of this important cause. Until then (aspiring still to the praise of acting with the same moderation you have shown in the midst of the severe trials experienced in the cause of liberty, as you have observed in your communication,) your conduct will be such as to preclude the occurrence of unhappy contentions, while, on my part, I shall do nothing but to endeavor to prevent it. To this end I have ordered a force to Santa Fé, with instructions to publish the proclamations herewith enclosed. The deputies of your excellency have experienced some detention, because, having informed them of the measure before mentioned, I was apprehensive that they would hasten to your excellency in order to oppose the carrying it into effect with the necessary tranquillity. They have not with all persons observed the greatest prudence in their conversation, forgetful of the character in which they appeared, and of the frankness with which they were received in this city.

I ought not to omit, on this occasion, to satisfy your excellency with respect to the surprise which you tell me in your letter already noticed of the 10th July was felt by you at my stating in mine of the 1st of the same month that your excellency was unwilling to enter into details on the subject of the establishment of mutual harmony. This complaint (which I confess surprised me much) was made by your excellency in your communication of the 18th of June, brought by my deputation. Your excellency will please to examine the original, and I hope your excellency will not persist in asserting officially what can thus be refuted. Let us not be intolerant because we happen to differ in matters of opinion. Athens and Lacedemon, under different forms of government, attained equal glory and felicity; we have differed as to what best suits us, we have not yet fixed on the kind of government that is to be adopted, and for this reason our differences appear to be interminable; so that, in whatsoever mode the question is received, there is the greater reason for referring it to the decision of the General Congress; we shall otherwise be at variance, without the possibility of coming to a compromise. May the day of its accomplishment, with the establishment of our ardently-desired liberty, soon arrive!

Official letter of Don Antonio Saens to the Director of the state, accompanied by the notes designated 1 and 2.

MOST EXCELLENT SIR: BUENOS AYRES, August 4, 1815.

I have entered into conference with the deputies of the Chief of the Orientals, in pursuance of your excellency's instructions. I considered it expedient not to defer it until they should produce sufficient credentials from the Congress of Paysander, of which they declare themselves the deputies. It appeared to me that the informality of their powers ought not to stand in the way of the establishment of an honorable peace, when the stipulations might afterwards be legalized by confirmation; and as it is not possible for them to obtain regular credentials from the Congress which no longer exists, the adjustment may still be considered as made with the Chief of the Orientals. After protracted debates, it was finally agreed that peace should be established, and that the Orientals should renounce their pretensions. Without a moment's loss of time, I proposed the establishment of its basis according to the principles agreed upon, and to sanction it by our signatures. But I soon found that in their conceptions it was not so easy to sign as to promise. They then delivered me the signed paper No. 1. I saw that it was not in my power to affirm it on account of the doubts which it presented, and the interpretations of which it was susceptible, the simple proposition which it contains being conceived in vague and indefinite terms, and the authority of the Supreme Director narrowed in an offensive manner, placing it even below that of the Chief of the Orientals, and being changed into the simple Government of Buenos Ayres; and, finally, because it is not couched in the terms used amongst civilized nations. For these reasons, I presented them the note No. 2, and requested their sanction. They replied that the articles were conformable to what had been argued upon in our conferences, but that they were all consequences of the single article establishing peace, &c.; they said they would religiously pledge their faith and honor for the true performance of them, but that they were unwilling to sign the paper. This is the only reason they have thought proper to give for a conduct so strange. They dropped something, it is true, about its not being expedient to sign at the present moment, although just to do so, and that they would give an explanation of the reasons more fully on their return homes. Such have been the subterfuges with which they have evaded signing the accommodation which I proposed them, and such also is the result of our protracted conferences. The most earnest and energetic representations have been unavailing to induce them to desist from a conduct so injurious. The conferences at length closed without effecting any thing.

I have the honor to be, &c.

ANTONIO SAENS.

No. 1.

To the Supreme Director.

The citizens Don José Garcia de Cassio, Don José Antonio de Cabrera, Don Pascal Andrino, and Don Miguel Barriero, deputies from the Congress of the Orientals, to treat of peace with the Government of Buenos Ayres, have terminated a conference with citizen Don Antonio Saens, authorized by his excellency for that purpose, with this only proposition:

There shall be peace between the territories under the Government of the Chief of the Orientals, and his protection, and the Government of Buenos Ayres.

MIGUEL BARRIERO,
DON JOSE GARCIA DE CASSIO,
DON PASCAL ANDRINO,
JOSE ANTONIO CABRERA.

Signed at BUENOS AYRES, August 3, 1815.

No. 2.

BUENOS AYRES, August 3, 1815.

The commissioner, on behalf of his excellency the Supreme Director of the state, appointed to treat of peace with the four deputies who have come for this purpose from Paysander, sent by General Artigas, requires that the sole proposition of peace, which they have subscribed, should be reduced to a formal and solemn treaty, as expressed in the following articles:

First. There shall be perpetual peace, friendship, and alliance between the Chief of the Orientals and the Government of Buenos Ayres.

Second. The same shall be established between the citizens who reside under the Government and protection of each.

Third. Both territories and Governments shall be independent of each other.

Fourth. The Parana shall be the line of demarcation between them.

Fifth. Each of the contracting parties shall renounce all claims to indemnity for what may have been attributed to the common cause.

Sixth. They likewise oblige themselves to send deputies to the Congress of Tucuman.

Seventh. The vessels which have left Buenos Ayres for Montevideo, or other parts under the Chief of the Orientals, shall be permitted to return.

Eighth. A veil shall be cast over the past, and no one be persecuted for his conduct heretofore.

Ninth. The four deputies of the Congress of Paysander shall produce sufficient powers to ratify the treaty.

Tenth. The present treaty shall be ratified by the competent authorities in three days, and by the Congress assembled at Paysander within twelve.

ANTONIO SAENS.

Another official letter from his excellency the Director of the state to the Chief of the Orientals.

BUENOS AYRES, August 7, 1815.

After having delivered to the deputies from your excellency the communication dated the first of the present month, advising you of the result of the last negotiations, they proposed that some mode should be adopted to render negotiation less difficult. I immediately took steps for this purpose, in order that the deputies might depart in peace, and that the same should be with this Government. I repeated that I should be unchangeable in my principles of moderation, and that I would preserve all possible harmony as far as was compatible with the honor and interests of the provinces over which I have the honor to preside. I expect the like sentiments on the part of your excellency, and in this confidence I pray you to permit the return of the vessels which have left this river in good faith, to the ports of the eastern shore, and which suffer great prejudice in consequence of the detention. In this case, justice will acquire the credit of generosity, and variance of opinion on the part of the Governments will be less calamitous to the unfortunate citizens who have no part in their discords.

EXCELLENT SIR: PURIFICATION, November 13, 1817.

How long does your excellency mean to sport with my forbearance? Eight years of revolution, of privations, of dangers, of reverses, and misfortunes, ought to have sufficed to establish the rectitude of my intentions, and the character of my Government; the dignity of the Oriental people has more than once shown forth; they ought to know the delicacy I have manifested in reference to the inalienability of their sacred rights; and your excellency has the boldness to insult them. Your excellency is doing every thing in your power to provoke my moderation; the thought of this alone should cause your excellency to tremble. However specious may be the motives alleged in support of such conduct, they are incompatible with the general interest assailed by the Portuguese aggression. Your excellency is guilty of a criminal conduct in repeating those slanderous insults under cover of which the enemy believe the success of their invasion to be certain.

It is in vain for your excellency to attempt a display of the generosity of your sentiments; the course of events alone is sufficient to refute the attempt, and these prove that your excellency is more zealously occupied in embroiling the nation, than inspiring freemen with the energy which should animate them against tyrants; otherwise, how could your excellency have ventured to publish the pretended recognition of the Government of Buenos Ayres by the Orientals? A crime of so revolting a nature could only be perpetrated by the most impure hands; and your excellency has had the audacity to commit it. But it was in conformity with the mysterious plans of your excellency to destroy the firmest rampart opposed to their execution. A people enthusiastic in the cause of their liberties must be taken by surprise; the dangers are every moment increasing, and the recognition before mentioned was brought in aid of your excellency's designs for our common destruction. Your excellency knows sufficiently well the dignity of my character, and that the unjust reproaches heaped upon me are the offspring of your perfidy; and this is the foundation upon which your excellency rests your disgraceful neutrality. But it is in vain to imagine that this paltry excuse can justify your excellency in the treachery of supplying the enemy at Montevideo with wheat, while besieged by me. It is also a fact little to the honor of your excellency, that you have made arrangements for a third expedition against Santa Fé, with a view to foment the intrigues of the Parana, and promote insurrection on the eastern shore. The same unfriendly disposition induced your excellency to protect the Portuguese who fled from Seriano, sending them back to their general, while, instead of practising a similar generosity towards the Chief of the Orientals, you did not think proper to return the arms and other articles which those persons carried with them in the vessels on board of which they fled. It is thus that your excellency has endeavored to seize a favorable moment to light up the fire of discord, to plot with the Portuguese, and excite disaffection in the regiment of Libertos, seducing them to your side, and receiving them in triumph: an act of so gross a character cannot be mentioned without scandalizing the perpetrator; and your excellency is still the Supreme Director of Buenos Ayres.

An officer openly in the service of Portugal could not have acted more faithfully for his King; and to the impartial mind it must have been evident that your conduct was dictated by motives much more black than the cold neutrality which you allege. But, whatever may be the merit of our respective criminations, sound reason declares them to be out of place, in the presence of an ambitious stranger; more than once have I exhibited an example to your excellency of my determination to act up to this principle. Alas! it is but too true that the road of virtuous patriotism is as rough as the name of country is delightful. Without proving a traitor to your own understanding, it is impossible for your excellency to be indifferent upon the subject of the detestable incursion of General Lecor into our territory. Your excellency has already protested against his conduct; and how will your excellency deny the work of your own hands? Are not the Portuguese of this year the same as of the last? Do not the same complaints exist now as then? Has not your excellency outraged the people of Santa Fé, and in them those of the other provinces? Confess, sir, that you have no other object in putting on this affected neutrality but to conceal your intrigues. The Supreme Director of Buenos Ayres neither can nor ought to be neutral. Did not your excellency accuse the Portuguese general of violating the laws of civilized warfare, in the threat he held out against the Orientals? And how can this be reconciled to the character of a neutral? Be then a neutral, an indifferent spectator, an enemy; but let me tell you to beware of the just indignation of those who, having sacrificed every thing to the love of liberty, fear nothing but its loss.

Renounce the despicable expectation that on the ruin of the Orientals you may one day raise the lofty column of your glory and our degradation. The greatness of the Orientals is only to be compared with itself. They know how to meet dangers, to subdue them, and to be reanimated by the presence of their oppressors. I at their head shall march wherever danger threatens. Your excellency knows me, and ought to fear the justice of my vengeance. Your excellency does not cease to repeat insults offensive to my moderation, and to the discredit of the common cause. Your excellency ought not to think me insensible. While I am in the field, engaged in a bloody conflict with the invaders, you are laboring to weaken our force by mingling with it an affair which does not fail to excite well-founded suspicion. While I am engaged in opposing the Portuguese, you are taking measures to favor them. Would your excellency, in my place, have regarded these things with a serene countenance? I acknowledge to your excellency that I have made a sacrifice of my feelings to my country, which claimed a concentration of all its forces. It was this which induced me to seek a peace with your excellency, while you were endeavoring to provoke me to a war. I opened the door which, for weighty reasons, I ought to have kept shut. I sent back to you the officers taken prisoners, without subjecting them to the sufferings which ought to have followed the crime of their violent and cruel aggression against an innocent people. Your excellency cannot deny those acts of generosity, which, notwithstanding your repeated promises of reconciliation, you have not been able to equal.

It is true your excellency did send some supply of arms to the Parana, but without giving me the least intimation of it. This deceitful act had for its object the exculpation of your excellency from the charge of indifference in the eyes of the provinces, and evinces the fertility of your machinations; but do not think that this shallow artifice will enable you to escape. We have just experienced the effects of this generosity in the disturbance of the Parana and Entre Rios. Can it be concealed from the provinces with what views these arms were distributed, when done without the knowledge of the Chief? Let me pray your excellency to cease your generosity, if such are to be its effects; let me beseech you to refrain from aiding the country, if you can do nothing but obscure its splendor by such hateful scenes. No, sir, it is not from you that our country can expect to be freed from the ambition of the Brazilian King; instead of boasting of having saved the country, your excellency has nothing to boast of but of having tortured my patience to the utmost point of endurance. I have suffered for my country, and yet your excellency dares to criminate me in public and in private. I have no need, like your excellency, of having defenders; incontrovertible facts speak in my behalf.

Sir, I am still ready to enter into an amicable adjustment of our difference, so as to unite our forces against the Portuguese; and I repeat the offer which I made in June last. I then requested that deputies should be sent, with full powers to draw closer and closer the ties of union. Your excellency could not deny the importance of this requests, and engaged to send them. In consequence of this, I announced to the people the pleasing hope of reconciliation; but, until the present day, nothing but disappointment has been the result. Your excellency, it seems, has had the effrontery to announce that deputies were expected from the eastern shore at Buenos Ayres. It is but little becoming in your excellency to frustrate so desirable an object, and afterwards to calumniate me; this is the last insult I am willing to bear, and henceforth must request your excellency to be silent. Such imposture is not less injurious to the reciprocity of the country than insulting to me. In opposing the reconciliation of the two shores, your excellency can be regarded in no other light than as a criminal, and unworthy of consideration.

Your excellency, by this time, must be wearied in hearing truths, but you ought to be more so in giving cause for them; they are stamped with the characters of sincerity and justice. Your excellency has occasionally provoked my moderation; my wounded honor will demand satisfaction. I speak for once and for all, your excellency is responsible before the altars of the country for an inaction incompatible with its interests, and the day will arrive when its justice will call you to a severe account.

In the mean time, I challenge your excellency to appear with me in front of the enemy, and to combat with a courage which will display all the virtues that render glorious the American name.

I have the honor to salute your excellency with cordiality and respectful consideration.

FERNANDO JOSE ARTIGAS.

Extract from the Gazette of Buenos Ayres of the 5th of February, 1818.

INVASION OF THE PORTUGUESE.

In the Gazette of the 1st of December last, we published the official letter of his excellency the Director to the Portuguese general in the Banda Oriental, requiring him to cease his march into a territory whose union with the United Provinces of the South had not been renounced, but accidentally suspended. The Portuguese general, in his reply, denied the principles on which this protest was founded, insisting on the pretext which had induced his court to a rupture so unjustifiable: but as, at the same time, he referred for his justification to the orders of his prince, from which he was not at liberty to depart, there were reasons to suspect that, from the slowness of his operations and other circumstances, he might possibly have received instructions to suspend his marches, and evacuate the country unjustly invaded. This doubt has disappeared with the event, and the occupation of Montevideo has been preceded by an action in which that precious soil has been moistened by the blood of its sons. We shall hereafter make some further observations upon this conduct; at present we shall insert the reply of the Portuguese general, as also an official letter of his excellency the Director, transmitted by Don Manuel Roxas, who sailed for Montevideo the 2d of the present month.

Official letter of the general of the Portuguese Army in the Banda Oriental, in reply to that of this Government, published in the Gazette of the 1st of December last.

MOST EXCELLENT SIR: HEAD-QUARTERS, PASO OF SAN MIGUEL, November 27, 1816.

Taking into consideration what you have been pleased to communicate to me in your official letter of the 13th of October last* past, delivered to me by Colonel Vidia on the 24th of this month, (November,) I can assure your excellency that my marches have for their sole object the removal of the germ of disorder from the frontier of the kingdom of Brazil, and the occupation of a country abandoned to a state of anarchy.

This wise and necessary measure ought in no respect to excite uneasiness in the Government of Buenos Ayres, since it has been executed in a territory which has declared itself independent of the western side.

The most scrupulous regard has been paid to the armistice concluded on the 26th of May, 1812, establishing amity between the two countries; and, in case of being attacked, I shall only act on the defensive, until the receipt of further orders from my King and sovereign.

The proclamation which I enclose to your excellency (the same which has already appeared in our newspapers) will make known the spirit in which I come to this unfortunate country by the commands of my sovereign.

I continue my marches, which can only be suspended by order of the King my sovereign; and it will shortly be in my power to manifest to your excellency the good faith of my military operations by a better opportunity and from a nearer point.

I thank your excellency for the occasion you have afforded me of being acquainted with Colonel Vidia.

God preserve your excellency.

CARLOS FREDERICO LECOR, Lieutenant General.

Illmo. and Exmo. D. JUAN MARTIN PUEYRREDON.

Reply to the foregoing letter by the Supreme Director.

HOUSE OF THE GOVERNMENT OF BUENOS AYRES, February 1, 1817.

MOST EXCELLENT SIR:

The suspension which I observed in the operations of the army under your command, after the receipt of your reply of the 27th of November last, together with the proclamation which it enclosed, gave me reason to hope that your excellency, doing honor to the armistice concluded on the 26th of May, 1812, between His Faithful Majesty and this Government, whose violent infraction I protested against under date of the 31st of October last, would refrain from giving rise to the horrors of war; or, at least, that you would enter into some temporary arrangement, until the explanations of your court could be obtained in an affair considered not less important to the inhabitants west of the Uruguay and the Parana than to those of the Banda Oriental. Your excellency, notwithstanding, at an unexpected moment, hastened your marches; and, under the sole justification of force, you have gone so far as to oppress with your arms the place which you now occupy, but without any other effect than to convince you of the abomination with which its inhabitants regard every foreign yoke.

* This letter has been mislaid.

The assurances which your excellency presents to this Government in your beforementioned official letter, far from affording tranquillity, only excite our alarm; and the United Provinces, in the last steps of your excellency, can discover nothing but the sad presage of the evils which threaten them, should they remain insensible to the aspirations of a foreign Power over a constituent part of the nation.

In order to demand an explanation of this aggression upon the rights of the provinces, so notoriously unjust, I have determined to send an envoy extraordinary to His Faithful Majesty, as also to learn the origin and object of a war, which will be provoked with a state at peace, in order to secure the immunity of the Banda Oriental.

Until the reply of His Faithful Majesty shall have been received, I hope your excellency will not prosecute the war in that territory, but immediately suspend the operation of your arms, under a provisional armistice, which will be entered into by means of a person whom I shall send with sufficient authority, so soon as your excellency will inform me of your willingness to meet my proposal, as I hope will be done by the hand of Colonel Manuel Roxas, who is the bearer of this communication.

If your excellency, in strict obedience to the orders of your sovereign, under these extraordinary circumstances, should continue the war, your excellency will be responsible to humanity for the blood that will be shed; and the impartial world will justify the means of indemnity that will be taken for the sacrifices of conquest, protesting as I do against all usurpation of territory comprehended within the limits recognised before the opening of the campaign of your excellency, and beyond the frontiers of the kingdom of Brazil.

God preserve your excellency many years.

JUAN MARTIN PUEYRREDON.

General FREDERICO LECOR.

To the House of Representatives of the United States: DECEMBER 15, 1818.

I lay before the House of Representatives copies of the remainder of the documents referred to in the message of the 17th of last month.

JAMES MONROE.

REPORT OF THEODORICK BLAND, ON THE CONDITION OF SOUTH AMERICA.

BUENOS AYRES.

SIR: BALTIMORE, November 2, 1818.

The fair prospects which seemed to be opening upon some portions of the people of South America; the lively sympathy for their cause felt by the citizens of the United States; and the deep interests of our country in the fate of those provinces where colonial rule or independent freedom seem to have been put at issue, and contested with all the energy which such a stake never fails to excite, justly attracted the most serious attention of the Government. In whatever disposition of mind the South American contest and its scenes were contemplated, whether with feelings of benevolence, and the best wishes, or with regret, and under a sense of injury, the first thought, that which appeared most naturally to arise in the mind of every one, was the want of information as to the actually existing state of things. A new people were evidently making every possible effort against their transatlantic masters, and preparing themselves to claim a recognition in the society of the nations of the earth. In this struggle, each contending party endeavoring to strike his antagonist beyond the immediate area of the conflict, our commercial rights had frequently received a blow, and our municipal regulations were sometimes violated. New and fertile regions, rich and extensive channels of commerce, were apparently about to be opened to the skill and enterprise of the people of the United States; as to all which, their feelings and their interests seemed to require to be gratified with further information. Under these considerations, it became the earnest wish, and was deemed the right and the duty of our Government, to explain the views it had in some of its measures; by timely representations and remonstrances, to prevent the further injury which our commercial and other rights were likely to sustain, and to procure correct intelligence as to the existing state of affairs in those parts of our continent where the revolutionary movements had attracted the most attention and excited the strongest interest.

For this purpose, three persons, of whom I had the honor to be one, were selected, and sent in a public ship to South America; who being, among other things, directed that "if, while in the execution of their instructions at Buenos Ayres, they should find it expedient or useful, with reference to the public service, that one or more of them should proceed over land to Chili, they were authorized to act accordingly." They did, therefore, at Buenos Ayres, take into consideration the expediency and utility of going to Chili, and did there determine that, under the then existing circumstances, it would be expedient and useful for one or more of them to go to that country. In consequence of which, I crossed the Andes; and, having returned, it now becomes my duty to communicate a statement of such facts, circumstances, and documents, as I have been able to collect, and which presented themselves as most likely to be of importance, or in any manner useful to the nation.

When I contemplate the wide range of the expectations of the Government, as indicated by our instructions, and the vast extent of the subject, and, more especially, when I meditate on the novelty and complicated nature of the scene I am called on to portray, and the many circumstances peculiar to the state of society in South America, which cast a shade of obscurity over its affairs, and, in some instances, have absolutely, as yet, closed the avenues of information, I feel myself under the necessity of asking for the most liberal indulgence for the errors I may have fallen into, as well from the difficulties of the subject itself, as from my own want of ability to remove them.

We sailed in the United States frigate the Congress, from Hampton Roads, on the 4th of December, 1817, and touched, as directed, at Rio Janeiro, where we delivered the despatches committed to our charge to Mr. Sumpter, the minister of the United States resident there. After a stay of a few days, we proceeded thence direct for the river Plata, which we ascended in the Congress as far as Montevideo. Mr. Graham and myself visited that city, and found it, with the country immediately around, to the extent of about three miles, in the actual possession of a Portuguese army under the command of General Lacor. We were treated by the general with politeness, and an offer was made by him of permission to procure there every facility we might want to convey us thence to Buenos Ayres; and also of leave to obtain for the ship every refreshment and accommodation she might want. Finding that it would be impossible for the Congress to proceed much further up the river, owing to there not being a sufficient depth of water for her over a bar between Montevideo and Buenos Ayres, which traverses the river entirely, and on which it is only eighteen feet deep, we took passage thence in a small vessel, and landed at Buenos Ayres on the 28th day of February last.

After consulting and advising together as to the extent, object, and manner of executing our instructions, it seemed to us that no time should be lost in presenting ourselves to the Government or chief constituted authorities of the place, and in making known to them all those subjects which we were directed to present to their view. In arranging those points, it was deemed most proper, in the first place, to express the friendly and neutral disposition of our Government, and to place in a fair and amicable point of view those measures which it had been supposed were likely to be interesting, or materially to affect the feelings or the claims of the people of the river Plata; and then to present the injuries many of the citizens of the United States had sustained, and the infractions of their laws which had been committed by armed vessels assuming the name and character of patriots, belonging to the independent Governments of South America; and to seek the information which our Government had directed us to obtain, and which it had been deemed most advisable to procure from the public functionaries themselves as far as practicable.

Accordingly, after ascertaining the names and style of the principal personages in authority, we called on his honor El Señor Don Gregorio Tagle, the Secretary of State; and having made known to him who we were, and expressed our wish to have an interview with the Chief Magistrate of the country, a day and hour was appointed for the purpose; when we called, and were accordingly introduced by the Secretary of State to his excellency El Señor Don Juan Martin de Pueyrredon, the Supreme Director of the United Provinces of South America. After the interchange of some complimentary expressions of politeness, good wishes, and friendly dispositions, we made known to the Director, in general terms, the character of special agents, in which we had been sent by our Government to communicate with him, and that our communications might be either with himself or his secretary. The Director replied that they would be received in a spirit of brotherly friendship, and in that form and through either of those channels which we should deem most convenient.

In a short time after our introduction to the Director, and in about a week after our arrival, we waited on the Secretary of State, as being the most formal and respectful mode of making our communications to this new and provisional revolutionary Government. We stated to the Secretary that our Government had not viewed the struggle now pending between the provinces of South America and Spain merely as a rebellion of colonists, but as a civil war, in which each party was entitled to equal rights and equal respect; that the United States had, therefore, assumed, and would preserve with the most impartial and the strictest good faith, a neutral position; and in the preservation of this neutrality, according to the established rules of the law of nations, no rights, privileges, or advantages would be granted by our Government to one of the contending parties, which would not, in like manner, be extended to the other. The Secretary expressed his approbation of this course; but, in an interview subsequent to the first, when the neutral position of the United States was again spoken of, he intimated a hope that the United States might be induced to depart from its rigid neutrality in favor of his Government; to which we replied, that as to what our Government might be induced to do, or what would be its future policy towards the patriots of South America, we could not, nor were we authorized to say any thing.

We stated to the Secretary that certain persons assuming the name, character, and authority of an independent Government in some part of the Mexican portion of South America, had, not long since, taken possession of Amelia island, where they had attempted, with the name of the patriot cause, to put on the garb, and exercise the rights incident to national independency; that this island, so seized, lay on the coast of the Atlantic, and immediately adjoining the boundary of the United States; that the persons by whom it was held, under the name of the patriot authority, had committed numerous violations and piratical depredations on the commerce of most nations found in that neighborhood, and more especially on that of the United States. They had not only lawlessly seized our vessels which were navigating those seas rightfully and in peace, but the immediate vicinity of the island to our territory had enabled them to commit other outrages on our rights, no less serious and injurious. It was used by a nest of smugglers to introduce their merchandise into the United States without paying the duties; it had become a harbor for runaway slaves from the neighborhood; and it had become a place of deposite for the most infamous of all traffic, the trade in cargoes of slaves, which were landed there, and thence illegally introduced into the adjoining states, in violation of the most positive prohibition, thus defrauding our revenue, depriving our citizens of their property, and disturbing our peace; that the cruisers, which so mischievously prowled the ocean from this island, not being at all scrupulous about consistency of character, had, as was found most convenient, assumed the flag of Buenos Ayres, or that of the other patriot Governments of South America: that, notwithstanding the notoriety of the daring violences committed by this band of adventurers of Amelia island, it appeared that Spain, too feeble, or otherwise too much occupied, had not extended its authority over it, and suppressed what could not but be considered as an expulsion and contempt of its jurisdiction. We further stated, on this subject, that a station in all respects similar, and as pernicious, had been formed at a place called Galveston, situated near the mouth of Trinity river, and immediately on the coast of the Gulf of Mexico: that, under these circumstances, the United States had deemed it a right and a duty to break up, and entirely to remove those two establishments, as well to preserve their own interests and that of their citizens, as their peace with other nations; and that the Government of Buenos Ayres, we were sure, could not fail to see, in this measure, the highly honorable and amicable disposition of the United States towards all foreign nations, and more especially to perceive the happy effect which it would have on the patriot name and cause, by preventing it from being soiled with the imputation of acts which the really honorable patriot Governments did not deserve, and could not countenance. We stated, in addition, that our Government would take and hold possession of Amelia island, in order to prevent the misuse of it in future, subject to explanations to be given to Spain; and that Galveston would be taken possession of and held as a part of the territory of the United States.

To which the Secretary replied that the Government of Buenos Ayres had not before been informed or heard of the abuses committed by those who had taken possession of Amelia island and Galveston; that it had no connexion whatever with those who had exercised any authority at either of those places; and that the removal of those establishments could not fail to be attended with good consequences to the patriot cause, by preventing any improper imputations being cast on it; and, therefore, his Government could certainly only see in that measure of the United States the manifestation towards it of the most friendly disposition. We stated to the Secretary that it had been understood that many unprincipled and abandoned persons, who had obtained commissions as privateers from the independent patriot Government, had committed great depredations on our commerce, and had evidently got such commissions not so much from any regard to the cause of independence and freedom as with a view to plunder; and that we entertained a hope that there would be a due degree of circumspection exercised by that Government in granting commissions which, in their nature, were so open to abuse.

The Secretary replied that there had hitherto been no formal complaint made against any of the cruisers of Buenos Ayres; and, if any cause of complaint should exist, his Government would not hesitate to afford proper redress on a representation and proof of the injury; that the Government of Buenos Ayres had taken every possible precaution in its power in such cases; that it had established and promulgated a set of rules and regulations for the government of its private armed vessels, a copy of which should be furnished us; and that it had, in all cases, as far as practicable, enjoined and enforced a strict observance of those regulations and the law of nations.

We stated to the Secretary that a considerable portion of the people of the United States had manifested a very favorable disposition towards the patriot cause in South America; and the Government, also, had every disposition to treat the patriot authorities with the justice, dignity, and favor which they merited; that, although our Government had, for the present, determined on adhering to a strict and impartial neutrality between the contending parties, it might yet deem it politic and just hereafter to adopt other measures; and, therefore, with a view to regulate its conduct and policy with perfect good faith and candor, as well with regard to its neutrality as with regard to any other measures it might deem advisable to take, it had charged us, as special agents, to seek and endeavor to obtain, in this country, such information as to the actual state of things as would enable it to act with correctness, precision, and understandingly, in whatever course it may hereafter pursue. That the information thus to be obtained might be of a character deserving the highest confidence, we had been directed to ask it of those actually in authority, and of the then existing Government of the country. We observed that we did then, in pursuance of our instructions, ask of that Government to furnish us with a statement, or full information, as to the actually existing state of things; of what number of provinces that Government was composed; the form of its confederacy, and the constitution by which they were united; the population in each province; the principal commodities of commerce, the imports and exports; the amount of its revenue derived from foreign commerce as well as from internal taxation; the strength of its regular army, and the number of its militia; the amount of its tonnage, and the strength and number of its public and private vessels of war; and what were its relations with foreign nations, or with the adjoining provinces; or had the Government of Buenos Ayres formed any treaty or understanding with any foreign nation, or with any other of the provinces of South America who had actually declared themselves independent, or were then in a state of revolution and at war with Spain. We assured the Secretary that our Government sought for this information from an experience of the want of it, and in a spirit of the most perfect amity; that, until the commencement of the present revolutionary movements in that country, it had been so comparatively locked up from the eye, observation, and intercourse of every foreign nation, that the real state of things in it had been but very imperfectly, and, in some respects, was wholly unknown; that the friendship so openly and decidedly expressed by a considerable portion of the people of the United States would furnish conclusive proof of the spirit of goodwill in which this information was sought, and, in itself, was a guaranty that their Government would, under no circumstances, use the communications that might be made for improper or unfriendly purposes towards the people of that country. But, if that Government should think proper to note any communications it should make as private and confidential, we pledged ourselves that our Government would never suffer it to go to the public; if, indeed, there could be wanting any other more solemn and decided manifestation of respect, on its part, than the very act itself of our having been sent in a public ship of war to have this intercourse with them. The Secretary, in reply, said that his Government had the greatest confidence in the friendly dispositions of that of the United States, and that the people of the two countries were friends and brothers, felt as such, and would act towards each other as brothers; that the information sought for should certainly be granted, and that orders would be given to the proper public functionaries to collect, digest, and arrange it in the most acceptable and intelligible form; that, as regarded foreign nations, they had hitherto had no official communication with any of them; and that their relations with all, except Spain, were those of mere peace, such as were obvious to the world, without any treaty or stipulation of any kind whatever; that from some they had met with acts of injustice and hostility, but, finding themselves so much occupied with their revolutionary movements as to be unable to resist or resent, they had therefore borne with wrong, and suffered the mere relations of peace to continue.

We had several conversations with the Secretary, all of which were asked for by us, in the course of which the matters I have related were fully and in various forms reiterated and explained to him; and in all, from the first to the last, the request for information was repeated in terms of similar import, and at each interview the promise of its being soon and fully granted was renewed.

As the promised communication was not, however, made before I took leave of the Director and left Buenos Ayres, I shall proceed to present such information relative to the United Provinces of South America as I have been able to collect from those sources which were within my reach, and that appeared to deserve confidence; leaving my statements to be corrected by the official account which I understand has been furnished by the Government of Buenos Ayres, where they materially differ, or to be revised by any other standard you may think proper to apply.

The new Political Union, whose Government we found seated on the shores of the river Plata, which once styled itself "The United Provinces of the river Plata," and which now, having been actuated by caprice, or by more correct or more enlarged views, assumes the name of "The United Provinces of South America," has declared the independence, and claims the privilege of self-government for all the people, and the rights of a nation over all the territory of which the late Spanish viceroyalty of Buenos Ayres was composed in the beginning of the year 1810. It thus designates the boundaries of its territorial claims, and the extent of the jurisdiction it asserts. It will be proper, therefore, to trace out its extreme limits as the country relative to which our inquiries are to be more particularly directed.

The Spanish viceroyalty of Buenos Ayres is situated to the southward of the Portuguese dominions of Brazil, and, according to the treaty of St. Ildefonso, of 1777, the following boundary between them was finally adjusted: Beginning on the coast of the Atlantic at a place called Invernada de Felix José, a little to the south of the Rio Grande de St. Pedro; thence, in a northerly direction, along mountains or highlands, to the Rio Iquacu, or Caluetiba, or Coreitiba; thence, down that river, to the Parana; thence, up that river, to the lower end of the Illia Grande de Salto; thence, in a westerly direction, to where the Rio Paraguay is intersected by the tropic of capricorn; thence, up that river, to the mouth of the Rio Latirequiqui, near the foot of the Cordillera de St. Fernando; where, taking leave of the dominions of Brazil, the boundary of the viceroyalty, excluding the Indian territory to the north, was further designated by a line directed; thence, nearly west, to the Sierras Altisimas; thence, along the confines of the province of Mizque and the Altos Intinuyo, including the province of La Paz, to the Cordilleras of the Andes which pass to the westward of Oruro and Paria, to the Cordillera Real; thence, south, along the most elevated summit of the principal Cordillera of the Andes, until it is intersected by the parallel of thirty-eight and a half degrees of south latitude; thence, due east, to the Atlantic; thence, with the coast of the ocean, to the beginning, at Invernada de Felix José.

To the south of latitude thirty-eight degrees and a half, and between the Andes and the Atlantic, as far as the straits of Magellan, is, at present, entirely in possession of the various tribes of Patagonian savages, over whom the colonial Government exercised no authority, nor asserted any claim, other than that of a right of pre-emption and of settlement in their territory against all foreign nations; to which rights and benefits the independent Government claims to have succeeded. That tract of country which now forms the three provinces of Mendoza, San Juan, and St. Louis, and which, under the Spanish Government, was called the province of Cuyo, was, about half a century ago, attached to the colonial viceroyalty of Chili; since that time it has continually belonged to Buenos Ayres. And the province of Arica, which covers that space to the westward of Potosi and Chicas from the summit of the Andes down to the Pacific Ocean, was, by a royal order, about the year 1774 taken from the viceroyalty of Buenos Ayres, and annexed to that of Lower Peru or Lima, and is at present under that jurisdiction.

The vast elevated plains, a great part of which are, in the rainy season, entirely overflowed, lying to the north of the Llanos de Manso and the Sierras Altisimas, that are traversed by the principal branches of the Rio Madeira, which winds its way along the back of Brazil into the Maranon, and that are also drained of their waters by some of the branches of the Paraguay, and which are comprehended under the three colonial divisions of the Chequitos, the Government of Santa Cruz de la Sierra, and the province of the Moxos de Musu, like the great pampas to the southward of the Rio de la Plata, seem to be destined to eternal vacancy, or to the rearing of innumerable herds, and to be inhabited only by their keepers. At present they are in the possession of several tribes of Indians, over whom, and their territory, the Government of the viceroyalty claimed no other right or jurisdiction than over the pampas of the south; which, however, the patriot Government in like manner asserts, has devolved on it by the revolution.

To the westward of Paria and Oruro lie the provinces or jurisdictions of Carangas, Pacajes or Berenguela, and to the north of La Paz, and to the west of the Cordillera de Acama, lie the provinces or districts of Omasuyos, Chucuyto or Puno, Lampa, Asangaro, and some others; all of which are said by Ulloa to be within the audience of Charcas, the scene of the celebrated rebellion of Tupac Amaru; and which audience, according to Dean Funes, was given entire to the viceroyalty of Buenos Ayres when it was erected, and it is so laid down. But I have excluded these provinces by the general outline I have drawn of the viceroyalty, because, not being able to learn that any revolutionary movements had been made in them, I wished to disencumber the subject of our survey as much as possible, as well by separating it from such districts as from Indian territory.

Such are, then, the outlines of this Union, or rather proposed Government, and asserted confederation, embracing an extent of territory much more prodigious than has ever been yet known to be comprehended under one and the same voluntary association. Excluding the great triangular space of Indian territory, of upwards of two hundred thousand square miles in extent, called the Llanos de Manso, lying between the province of Paraguay and the mountains, and excluding also the high plains to the north and the pampas to the south, we shall find a mixed and civilized population of one million and eighty thousand souls scattered over a space of about seven hundred and sixty-three thousand square miles, from one extremity of it to the other. The thirteen United States of North America, within the boundary designated by the treaty of 1783, comprehended a territory of about eight hundred and thirty-one thousand square miles. They erected almost all, and some of the best of their political institutions in the severest season of the revolutionary struggle, in "a time that tried men's souls." They vanquished their enemy, and accomplished the final establishment of their independence and freedom, with a population of about three millions, seated between the seashore and the mountains, on a tract of country of not more than two hundred and fifty thousand square miles; their population was composed almost exclusively of agriculturists, very thinly scattered, as was said of them, over an immense forest. The difficulties which the invader had to encounter, the ease with which his blows were parried or eluded, and the fortitude with which he was met, and the deadly skill with which he was struck, it has been often said, were owing to various peculiar circumstances—to the nature of the country, its watercourses, forests, mountains, and fastnesses; to the habits, manners, and customs of the people, arising out of their political institutions, their situation, and their necessities. Each, no doubt, had some effect; and, in the natural order of events, tended to the same great end, the accomplishment of our independence and freedom.

A revolutionary struggle not materially dissimilar to that which so much excited the interest and feelings of the civilized world, as exhibited on the northern coasts of the Atlantic, is now making some of its most active efforts on the shores of La Plata, and within the extensive limits I have designated. The people of the United States, who sympathize warmly with this new contest, will take great interest in drawing out a comparison of difficult situations, and deducing inferences from trying circumstances analogous to those with which they or their fathers formerly contended; and, to enable their Government to act understandingly, and to bestow their friendship in a manner worthy of its dignity and value, it will be necessary to look over and examine this newly-asserted Union; to survey the locality of the several parts of which it is composed, and to estimate the numbers and powers of each; to measure the spaces between them, that we may form some opinion as to how and when they may be filled; to see how each has been, and how it is now governed; and to inspect the bonds which hold them together, and the repulsive principles which have driven some of them asunder. It will be proper that these things should be done, that we may understand how much it is to be attributed to nature, and how much to accident; how far the revolution has been promoted by the virtues and patriotic wishes of the people, and how much retarded by designing and ambitious military leaders; what is to be feared, and what to be hoped, from the future.

The viceroyalty of Buenos Ayres, like all others of the Spanish possessions in America, was laid out into civil and ecclesiastical divisions, which grew up under peculiar circumstances, were from time to time altered, and often cast from the jurisdiction of one viceroy or governor under that of another, according to the increase or change of population, as convenience suggested, or to gratify the caprice or cupidity of the regal rulers. And, besides, the very nature of the colonial Government itself was but illy calculated to define and preserve, with any tolerable degree of distinctness, the territorial boundaries of the several audiences, provinces, bishoprics, jurisdictions, intendencies, presidios, and governments, into which the viceroyalty was divided. I have, therefore, put together all I have been able to collect from books and some intelligent persons; and, with what I saw, and by the help of the largest and best map extant of the country, corrected down to the year 1807, I shall describe and give the name of province to each of those cities or districts which appear to be politically distinct, by having been at any time so treated, or being now, or at any time heretofore, separately represented in the body called the Sovereign Congress of the Union.

I propose first to direct your attention to the provinces successively, that we may note the geographical situation, extent, and population of them severally, and the relation which each one has, by representation or otherwise, with the confederacy—recollecting that the ratio of representation, fixed by the existing government or reglamento provisorio, is one representative for every fifteen thousand citizens.

The province of Buenos Ayres, situated in the southeastern corner of the Union, is bounded by the Rio de la Plata; by the ocean to the southward of that river; by the territory of the Patagonian Indians as far as about the sixty-first degree of west longitude; thence by a line north to the Aroyo del Medio; thence, by that watercourse, to the Paraguay; and thence, by that river, to the Rio de la Plata. This is by much the most populous of the provinces below the mountains. It contains, according to the last census, ninety-eight thousand one hundred and five souls, which is said to be exclusive of troops and transient persons; but, including those, it is said to amount to one hundred and five thousand persons of all descriptions. The army, quartered in Buenos Ayres, is said to amount to two thousand five hundred men; if so, then it follows that, exclusive of citizens and soldiers, this province contains a population of more than four thousand resident foreigners and others. According to the same census, there are within the same city and suburbs of Buenos Ayres forty-seven thousand one hundred and eighty-four souls, exclusive of troops and transient persons. The principal towns or villages are Ensenada, St. Isidro, and Las Conchas, on the river Plate, and Luxan in the plain. There are, besides these, some lesser groups of population, the rest of which is scattered over the plains of this pampa province, that may be estimated as containing fifty thousand square miles. In the city of Buenos Ayres is situated the strong fort, within which is the palace, where the former Vice-King dwelt, and which is now occupied as the residence of the Supreme Director. This city was formerly the capital and seat of the colonial Government, and therefore, and for that reason, asserts and maintains that it is of right, and ought now to be, the capital and seat of the independent Government; and the Government is now seated there accordingly. This province is represented in the existing Congress by seven representatives, which is its full quota according to its population.

The province called Montevideo under the royal Government, but which, since the revolution, has acquired the appellation and is most frequently designated by the name of the Banda Oriental, with relation to the river Uruguay, which forms its entire western boundary, and from its lying wholly to the eastward of it; this province lies immediately opposite to that of Buenos Ayres, and is situated in the northeastern extremity of the Union; it is bounded by the ocean on the east, by the Rio de la Plata on the south, by the river Uruguay on the west, and by the Portugese dominions of Brazil on the north. Its present population is said to amount to about forty-five thousand inhabitants, who have for their chief leader and Governor, General José Artigas. The city of San Felipe, or Montevideo, as it is more usually called, from an elevated hill or look-out place opposite to the point of land on which the city stands, contains at present, after the waste, devastation, and destruction of the English, Spaniards, and Portugese in succession, a population of about ten thousand souls. Maldonado is another of its towns, situated on the Rio de la Plata, near the seacoast; it contains about two thousand inhabitants. The capital, or present seat of Government, is held at a place called Purification, formerly Capilla Nueva; it is a town which contains between three and four thousand inhabitants. This province, with some unsettled Indian territory, embraces about eighty-six thousand square miles. It has no representative in Congress, and refuses to be represented in that body under the present political system; and it is now at open war with Buenos Ayres.

The province of Santa Fé, within which may be included what was called, under the colonial Government, the jurisdiction of Corrientes, lies immediately adjoining and west of the Banda Oriental and Buenos Ayres. It extends in a narrow slip entirely across the Union, from the Patagonian territory on the south, to the dominions of Brazil on the north. It is sometimes called the Entre Rios, from the greater portion of it lying between the rivers Uruguay, Paraguay, and Parana. That part of the province which extends over the pampas south of the Paraguay is bounded on the west by a line drawn nearly south from that river, above the city of Santa Fé, passing the easternmost point of the Lagunas Salados de los Porongos, leaving the village of Frayle Muerto on the Rio Tercero to the west, unto the land of the Patagonians; thence east to the province of Buenos Ayres. This province of Santa Fé or Entre Rios, exclusive of the Guarana tribes of Indians dwelling above Corrientes, and the Charrnas, seated below the city of Santa Fé, contains a civilized population of about twenty-five thousand souls. The city of Santa Fé, its capital, which is pleasantly and conveniently situated on the right bank of the Paraguay, is said to contain a population of not much more than six thousand inhabitants; and the city of Corrientes, farther up the river, is about the same size. This long, narrow province comprehends, including the territory of its Indians, about one hundred and four thousand five hundred square miles. In the year 1814, and prior to that period, it had one representative in the Congress of the Union; it now has none, and is in alliance with the Banda Oriental, and at war with Buenos Ayres.

The province of Cordova is composed nearly of that which was formerly the colonial jurisdiction of Cordova. It is bounded by the territory of Santa Fé and the Rio Salado on the east; by the Patagonian boundary over the pampas on the south; thence, on the west, by a line to the Sierra Comichigeles, and along that ridge to its northern extremity; thence in a northeast direction, including the town of Tamisqui, on the Rio Dulce; and thence across the Rio Salado. Its capital, the city of Cordova, is a neat town, delightfully situated on the Rio Primero, and contains about ten thousand inhabitants. The population of the whole province is estimated at seventy-five thousand souls; and it measures about one hundred and five thousand square miles in extent. It has, heretofore, gone astray from the Union; but it has been brought back into the fold of the confederation by the bayonets of Buenos Ayres. It is reckoned a godo or tory province. It has now only three representatives in the existing Congress, although its full quota is five; because, as it is said, it does not choose to defray the expense of a greater number.

The province of Punta San Luis has been carved out of the easterly portion of the royal province of Cuyo. It is bounded on the east by the territory of Cordova; on the south by the Patagonia pampas; on the west by the Rio Moyalac, Leuvu, and the Desaguedero to the Laguna Grande; thence, on the north, by a line drawn in an easterly direction to the confines of Cordova. This province contains a population of not much more than ten thousand souls. Its chief town, and seat of Government, is San Luis de la Punta, or the point of St. Lewis, from its being situated at the but-end of one of the ridges of the mountains of Cordova. The town contains about two thousand inhabitants, and is agreeably situated in a well-watered valley. From this place, the post road from Buenos Ayres to Mendoza passes over the Travesia, the most dreary region I ever saw, sixty miles in breadth, where there is not a single human habitation, nor one drop of fresh water to be had. The town of San Luis is made one of the principal places of confinement for the prisoners of war captured in Chili and on the frontiers of Peru. This province is the poorest, and has been always the most faithful to the Union. It contains about forty thousand square miles in extent. One representative is now and has always been received from it, although its population is below the given ratio. The present Supreme Director was its representative when he was elevated to the station he now holds.

To the westward of the province of San Luis, stretching along the great Cordillera which separates it from Chili, as far south as the Rio Blanco, lies the province of Mendoza. This province is another, and the largest of those which have been formed out of the colonial one of Cuyo. Its whole population is calculated at thirty-eight thousand inhabitants; of which, about twenty-one thousand are found in the capital and its suburbs, the town of Mendoza, which is very advantageously situated on one of the branches of the Tunuyan, immediately at the eastern foot of the Andes. Mendoza has a beautiful public walk, and has been much improved of late years. The province has always been zealous and hearty in the cause of independence and liberty. It is of right entitled to two representatives; but it at present has only one member in the existing Congress. It contains, of plains and mountainous territory, about thirty-eight thousand square miles.

To the north of Mendoza, lying along the eastern foot of the Andes, and extending as far north as the ridge which separates the waters of the Rio Magana from those of the Rio Famatina, is that fine territory, bounded on the east by Cordova, formerly called the valley, now the province of San Juan. This includes the residue of what was formerly comprehended under the name of Cuyo. It embraces a tract of about thirty-six thousand square miles, and contains a population of thirty-four thousand souls; about nineteen thousand of which are seated in its capital, San Juan de la Frontera. The patriotic public spirit of San Juan has never been questioned; and yet it has no more than one representative in the present Congress, when, according to its population, it should have two.

Still further north is that pleasant valley now called the province Rioja, toward whose boundaries we are directed by the Rio Anqualasta, by which it is watered, and rendered fruitful, and which, after lifting its arms in various directions among the surrounding mountains that designate the confines of the province, terminates and subsides in a lake to the southward of Simbolan. Its whole surface may be estimated at twenty-two thousand four hundred square miles. The population of this province amounts to twenty thousand souls, and its capital town is Todos Santos de Rioja la Nueva. Rioja has been always attached to the Union. It has at present one representative in Congress, and is entitled to no more.

Turning immediately to the east, and adjoining, we find the delightful valley of Catamarca, which now, with that of Conando, next to it on the north, forms the province of Catamarca. The adjacent ridges form a great rampart all round these two valleys, and are the acknowledged and natural limits of the province. It contains a population of thirty-six thousand souls, and its chief city and seat of Government is Catamarca. Its extent of territory does not exceed eleven thousand two hundred square miles. Catamarca, beside other efforts in the cause, has manifested its sincere devotion to independence and freedom, by furnishing from itself alone nearly six thousand men to the patriot army. It has now, however, no more than one representative, although its population entitles it to two.

Directly to the east of the valley of Catamarca lies the province of Santiago, formerly the colonial jurisdiction of Santiago del Estero. It is bounded on the south by the territory of Cordova; on the north by a line running in a northeasterly direction from the head of the Hondo to the Laguna de Molaras, and by the Indian territory of the Great Llanos de Manso on the east. This province embraces a territory of forty thousand square miles in extent, and has a population of forty-four thousand souls. Its chief city and seat of Government is Santiago del Estero, situated on the banks of the Rio Dulce, in which there are about ten or fifteen thousand inhabitants. Santiago has wavered in its attachment to the Union, but has never been wanting in bravely defending the cause. Its population rightly entitles it to three representatives in Congress; it has, however, at present only one.

Along the whole northern frontier of Santiago, and of the valley of Conando, lies the province of Tucuman, formerly the royal jurisdiction of St. Miguel de Tucuman. It is bounded on the east by the mountains of the Yuanes; on the north by a line extended from that ridge westerly to the confluence of the Tala and the Salado; thence to the source of the Tala; thence, along the ridges which include the valley of Palicipa, to the great Cordillera; thence, along the Andes, to the Rio de Betlen; thence to the confines of the valley of Conando. The population of this province amounts to forty-five thousand souls. Its chief city and seat of Government is San Miguel de Tucuman, situated on the Rio de San Miguel, which unites with the Rio Dulce not far below the city. The province comprehends about an extent of fifty thousand square miles of territory; it has been generally attached to the Union and the cause. It was once honored with the presence of the Congress, in which body it now has two representatives, although it is entitled to three.

Rising from the unbroken plains, and proceeding still farther to the northward, we next enter the province of Salta, lying in level spaces among the elevated spurs of the Andes. It is bounded on the east by the Rio Vermejo; on the north by the Rio Grande, to the confluence of the Aquilotes and Siancas; thence, to the source of the Rio Perico; thence, including the valley of Calchaqui, which forms its western boundary. This province contains fifty thousand inhabitants, and an extent of forty-one thousand square miles of territory. Its chief city is San Felipe el Real de Salta. Salta has been accused of wavering in its attachment to the Union and the cause, but it has been very much the seat of war. It is now said to be a firm member of the confederation, and it is made the headquarters of the patriot army of Peru, under General Belgrano. Although it ought to have three representatives, according to its population, it has now no more than one member in the Congress.

Ascending still in a northerly direction, we next enter the province of Jujuy, stretching along the whole northern frontier of Salta, and extending westward to the ridges in which are found the sources of the Rio de San Salvador; thence, with its summits as far north as the ridge which surrounds St. Bernardo, and along the mountains of Tacsora; thence, descending by the eastern branch of the Rio Tarija, to the territory of Salta, embracing a mountainous tract of thirty thousand square miles. The population of Jujuy amounts to twenty-five thousand inhabitants. Its chief city is San Salvador de Jujuy, situated on the Rio Grande de Jujuy or de Aquilotes. It has one member in the present Congress, which is its full quota of representation. The whole, or the greater part of this province is said to be at this time occupied by the enemy.

Turning to the west, and crossing the mountains, is found the province of Chicas, extending along the brow of the great Cordillera of the Andes, which separates it from the desert district of Atacama, and north of the province of Tucuman, as far as the source of the Pilcomayo; thence, descending that stream, and passing the ruins of ancient Tarija, and ascending the Rio Toxo until it intersects the Chica mountains, it forms what is called the province of Chicas, extending over a space of twenty-six thousand four hundred square miles, and which has a population of ten thousand souls. Its chief town is the city of Tupiza, distant one hundred and eighty miles from the city of Potosi; besides which, it contains the city of Catagayta, on the river of the same name, which pours itself into the St. Juan below the town and great pass of Suipaca, which, together, unite soon after with the Pilcomayo. This province sends one representative to Congress, to which it is entitled, and no more. It is, at present, under the royal Government.

To the north, and adjoining Chicas, lies the far-famed Potosi. The valleys of Porco, Paspayo, and Yamparaes compose the present province of Potosi; and the circumjacent ridges of mountains, which overlook those valleys, form its lofty barrier and boundary, which embraces an extent of territory not exceeding twelve thousand square miles. This province contains a population of one hundred and twelve thousand inhabitants, thirty thousand of which are seated in the city of Potosi itself; and the city of La Plata or Chuquisca is said to be no less populous. This province was attached but a short time to the Union. According to some accounts, there were four representatives in Congress, which assembled at Tucuman in the year 1816. Its population would entitle it to seven members, but, at this time, it is not represented in Congress at all; and has been, for some years past, entirely under the royal authority.

To the eastward of Potosi, and between the Rio Condorillo, which divides it from Cochabamba and the mountains or Altos de la Intinuyo, is the province of Mizque, which is composed of the valleys of Pomabamba, Tomina, and Mizque. It contains a population of fifteen thousand souls, and is nine thousand square miles in extent. Its chief city is Pomabamba. The population of this remote province exactly entitles it to one representative, which it has sent, although it is now subject to the colonial Government.

Directly to the west of Mizque, and north of Potosi, lie the valleys of Charcas or Chayanta and Oruro, extending to the principal elevation of the Andes, which compose the province of Charcas, that measures only five thousand square miles, and contains a population of one hundred and twenty thousand inhabitants; thirty thousand of whom are found in the city of Charcas or Chayanta, which is its capital. This province is now, and has been for some time past, under the government of the mother country. But, like some others, as we have seen, from liberality, policy, or intrigue, it has placed or continued three members in the present Congress; and yet, to be fully represented, Charcas ought to have ten representatives.

To the north of Charcas lies the small but prodigiously fertile territory formerly called the valley, now the province of Cochabamba, at the head of the Rio Grande de la Plata or Guapahi, which pours its waters into the Great Maranon. This province contains a population of one hundred thousand souls, the capital of which is the city of Oropesa; and yet its extent does not exceed three thousand four hundred square miles. Cochabamba, according to its population, ought to have seven representatives. As being now, and having been for some time past, entirely under the royal Government, it ought not to be represented at all; yet, according to some notions, or views, or circumstances, which I do not understand, it has one member in the present Congress.

Crossing the ridge of mountains which bound Cochabamba on the north, we enter a delightful valley called Cicacica, watered by various small streams with which the Rio Beni, one of the limbs of the great Amazon, begins to form itself. This valley constitutes the province of La Paz, the most northerly and remote one of the Union. It is said to contain a population of about sixty thousand inhabitants, and may be estimated at an extent of ten thousand square miles. When represented it will be entitled to four representatives. It is now, however, entirely in possession of the colonial authorities, and has no member in Congress.

From the northern boundary of La Paz, leaving the lofty ridges called the Sierras Altisimas, which are almost entirely encircled by the Rio Grande de la Plata, and passing by Santa Cruz de la Sierra la Nueva or San Lorenzo el Real de la Frontera to the mouth of the Rio Latirequiqui, thence down the Rio Paraguay to the lowest extremity of the territory of the Abipones, a short distance above Santa Fé; thence, ascending again by the way of the Laguna de Molaras, and along the eastern boundary of the provinces whose limits have been just described, to the Altos de Intinuyo, will present a very extensive triangular space of country running in a southerly direction into the United Provinces of South America. This territory is altogether owned and occupied by various tribes of Indians. It is an extensive elevated plain called the Llanos de Manso, watered by various branches of the Paraguay passing through it; but it is very illy supplied with timber. The tribes of the Llanos de Manso, as well as many others to the northward, were formerly under the pious pupilage of the Jesuit missionaries; but their pastors having been withdrawn and expelled, they have lost all the genuine notions of civilization that were taught them, if, indeed, they really ever learned any, and are now, in situation and habits, similar to our neighbors the Osages and Mandans of the river Missouri.

And, finally, after passing in an easterly direction over this great triangle of Indian territory, the province of Paraguay, in many respects the most interesting and important of the Union, presents itself. It is bounded by the rivers Paraguay and Parana, and the dominions of Brazil; and, with an extent of forty-three thousand two hundred square miles, it contains a population of about one hundred and ten thousand souls. Its capital is the ancient city of Asumpcion, situated on the left bank of the Paraguay. This province has never been attached to the Union. About the year 1810 the Government of Buenos Ayres sent an army into it, under the command of General Belgrano, for the purpose of forcing it into the confederacy. The Buenos Ayres forces were compelled to retire. Soon after, Paraguay declared itself independent, or some of the chiefs snatched the power from the hands of the colonial rulers, and declared war or a hostile non-intercourse against Buenos Ayres, which is the present state of the relations between them. And not long after, Paraguay assumed a similar stand with regard to the provinces of Santa Fé and the Banda Oriental. Paraguay, therefore, has never, at any time, had a representation in the Congress of the Union; but, according to its population, it would be entitled to send seven members.

This completes the survey I proposed to take of the several political divisions of this extensive Union, and of the local situation, the extent, the amount of population, and the relationship of each to the whole.

They having sprung from the same origin, and speaking the same language, having been bred up in the same religious creed, and been governed by the same laws, are of themselves strong foundations whereon to rest a political union. These circumstances operate very powerfully throughout Spanish America; they are among the leading causes which hold together a part of the provinces which I have described, and they produce a disposition in them all to unite; indeed, they seem, at times, to have excited the expression of a hope that all who speak the Castilian tongue, and worship according to the Catholic faith in America, might be formed into one grand confederacy. But the good sympathies arising from these circumstances will be displaced by the experience of profitable advantages; and the benevolence that is awakened by the sound of the mother tongue from the lips of the stranger, and his observance of the same forms of divine adoration, will be suppressed or banished by the dictates of self-interest, and a regard to those calls and necessities which local circumstances suggest or imperiously demand, and by those habits and customs which the peculiarities of the country insensibly inculcate and cherish. Therefore, to form an opinion of the nature and strength of those sympathies, interests, and circumstances, by which these provinces are now in part united or dissevered, attracted towards or repelled from each other, and also to render some of the traits in the character of its population more intelligible, and to understand the nature of its commerce, it will be necessary that we should take a survey of this Union with reference to the physical character of the country, and observe what are the articles produced by its soil, or by the ingenuity and industry of its inhabitants, making no other reference to the provinces than as they may serve to assist in designating the extent of each of those districts which are naturally and characteristically different from the rest.

Supposing we were to draw a line, beginning on the river Paraguay, near the city of Santa Fé, which should sweep northwardly so as to include a portion of the province of Cordova; thence bending round below that ridge of the mountains of Cordova, near the foot of which stands the town or village of St. Augustine; and thence passing along a little below the eastern boundary of the province of the Punta San Luis, proceeding due south, we should very nearly designate the western limits of one of the most extensive and peculiar plains in the world, which stretches from the shores of the Rio de la Plata toward the southern extremity of our continent, between the line I have described and the coast of the Atlantic Ocean. This is the vast flat plain or pasture ground of Buenos Ayres, or, as it is most usually and correctly called, the pampas, which word, in the Quecha tongue of Peru, signifies properly a valley.

This pampa, which forms a part of the territory of Cordova and of Santa Fé, and all that of Buenos Ayres, if measured entire into the country of the Patagonian tribes, extends in length fifteen hundred miles, and in breadth in a direct line, following the southern boundary of the Union, five hundred miles from the ocean to its western confines. Over all this immense space there is not a tree, not a shrub, nor a single perennial plant to be seen, save only those few which here and there lift their heads near a herdsman's hut. There are no hills nor eminences, and the undulations are so gentle as only to be perceived by taking a long view over its surface; and then the eye passes round and round the horizon as over the face of the undulating ocean in a calm, where there is not a single object to delight, or to relieve, or to vary the scene. The keen blasts called the pamperos sweep over the houseless and unsheltered plain without the least obstruction; and the fierce rays of the sun are felt in all their unmitigated fervor. You are sometimes in sight of thousands of animals, but they are chiefly horned cattle and horses, and the deer, ostriches, wild dogs, and others, fly as you approach. For a while the pampas present the mind with an agreeable astonishment; but that soon subsides, and the eye may often be directed in vain in any way to obtain a single glimpse of society. Surrounded by a boundless, silent sameness, one sensibly feels the value of the voice and variegated scenes of nature. This interminable plain spreads out one of the most expanded and awful solitudes on earth.

I do not know that any chemical analysis has ever been made of the nature of the qualities of the soil of the pampas, nor can I say that the few experiments that have been tried to shade them with a lofty growth were made with botanical skill; but they have all hitherto failed. I can only relate what I saw, and what were recounted to me as the trials of husbandmen and others, who, actuated by a love of gain, or directed by fancy, were anxious to aggrandize themselves, or to decorate their possessions. It is now two hundred and thirty-eight years since the city of Buenos Ayres was founded, and in six miles out from the Plaza Mayor you take leave of all quintas, and gardens, and orchards, and enter upon the great naked plain. The post road from Buenos Ayres to Mendoza (along which I travelled) passes five hundred miles over these pampas. In all that distance I saw not a single stone, no gravel, nor any sand; the surface of the earth appeared to be entirely a soft, black, rich soil on the banks of some of the rivers, and in places a reddish clay appeared. The water in almost every well in the city of Buenos Ayres is brackish; that of the wells in the pampas is generally as bad, and in some places worse. The water of the river Plate is used for drinking where it can be had. Many of the rivers of the pampas are brackish, as their names indicate, and there are in these plains many salt lakes; those called the Laguna Brava, one hundred and twenty miles, the Laguna Palantalen, one hundred and forty miles, the Lagunas de Monte and del Oeste, two hundred miles, and the Salinas de Paraguyes, two hundred and sixty miles from Buenos Ayres, before the revolution, at one time employed constantly from three to four hundred carts in carrying salt from them to the city for the supply of the country, and they now furnish a considerable quantity. There is under the whole of these pampas from three to twelve feet, and in some places more; below the surface a stratum of earth of a foot or more in thickness, which appears to be a concreted clay, about as firm as a common brick. This concretion, as it projects along the water's edge of the Rio de la Plata at the city of Buenos Ayres, is called tosco, or rough earth. On the margins and beds of most of the watercourses this stratum of tosco is visible; and the Rio Arecefe, or the river of the paved bottom, rolls entirely over it for a great distance. Near the banks of the La Plata, the Paraguay, and their branches, there are a few large trees and some shrubbery; but most of the lesser streams creep through the plains as in crooked ditches, without their courses being perceived at any distance, either by trees, shrubs, cliffs, or valleys.

The pampas are exceedingly productive in grass, and a great proportion of them are beset with a species of thistle, which grows from two to seven feet high, and is not unlike our garden artichoke. The only tree that seems to flourish everywhere, as a natural free citizen, is the embudo, or the perennial poke; its trunk, however, is a mere watery pulp, and the growth is utterly useless for every thing but shade. The peach grows well; but, in our country, it flourishes best on the seacoast and on the borders of the salt marshes. The olive and the fig also thrive; but they are natives of the dry and saline deserts of Arabia. Except these, there are no trees which appear to indicate that nature made them welcome where they were. There is no tradition that, in all this immense extent of territory, called the pampas, one single stick of good timber has been ever found growing at the distance of one mile from the rivers. If I might be indulged in adding a conjecture to the facts I have related, I would say that it seemed to me that this great plain had been gently lifted just above the level of the ocean, and left with a surface so unbroken and flat as not yet to have been sufficiently purified of its salt and acrid matter, either by filtration or washing, as to admit of the growth of any thing more than mere grass and herbage, out of the upper stratum by which it is covered. The pampas are sometimes afflicted with the most wasteful droughts, when vegetation is parched up, the ponds and streams are dried, and the numerous herds of cattle either die of thirst, or wander away towards the rivers in pursuit of water, and are wholly lost.

The soil of the pampas produces good wheat, barley, and Indian corn; but the crops frequently fail. The grain of the wheat has the appearance of a very inferior quality; but it makes excellent flour, and is said to be much superior to that of Chili, which looks so much better on comparison. Chacaras, or grain farms, have neither been extended nor multiplied since the revolution; and I question whether agriculture be likely soon to increase in this country; while, on the one hand, it has to overcome the difficulties incident to the want of timber, and the peculiarities of the soil, and, on the other, to resist the temptations to pasturage, to which the country invites so strongly, and to which it is so eminently suited. The staple commodities of this great district of pasture ground are derived chiefly from its innumerable herds of cattle. It might furnish any quantity of salted beef; but the present Government has thought proper to prohibit the putting it up. Therefore, the only articles which it now furnishes are hides, tallow, horns, wool and hair, viscacha, sheep and wild dog skins. In some years it produces a surplus of wheat; and it has furnished, and still supplies, some salt from its lakes. There are, also, some furs and swan skins, and feathers brought from the Patagonian territory. The ostrich of the pampas, with the size and speed, and much of the manners and habits of that of Africa, has not a single feather of his soft waving elegance of plumage. The pampa bird is clad in a very coarse gray garb, which, when plundered from him, except what is suited for bedding, is neither ornamental nor useful. Buenos Ayres is the principal city of this district; and as it is the seat of Government, the public manufactory of arms has been erected there. The productions of its industry are playing cards, beer, spirits distilled from barley and fruit, cleaned hair and wool, hats, boots and shoes, tinware, Windsor chairs, cabinet manufacture, olive oil, candles, soap, shipbread, and some few others. In the country, the people manufacture some hats, boots, shoes, and coarse woollen cloths.

Taking in the whole of the Banda Oriental, that which may be properly called the Entre Rios; all the residue of Cordova, below the mountains; all of Santiago del Estero; and so much of Tucuman and Salta as is not extended over the mountains, and we shall describe another vast district of the pasture lands and plains of this Union, the uses of which have been hitherto similar to those of the pampas; but the nature and capacities of which are very different, and the destinies of which may finally, perhaps soon, receive another direction.

The soil of the Banda Oriental is uncommonly productive, and well adapted to all kinds of grain, of which it can easily be made to yield a most liberal return. Its surface is very waving, and everywhere abundantly irrigated with never-failing springs and streams of the purest water. There are some great spaces destitute of timber, particularly along the coast of the river La Plata, towards the Portuguese settlement of Rio Grande de San Pedro. Groves of fine timber, more than sufficient for all its necessary probable wants, are, however, scattered over its whole extent, and its more northern extremity is, for the most part, an entire forest. There has no quality yet been discovered in its generous soil, which indicates the least unkindness to any species of vegetable growth. There are no bogs, swamps, or lakes to be found in any part of it; and its climate throughout is remarkably salubrious. In short, buxom nature frolics over this beautiful scene, and with an open hand bestows everywhere health, variety, gaiety, and fecundity. The Banda Oriental has, however, hitherto been applied to no other purpose than pasturage, and the rearing of cattle, mules, and horses.

The country properly called the Entre Rios is, in most particulars, similar to the Banda Oriental; it is very fertile, and is furnished with an abundance of timber. There are, however, some extensive plashes in it, such as the baxada or low grounds opposite Rosario, which are dry in summer, and, in the wet seasons, covered with water; the soil, in such places, shoots up a species of reed, or large coarse straw; hence they are distinguished by the Spanish name pajanal. It was in one of those pajanals, then dry, near Santa Fé, in which the Buenos Ayres troops suffered so severe a defeat in April last. Almost the whole of the Entre Rios, like the Banda Oriental, has hitherto been employed only as a pasture ground; and, for that purpose, its fertile rincons, or forks of rivers, have been considered as the most valuable estancias, or pasture farms, in the country.

The residue of the territory of Cordova, not embraced as pampa or mountain; all that of Santiago del Estero, with so much of Tucuman and Salta as lays below the mountains, is, in general, an elevated, dry, sandy plain, destitute of timber, except near the watercourses. The Rio Dulce occasionally overflows its banks, and fills large ponds near it, leaving them stagnant, and making the neighborhood very unhealthy. Hence the addition of Estero to the name of the city of Santiago; for, when the Rio Dulce pours its waters over its banks, forming a great lake in its vicinity, it is then, unfortunately during a sickly season, truly called Santiago of the Lake. This vast plain, as well as that of the pampas, seems destined to eternal pasturage; hitherto, it has been applied to no other purpose. Being at a little distance from the rivers, higher, drier, and more copiously supplied with pure water than the pampas, it is, therefore, better adapted to the rearing of horses, mules, and sheep, of which there are great herds and flocks on those plains.

The principal internal commerce from Cordova and this district, prior to the revolution, was its trade in mules, sent over to Lower Peru and Lima. This traffic, although at present wholly cut off by the war, deserves notice as illustrating the actual state of the country, and the nature of its productions. At two and a half years old the mules were purchased of the breeders, in the Banda Oriental, Entre Rios, and round about, and gathered in herds near Cordova, where they were wintered, and remained about six months. Thence they were taken up to Salta, where they spent a second winter; in which time they obtained their full growth, and were put in good order for the prodigious journey they had before them. Thus, somewhat gentled, seasoned, and prepared, they were presented for sale in the great mule fair at Salta, which opened in the month of March, where they were sold at from ten to fifteen dollars a head. The drover having purchased as many as, assisted by his peons or hirelings, he could manage, which was, on an average, two or three thousand, he set out on his journey towards Lima; which, taking into account the circuits he would be obliged to make to find pasturage for the drove, may be safely computed at not less than two thousand miles, and a great part of the way over the crags and defiles of the most rugged and lofty portions of the Cordilleras, among which many of his mules commonly strayed off, and were wholly lost. To reach Lima with two-thirds of the numbers with which the journey was commenced from Salta, was reckoned a successful voyage. Mules which cost in Salta fifteen dollars, were sold in Lima for twenty-five or thirty dollars. One year with another, there were, in this manner, travelled over, from Salta to Peru, from fifty to seventy thousand mules. All the labor and transportation by beasts of burden in Peru has been, until lately, performed entirely by mules; and they seem to be the only animals which can be trusted along its precipices, and can labor under its burning sun, or that are well suited to the climate and country. This mule trade has now been so long cut off, that the stock of these useful animals in Peru is nearly exhausted, and the conveniencies and the productions of the country are materially affected by it. The price of a good mule now in Peru is more than three or four times what it was in the years before the revolution.

The productions of this extensive district of dry plains and wooded pasture, which I have just described, are chiefly similar to those of the pampas; they are hides, horns, tallow, hair, wool, sheep and wild dog skins, and some peltry, Indian corn, wheat, barley, and rice, fine potatoes, oranges, figs, grapes, and thence wine, brandy, and raisins, tobacco, timber, and lime. The articles which the ingenuity and industry of the people of this district produce for home consumption or domestic exchanges, are hats, tanned leather, coarse cotton and woollen cloths, candlewick, and ponchos or cloak of the country.

To the southward of the mountains of Cordova, and to the westward of the pampas, including the whole of the province of the Punta San Luis, and the eastern part of the province of Mendoza, is another district of mere pasturage. It is a high, dry, broken plain, and perhaps the most barren and unproductive of any in the Union. A great part of it is covered with several kinds of thorny shrubbery, interspersed with which there are some small timber trees. This district produces hides, tallow, horns, some grain, wine, brandy, and dried fruit.

By including a considerable extent of the Entre Rios round Corrientes, and the whole of the province of Paraguay, we shall designate a district which by many is considered as the fairest portion of this great Union, and equal, in its various excellencies, to any tract of similar extent in all our continent. Its climate is delightful, possessing all the advantages of that of the torrid zone, without being visited by the fierce rays of its sun, or being enveloped in its pernicious vapors. The face of the country is not mountainous, nor anywhere flat; it is well supplied by a great variety of streams of pure water; its soil is everywhere found to be exceedingly fertile and productive, and a rich and variegated forest originally overshadowed the whole, and now covers a great part. This forest produces mahogany, and several other kinds of beautiful wood suited to cabinet work, and furnishes, besides, an abundance and variety of timber excellently adapted to domestic and naval architecture. This may be regarded as more particularly and especially the agricultural district of the Union. The state of husbandry in Paraguay is said, however, to be, like that of the other provinces, in a very low and unimproved condition, and conducted in the most rude and unskilful manner. The productions of the country are as various as they might be abundant. The sugar cane grows well, but little sugar is made; its juice is chiefly manufactured into spirits. This district produces Indian corn, wheat, and barley, but exports little or none. All the European fruit trees flourish and produce well; the orange, fig, olive, and vine grow luxuriantly. It produces cotton, flax, hemp, and tobacco, hides, tallow, lion skins, tiger skins, and some peltry. Its inhabitants manufacture hats, shoes, and several kinds of coarse cotton and woollen cloths for home consumption chiefly, and they make, for the markets of the other provinces, tobacco, cigars, and matte.

Within this district grows that singular vegetable, so much in demand and use over all South America, called matte, or the yerba of Paraguay. It is a perennial plant, rather a tree than a shrub, and, when full grown, is about the size of a common apple tree. Every spring, when the tree puts forth, as it does very luxuriantly, its succulent boughs, to about the length of two or three inches, and, when the leaves are about half formed, the young shoots, are cut, gathered, and carefully dried; and, when perfectly cured, are put up in sacks, made of raw hide, of about one or two hundred pounds weight, and sent abroad over all the adjoining provinces. The young shoots and leaves of the matte, it would seem, have received the name of yerba, rather from the soft and herbaceous state in which they are gathered, than from the character of the plant. The yerba is used in decoction, like the tea of China; but, instead of making it, like that, in a pot, and serving it out in cups, it is made in a little vase, and sucked up through a small tube of about a foot in length, called a bombilla, or little pump, at which each one draws. The matte is used by all ranks and classes, and is one of those luxuries which has grown into as inveterate and necessary a habit as the use of the tea of China in the United States.

Embracing all the residue of the Union under one view, we find an extensive mountainous district, stretching along below the eastern brow of the Andes, from Mendoza to La Paz, and spreading out over the whole of the province of Jujuy, as low down as the confines of the Llanos de Manso. On all those within this district I shall bestow the epithet of the High Provinces, as lying entirely among the broken and rugged elevations of the Cordilleras of the Andes; some of them, from Jujuy north and west, have been rather vaguely designated heretofore by the name of Peru-Alto, from their having formed a part of the empire of the Incas, whose seat was at Cuzco, three hundred and seventy miles to the north of La Paz. Throughout the whole of the high provinces, almost every one of the Spanish settlements seems to have been originally attracted to its present seat by an expectation of the wealth to be derived by the extracting of the precious metals from some mine in its vicinity. Each town and valley, from that of Uspillata, near Mendoza, to those of Chicas, Potosi, and La Paz, has had, or now has, some productive mine in its neighborhood. Population has gathered about these subterranean masses of wealth, and agriculture was made necessary for the support of those who came to dig, or to profit by digging for silver and gold. Recourse was had to the neighboring valleys, and the cultivation of their generous soil has, in many respects, been found more profitable, and exposed to fewer disappointments than mining. Hence, this great district, first seated as a mining country, has now become rather more of an agricultural one. The mines of Uspillata and Famatina have ceased to enchant, or to be as productive as formerly; and the watered and cultivated fields and vineyards of Mendoza, San Juan, Rioja, Catamarca, and many other valleys, have brought such a pleasing and a comfortable wealth to their owners, that they are, in many respects, perfectly cured of their fanatic love of Plata, and have become as indifferent about searching after it as their predecessors the original natives.

I directed my inquiries in various ways, for the purpose of ascertaining, with some degree of certainty, what had been, or now was, the total amount of the precious metals extracted from the high provinces of the Union, but found it impossible to obtain any data whence a tolerably fair estimate of their fecundity could be made. Before the revolution the productions of the mines of Peru-Alto were, in part, sent to Lima, in part to the ports of Cobija and Arica, on the Pacific; but the greater part was exported from the city of Buenos Ayres, whence between two and three millions of dollars were sent to Europe annually; but then a very great proportion of that amount was derived from Chili. Again: the amount sent to Spain from Chili, every year, was about two or three millions of dollars; but then the whole of that amount, together with what was sent over the Andes, cannot be set down as its own production either, because a great portion of it was obtained from Lima, Arica, and Cobija, in payment for its wheat; so that if we are to ascertain the amount of the exports of each of the three viceroyalties of Peru, Chili, and Buenos Ayres, it would be difficult to say how much was properly its own production, because of their having been so intermingled. Since the revolution the mines of the high provinces have been very much neglected, owing to the country's having been in so distracted a state, and so much the seat of war. It is said that, within the last year, Buenos Ayres has exported about two millions of dollars; if so, a very small amount has been obtained from the high provinces, because much the greater production, or nearly all of that amount of its metallic exports, has been, in various ways, drawn from Chili.

In addition to the precious metals, the high provinces produce copper, tin, lead, and iron; hides, tallow, wool, wheat, corn, and barley, rice and cotton, of which last article Catamarca is uncommonly productive. They produce, also, wine, brandy, and abundance of dried fruit. It will be proper to observe, however, that this district extends over a part of that singular region of America where, owing to the elevation and range of the Andes, or to some other causes, the vapors that are lifted into the sky are not permitted to fall on it in rain during the summer months; and, consequently, as it does not rain for many months together, the valleys, to be made arable, must be irrigated from some neighboring stream of water. Beside the productions of the mines and the valleys of this district, there is drawn from the heights and obscure retreats of the mountains a considerable quantity of peltry, of which gunaca, vecuna, and chinchilla skins are the chief. The gunaca wool is equal to the merino, and the wool or fur of the vecuna seems not only to be capable of being manufactured into the finest cloth, but hats made of it rival, in lightness and fineness of texture, those made of beaver. The inhabitants of this district of the high provinces manufacture hats, shoes, tanned leather, and several kinds of cotton and woollen cloths, and ponchos. And, in many respects, the native Indian mode of manufacturing, as well as the form of the fabric, has been retained.

The various routes, and the facilities by which internal exchanges are effected, and the points at which they draw together and meet the commerce of foreign nations, with much truth may be considered as the cords by which a nation or a union is bound together; along which, as by so many nerves, each province is made sensible that it belongs to one whole, and every limb is made to brace itself in the common cause of all. Therefore, to complete the concise review which I propose to present to you of this Union, its several parts, and its productions, I shall exhibit some of its principal paths and channels of commerce, and the manner and the places at which its productions are collected for barter among themselves, or gathered together to meet the exchanges of our citizens and those of other nations. These details may, perhaps, appear to be unnecessarily tedious, but I know not how to compress them; and, besides, statistical information consists in mere matters of calculation and interest, in which we look rather to the value and the utility of the knowledge, than to the beauty of the scene which it is in the power of the narrator to depict.

I have endeavored to lay before you a fair representation of the peculiarities of the country; and, as may readily be supposed, some of the peculiarities and the facilities of internal transportation grow out of, or are the natural suggestions of those of the country. The pampas are, in rainy seasons, very wet, and in places there are great pantanas, or spaces of soft mud; for want of stone, or gravel, or wood, the roads cannot be rendered firm for carriages. There are few places of refreshment or repair, and the distance over them is prodigious. The carriage of burden is, therefore, accommodated to these circumstances. The Tucuman and Mendoza carts, at a little distance, look like thatched cabins slowly moving over the plain. The whole machine is destitute of a nail or a bit of iron; its great coarse wheels are not less than eight feet in diameter; six oxen, in general noble, strong animals, move it. The two front pair have a great length of cord by which they draw; and the load of the cart, which, on an average, is not less than four thousand weight, is pretty nearly balanced on the axletree; the body of the cart is either covered with raw hide or thatch made of reeds or straw; and, with a collection of brushwood as fuel, tied on the top, and brought from the westward of the pampas, these carts are seen crossing the plains in caravans of from thirty to forty together. On the journey the oxen are unyoked occasionally through the day, and at night, and permitted to seek their food round about. Thus, without any other provision than what is necessary for himself, the carrier pursues his way over a waste of thirty days or six weeks' passage. There are in Buenos Ayres and Mendoza a number of owners of these carts; and the several common carriers of Tucuman keep about two hundred of them constantly employed in the trade of that city. From Buenos Ayres to Mendoza the distance is nine hundred miles, and the fare is from one hundred and forty to two hundred dollars the cart load downwards; but, to the westward, the fare is only about forty dollars the load. The route is performed in about thirty days. From Buenos Ayres to Cordova the distance is four hundred and fifty miles, the fare, per cart load, is twenty-five dollars, and the journey is performed in about sixteen or eighteen days. It is nine hundred miles from Buenos Ayres to Tucuman, and the fare, per load, according to seasons, is about one hundred and fifty dollars. From Buenos Ayres to Jujuy, the distance is twelve hundred miles, and it is the utmost extent to which the roads are practicable for wheel carriages; the fare is not less than two hundred dollars the cart load.

Mules are used for transportation in every direction over land, as well where carts can, as where they cannot travel. But they are most commonly employed to traverse the mountains, and to bring down to Buenos Ayres the productions of the high provinces. San Juan is only one hundred and eighty miles to the north of Mendoza; and along the valley parallel to the Andes there is a good cart road from one to the other; but the direct road from San Juan to Buenos Ayres is no more than nine hundred miles, but it is only practicable for mules. In general, in the high provinces, there are no roads which are at all passable for carriages. A mule load, according to the custom of the country, is four hundred pounds weight, for which the fare between San Juan and Buenos Ayres is ten dollars, and the route is usually performed in thirty days. From Buenos Ayres to Cordova the fare is seven dollars, and so in proportion further, or in other directions. From Jujuy, whence the transportation can only be effected, in any westwardly or northwardly direction, on mules, the distance to La Paz, the most remote city of the Union, is about seven hundred miles, and the fare is thirty-five dollars the mule load. The carriers, who make a business of transportation by mules, have from fifty to one hundred of these animals in a drove, the greater number of which are loaded when on a journey; and whatever may be the route they pursue, they carry no provisions with them, nor purchase any by the way for these beasts of burden. Either on the plains, or in the mountains, the patient, hardy animal, relieved of his pack, is turned loose at night to gather his food, and take his rest; and in the morning the load is replaced, and he is driven on, very commonly, the whole day without stopping.

The mail leaves Buenos Ayres for the northwest four times in the month. The whole distance to La Paz is little short of nineteen hundred miles; and the mail usually reaches that city from Buenos Ayres in forty days. It is said that individuals, by the usual mode of taking relays of hired post horses, and pressing forward, have gone the whole route to La Paz in twenty days, and that extraordinary expresses have gone through in twelve days from Buenos Ayres.

These are the principal paths of the commercial intercourse of the Union over land; the channels of communication by water, that have been accessible to foreigners, or which have been at all used by the inhabitants, are only those of the Rio de la Plata and its tributary streams. If we should measure directly across the mouth of this great river, from the Portuguese dominions to the line I have designated as the boundary of the Patagonian territory, we shall find a length of not more than about three hundred and seventy miles of coast on the Atlantic belonging to the Union; but if, as seems to be most correct, the river Plate be considered merely as a great arm of the sea, and its shore be taken into the account, then the Union will be found to have an extent of between five and six hundred miles of coast. The Rio de la Plata is said by navigators to have many dangerous singularities, and materially to differ from every other known river of the world. No vessel drawing more than eighteen feet water can pass up to Buenos Ayres; and all navigators are cautioned to beware of its singularly changeful currents, and the destructive blasts, called pamperos, which occasionally sweep over its surface. There are no fish of passage, which, at any season, frequent this estuary; and, therefore, there can be no fishery anywhere in it for the purposes of profitable commerce, except, indeed, the seals that may be taken on the islands of Flores and Lobos, near its mouth. The Rio de la Plata commences from Cape St. Maria, on the north, and Cape St. Antonio, on the south; thence it gradually narrows until it reaches Buenos Ayres, where it is about forty miles broad, and it terminates by a round end just above the small island of Martin Garcia, which is said to command the mouths of all the rivers which unite a little to the northwest of it, and pour their waters into the La Plata. At present this island is uninhabited, and seems to be considered as of little other importance than as a convenient place to procure paving stones for the city of Buenos Ayres.

On the shore of the Banda Oriental, just within Cape St. Maria, is the port of Maldonado. The harbor is chiefly formed by the small island of Gorette. There are six or seven fathoms water within it, but it is not of easy access, except for small vessels; those drawing eighteen feet or more must enter by a crooked channel to the westward of the island. Next above Maldonado, on the same side, is Montevideo. It is a tolerably good harbor for such vessels as can enter, but it has not more than fourteen feet of water within the cove. The ensenada de St. Lucia, above Montevideo, has about eighteen feet water at its mouth, but furnishes no harbor. The Rio las Conchas, whose mouth is in the territory of Buenos Ayres, just below the Paraguay, is entered by vessels of ten or twelve feet draught of water, and for such it affords a good harbor. The city of Buenos Ayres is itself situated on a long, straight reach of the coast of the La Plata, and the vessels trading or belonging there lie out from two to seven or eight miles from the shore, in a bleak, unsheltered roadstead. The ensenada de Barragan, or the mouth of the creek of Barragan, below Buenos Ayres, affords a harbor for vessels of about twelve feet draught of water. Except these, the only security for any vessel, anywhere within the Rio de la Plata, is her ground tackle.

Passing the island of Martin Garcia, and ascending the Uruguay, on tide, by a broad and bold navigation fifty-four miles, the beautiful Rio Negro presents itself, entering from the eastward. This limpid stream, whose waters, collected from the pasture ground and groves, beset with sarsaparilla, of the Banda Oriental, are pleasant to the taste, and said to be for many cases medicinal, is navigable for all vessels that can pass over the bar in the La Plata, as far as Capilla Nueva, about forty miles from its mouth, where the capital of the country, now called Purification, has not long since been fixed. This river hides its head in the Cerro de Lascano, nearly three hundred miles farther up, and is said to be navigable for boats some distance above Purification.

Returning, to follow up the Uruguay, it is found to afford an easy, uninterrupted navigation as far as St. Antonio, or Salta Chico, more than two hundred miles above its mouth, to which place the Government of Buenos Ayres, in the year 1810, sent several launches, of many tons burden, laden with provisions and munitions of war for its army then stationed there; and I have understood that it is navigable to Capilla St. Pero, a hundred miles still further up: thence the stream is uncommonly rapid for more than three hundred miles, to where it receives the Rio Pepry from the west, and its right bank forms the boundary of Brazil; thence, about fifty miles farther, it is met by the Rio Vermejo from the east; and from thence to its source, in the Sierra de Sta. Catherina, opposite the island of St. Catherine, on the coast, a distance of about two hundred and fifty miles, it passes wholly within the Portuguese dominions. The general course of this river is nearly northeast; and its whole length, travelling with its course, may be estimated, from its source to its mouth, at little short of one thousand miles.

Immediately opposite to the island of Martin Garcia, within a space of about forty miles, the great river Paraguay pours its mighty collection of waters into the Rio de la Plata through seven mouths, of which the Brazo de la Tinta, on the left, enters the Uruguay from the west, and the Bocha de las Palmas, on the right, enters the La Plata on a line with its western coast, just above the Rio de Lujan; but the chief opening, and that which is most usually navigated, is the Boca del Guante, which presents itself directly to the west of Martin Garcia. Any vessels which can cross the three-fathom bank in the La Plata below Buenos Ayres may ascend the Paraguay with ease and safety to Santa Fé, three hundred miles to the westward of Buenos Ayres, which, with a fair wind, may be reached in ten or twelve days; indeed, it is said that such sized vessels may ascend as high as Corrientes. In ascending the Paraguay from the mouth, you pursue a northwest course, about two hundred miles, to Rosario, a town on the right bank; thence north, one hundred miles, to Santa Fé, which is also situated on its right bank, and just above its confluence with the Rio Salado; thence, bending away nearly northeast, and ascending about four hundred and fifty miles further up, and twenty miles below the mouth of the Parana, you arrive at the city of Corrientes, situated on its left bank. Pursuing the same course about two hundred miles still further up, you arrive at the ancient city of Assumpcion, once the capital of the whole country, now that of the province of Paraguay only; thence, following a course more northwardly, after ascending about one hundred and fifty miles further up, you reach the Brazil line at the Rio Ipane, which enters from the east, at the mouth of which is situated the village of Nueva Sta. de Belem; thence rising along the stream, in a direction nearly north, and having the Portuguese dominions on the right, for a distance of three hundred miles, you meet with the Rio Latirequiqui, entering from the west, near the end of the Cordillera de San Fernando, which elevated range of mountains forming the boundary of Brazil, the river becomes wholly the right of the Portuguese; thence pursuing the same course for a distance of three hundred miles further through the great morass of the Xareyes, you find the marco, or marble pyramid, erected as a boundary in 1754, near the mouth of the Rio Jouru; by ascending which some distance, the traders of the country carry their boats over a portage of four thousand eight hundred yards into the Guapore; by descending which to the Madeira, and thence downward, they reach the mighty Maranon. About three hundred miles farther up you find the sources of the Paraguay in the Prisidios dos Diamantos; so called from its being said to have the richest diamond mines in all Brazil, perhaps in the world. So that the Paraguay, in the whole, extends itself, in a northwardly direction, nearly two thousand miles; about fifteen hundred of which affords good boat navigation, and between six and seven hundred is said to be practicable for sea vessels.

The principal branch of the Paraguay is the Parana; and, on entering it, you ascend in an east direction about two hundred and thirty miles to La Candelaria; thence, ascending northeast one hundred and fifty miles, to the point at which it receives the Rio Ipane from the east, which is the boundary of Brazil; thence, with those dominions to the east, pursuing the same course one hundred and thirty miles farther up, and you arrive at the Salta Grande, or great waterfall, which interrupts the further navigation of this stream at the lower end of the Ilha Grande, and near the end of the Cordillera Alto de Maracayu, which is the Brazilian boundary on the right bank of the river. From this, the Parana ascends, in a northeast direction, into the Portuguese dominions, about four hundred miles, where it is divided into two branches, one the Rio Grande, which, turning to the eastward, and extending about four hundred miles farther, is lost in the great mountains, about one hundred and fifty miles to the north of Rio Janeiro; the other branch, called the Parana-iva, after stretching due north about three hundred and fifty miles, reaches its source in the lofty ridges of the Sierra de Marcella.

Of those rivers which enter the Paraguay from the west, there are only three which, as far as I can learn, merit particular attention. The Rio del Pasage, after collecting the waters from the valley of Calchioqui, and traversing the greater portion of the province of Salta, unites with the Rio Tala, and forms the Rio Salado; which, after winding its way, in a southeast direction, through the plains of Tucuman, Santiago, and Cordova, and travelling a distance of about four hundred miles, throughout the whole of which it is said to afford boat navigation, slants into the Paraguay at Santa Fé. The river Vermejo, after receiving the waters of the valleys of Tarija and Rosario, descends to the western margin of the Llanos de Manso, along which it moves past the territories of Jujuy and Salta; then, turning to the eastward, it crosses those great plains, and enters the Paraguay about fifty miles above the mouth of the Parana, travelling a distance from the town of Tarija of more than seven hundred miles; and, about midway of its course, receives the Rio Jujuy, after it has pursued a route of about two hundred miles in length from the city of Jujuy. In the year 1790, Colonel Cornejo, in a boat of several tons burden, did actually ascend the Rio Vermejo as far as the town of Tarija, without meeting any material obstructions from cataracts or ripples. The river Suipacha, after receiving the waters of the St. Juan from the salt pampas at the foot of the principal Cordillera of the Andes to the north, and those of the Rio del Oro, which are precipitated from the same lofty eminences, to the south, in the province of Chicas, and passing the crags, and wilds, and fertile valleys which it meets in a course of three hundred miles, finds itself associated with the branch called the Pilcomayo or Paspayo, which has traversed a similar country for a distance of three hundred miles from the foot of the mountain of the famed silver mine of Potosi; thence, moving on their joint waters, they meet with the Rio Chachimayo, after it has descended from the mountains of Charcas, and passed the city of La Plata or Chuquisaca, at one hundred and fifty miles above; with which river they unite to form the Pilcomayo, properly so called, near the eastern end of the fertile valley of Ingre, in which the warlike Chiriguanes Indians have twenty-six villages; from which the Pilcomayo, entering directly into the Llanos de Manso, and crossing them in a southeasterly direction, passing great numbers of the habitations of the savages who dwell in those plains, pours its waters into the Paraguay by two mouths forty miles below the city of Assumpcion. How far this river is practicable for boats of any size, I have not been able to learn; but I am induced to believe, from the description of the plains through which it passes, that it must be navigable a great part of the way.

These are the principal paths and channels by land and water; and this is the manner in which the greater part of the productions of this extensive Union are transported from one province to another, or by which those suited for a foreign market find their way to the city of Buenos Ayres; for the new Government allows of no other port, either for exportation or importation. One of the consequences of independence and union to our country was, that its commerce, as well internal as external, almost immediately left many of its former colonial courses, and sought others; directing itself to points and along ways adapted to the natural advantages of the country and the best interests of the people. Hence, the decline of some of our colonial towns, and the very rapid growth of some of our cities. A similar consequence, to a much greater extent, might have been expected to have arisen from the revolution of the Spanish colonies on the river Plate; but none such has yet taken place. On the contrary, those noble rivers which nature seems to have poured through their country as immense conveniences, advantages, and benefits, have been to them the waters of bitterness and discord. An attempt was made to export and import from and to Santa Fé, which was so great an advantage to all the country west and north of it that much traffic began to flow that way. Buenos Ayres forbade it; and this is one of the grounds of the controversy between Santa Fé and Buenos Ayres. The people of the Union are contending for independence, that they may, among their other rights and liberties, establish the freedom of commerce, so that its courses may be directed solely and exclusively by convenience, profit, and advantage. If commerce be dragged away from courses so chosen, it is a monopoly; and, although it may not, in some respects, be as pernicious as that of Cadiz, it is a monopoly. One of the consequences of the present strife to Buenos Ayres is, that it can procure not a single stick of that necessary article, timber, with which the banks of the rivers beyond the La Plata abound; but is supplied from Cordova by its carts, or timber is brought from Brazil, or the United States; in which cases, it is admitted free of duty, and is said to yield a good profit, such are the present high prices of timber in this new country.

The aggregate amount of the imports of Buenos Ayres, within the last two or three years, has been estimated at about eight millions per annum; of this amount, about one-half consists of British manufactures, and productions of one kind or other; and the rest is made up principally of French, German, and India goods of various descriptions, and a small proportion of the manufactures and productions of the United States. The principal of our commodities which have found their way to advantage to Buenos Ayres, seem to be cordage, pitch, tar, salt fish, furniture, Windsor and rush-bottom chairs, rice, butter, spermaceti candles, porter, ale, cider, gin, peach brandy, writing paper, plank, and some other articles that I may have omitted. But latterly our trade thither has been very limited, and has constituted rather in carrying the goods of European and Indian continents for the purpose of procuring the few articles we want from them, than its being a market for our own productions of any sort.

The exports of Buenos Ayres for some years past have been, it is said, on the decline. During the last year, they have been thus estimated; it has exported one million of hides of all descriptions, which, valued on an average at three dollars each, makes three millions of dollars; it is computed to have made up three millions more, of the following articles: tallow, horns, horse hair, jerked beef, copper, tin, lead, chinchilla skins, nutria, lion, tiger, wild dog, seal, swan, viscacha, and sheep skins; sheep, vecuna, and guanaca wool, and feathers, with some few others of less value, or that are produced in smaller quantities. And the balance, consisting of two millions, it is said, has been made up by specie derived from the mines of the high provinces, and from Chili, in return for the foreign manufactures sent thither by the way of Mendoza, and in payment for its matte, and by various other ways and means.

The Spanish settlers in America have everywhere discovered a disposition to group themselves together in towns and cities. It is rare to meet a country gentleman resident on his estate, or to find a wealthy land owner, who has not a house in the city, which is his usual place of abode; from which his chacaras and estancias, that is, his grain and grazing farms, committed to the care of peasants or slaves, are occasionally visited. The reason of this mode of life, it is said, arises from the inertia of the Spanish habits. The owner commits the care of his estates to his slaves, or makes them grazing farms, which require little attention, that he may lounge away his time in a city, with every convenience about him, and enjoy those long intervals of repose of which a Spaniard is so fond. But the modern Egyptian and the modern Greek, whose countries were once the busy hives of industry, and the lands of enterprise and science, are as inert and as fond of repose as the modern Spaniard; may we not, then, suppose the causes of this love of repose to have been the same in all?—the hebetating political and ecclesiastical institutions, whose impressions have been with fire and sword, and faggot, cut and branded upon them all? But, whatever may have been the cause, such is the fact, that the more wealthy, intelligent and better sort of people are universally found in the cities and the towns. The best and fairest sample of the population of the Union, it is said, is to be found in the city of Buenos Ayres; and there are some circumstances which render the assertion not improbable. That city, almost ever since its foundation, has been a seat of Government, and the emporium of all the foreign commerce of the country; the people have had much intercourse with foreign nations; and, of late years particularly, they have had the means of information poured in upon them; and they have, from every account, profited by it very much. They are, in general, very intelligent, and very unanimous in their determination to support their independence, and to establish their freedom. The lower classes have been materially benefited by the change, and they are perfectly sensible of the happy results. With very few shades of difference, however, the population of the great cities and principal towns of Buenos Ayres, Montevideo, Mendoza, Santa Fé, Cordova, Salta, Tucuman, Jujuy, Corrientes, Assumpcion, Potosi, Chuquisaca, &c. are all alike as to intelligence and general information. In the cities are found the great body of the leading and influential citizens of the Union, and their numbers are by no means inconsiderable, who have given an impulse to public opinion, and have kept, and will keep, the ball of the revolution in motion until the great end be accomplished of independence and substantial freedom.

The herdsmen or peasantry of the pampas plains form a very considerable proportion of the population of the country. Thinly strewed over the great pastures, those residing at a distance from the cities have, most commonly, each one the charge of an estancia, many leagues in extent. They have little society, are totally illiterate, lead an indolent life, and dwell on an immense waste, in continual solitude. Their habitations are constructed in the simplest form; in general, they consist of low mud walls, thatched with the long grass of the plains, tied on a layer of reeds, with raw hide thongs, or stuck on with mud. In the pampas a few peach trees stand round about; but the embudo, one single one, and no more, seems to be the herdsman's favorite shade, and designation of his dwelling. The bedding and clothing of the family, and the whole household furniture, exhibit a scene of laziness and dirt, yet mingled with apparent cheerfulness, great kindness, much natural intelligence, and an evident independence of character.

From infancy the herdsman is taught to ride, and there are, perhaps, no more expert horsemen in the world; much riding is required by his situation and mode of life; and to ride well is his pleasure and his pride. Either from the custom of his Spanish ancestors, or from its real and constant utility, the herdsman is never without a long butcher's knife, worn about his waist. His cloak is that gay, party-colored covering, formerly used by the natives, which seems to have been universally adapted to his taste and convenience. The Indians and the herdsman's cloak, or poncho, as it is called, is a square piece of cloth, something larger than a Dutch blanket, with a slit in the middle, through which the head is put, leaving it to hang down all around. This poncho is his bed at night, and by day his cloak, a belt, a saddle cover, or a bag, as fancy or necessity may require. It would seem as if similar circumstances everywhere made similar suggestions. Within that region of the globe designated as Central Asia, there are immense steps or plains not materially different from those traversed by the La Plata and its rivers. And it is said the Asiatic herdsman of those plains, like him of America, has, from the most remote ages, always used as a utensil, or weapon, the lazo, or running noose, either to manage his herd, or to attack his foe. The lazo is a cord or thong, made of strong, well-prepared hide, about thirty yards long, with an iron ring, or a loop at one end, through which a running noose or lazo may be made in an instant; the other end is fastened to the cincho or broad surcingle, which secures the saddle. The lazo, hung in a coil to the hinder part of the saddle, is thus ready for use. So soon as it is thrown and takes effect, the horse, as he has been taught, stands firm or moves off with what has been caught. The lazo is thrown by a herdsman with unerring aim, either on foot, or on horseback, or at full speed, at a fleeing animal or retreating foe. The herdsman of the plains is usually provided with another instrument similar in its use to the lazo. The bola is an instrument made with three cords of about three feet each from the knot which unites them in the middle; to the end of each of which is fastened a ball of about two pounds weight.

The bola, with a few twirls over the head, is thrown like a stone from a sling; and, entangling about the legs of the animal at which it is directed, instantly prostrates it at the mercy of the pursuer. And, whether thrown standing or at full speed, the herdsman's bola seldom flies in vain. This instrument, like the lazo, is usually slung to the hinder part of the saddle. Mounted, and thus equipped, the herdsman is ready for a journey of a thousand miles, the protection or the seizing of his herd, or for the defence of his country.

The European armies that have been landed on the shores of the river Plate have found the lazo and the bola to be weapons of war of a new, surprising, and singular cast. Their outposts often silently disappeared they knew not how; a dragoon, when at a sufficient distance, apparently, to be out of danger from his enemy, would have his horse suddenly thrown from under him, or in an instant he himself would be snatched from his seat and dragged to death. The European forces saw the plains covered with cattle; but none of the wild herd could be taken; their chase and fire frightened them beyond their reach. The nakedness of the country was thus perceived to be its chief fastness, and security to its inhabitants and their herds against foreign invaders. The wars that have been waged in that country, particularly on the Banda Oriental, have made the herdsmen of those plains as expert in the use of a gun on horseback, as of a lazo or the bola, all of which they now carry in their warlike excursions; and they may be considered as the most formidable guerrilla or partisan soldiery that ever existed. In courage they are inferior to none; and the exploits that are related of their adroit and rapid horsemanship exceed what has been told of the Parthian, the Scythian, or the Cossack of the Don. Such are the herdsmen of the pampas and plains, who are usually called gauchos; an epithet, like that of yankee, originally cast on them in derision, but one which has now ripened into a distinctive and common appellation that is no longer offensive. The most active and efficient portion of the Buenos Ayrean army of Peru, under Belgrano, is the guerrilla party of gauchos commanded by Colonel Guemes.

The peasantry of the high provinces are, a great majority of them, agriculturists, with the addition of the laborers in the mines. This class of the population of the Union is not materially dissimilar from the like class as it is described to exist under all arbitrary Governments. They are wholly illiterate, are superstitious and indolent; but, from the thinness of the population, and abundance of the necessaries of life, this class has not been so pressed upon, and is, therefore, not so sordid and boorish as in some other countries; they are cheerful, docile, active, and extremely susceptible, and desirous of improvement.

Of those three classes of population it must be observed that each has evidently been mingled and discolored with Indian blood. The city class least of any; but the gauchos are a third or a half of Indian descent; and the husbandmen of some of the cultivated valleys of the high provinces have the appearance of being little else than the civilized descendants of the aborigines.

There were at the commencement of the revolution a considerable number of slaves in the Union, of the Indian or African race. But slavery has been abolished. The negroes have, generally, been transferred from domestic slavery to the ranks of the army, into which about four thousand have been enlisted; the half of which were sent to Chili, where their numbers have been reduced nearly half. Some were sent to carry on the war against Artigas, and have been much cut up; and the residue are quartered in the city of Buenos Ayres, where they are believed to make good soldiers. They are used as guards about the directorial palace, the hall of Congress, and the city.

The people of Paraguay have traits of character differing alike from the citizen, the gaucho, and the husbandman of the high provinces. The district of Paraguay was taken into the possession of the Spaniards from the natives, at as early period, almost, as any portion of the viceroyalty; it has a greater population, in proportion to its extent of territory, than most of the other provinces. Paraguay long had the peculiar care of the Jesuits, and has had all the benefits of their spiritual instructions. It is at once a fair sample of their skill at civilization, and of the effects of their system, the fundamental maxim of which was to exclude all strangers. The present race of Paraguays are said to be a mixture of the European Spaniards and natives with perhaps more than half Indian. They are remarkably peaceful, and taciturn in their temper and deportment. They are more industrious than the people of the other provinces, prodigiously attached to their country, or rather the place of their nativity, yield a passive obedience to the powers that be, and are much averse to strangers, to changes and new modes of every sort. They are excessively clannish; when they have heretofore visited Buenos Ayres, for the purpose of trade, it has been always remarked, that wherever the leader of the squad dealt, there all would deal, and nowhere else. It is rare to meet a Paraguay who cannot read and write, and who does not understand the rudiments of arithmetic. Yet they make no other use of this precious acquisition than to read some few homilies, and to make notes and keep accounts of their little dealings. They never apply it to the acquisition of any useful knowledge whatever. Their literature is merely elementary, and made less use of than the hieroglyphics of their progenitors of Peru. Their stern religion or more rigid habits seem to forbid them to stray from the precepts inculcated in their youth, with so alluring, so wanton, and so erratic a guide as modern philosophy; lest a perverse doubt, like an artful and suspected stranger, should seduce them from the good old ways of their ancestors. The Paraguays are generally healthy, robust men, very abstemious and sober; the great body of them are agriculturists; and their delightful country, alike suited to the growth of the productions of the temperate and torrid zones, supplies them with every necessary, and a variety of the luxuries of life. They manufacture much within themselves, get scarcely any thing from abroad, and have little intercourse with the rest of the world. It is a question which future experience must solve, whether the gay and docile, but illiterate husbandman of the Andes, or the Paraguay agriculturist, with his smattering of letters and his Jesuit habits, shall rise most rapidly from the obscurity of his colonial condition, and profit most by the revolutionary changes now in progress.

This country and these people, whose extent, situation, and character I have endeavored clearly, concisely, and fairly to delineate, were governed by the Spanish power with the coarse machine of monarchy, and according to its few and simple principles. The first magistrate of Buenos Ayres was the viceroy, who was appointed by the King of Spain; and this viceroy governed all, overruled all, and commanded all, civil and military, but the King his master. The members of the supreme tribunal of justice, called the royal audience, were also appointed by the King. And all the other officers of the Government were appointed by the viceroy or the King, or sold by him, responsible to him alone, and removable only at his pleasure.

Whenever the population of a district of country increased to such a number as to require it, or it was otherwise thought worthy of the honor, it was laid off into what was called a province, or jurisdiction, and a governor appointed over it; and if the population was increased and condensed into a town, or its inhabitants had influence with the viceroy, or the viceroy thought a spot suitable for a town, it was laid out as such, and declared to be a city; and a tribunal called a Cabildo was organized for the regulation of its police, and the administration of justice within it, and a certain district round. This ayuntamiento, Cabildo, or corporation, was composed of from six to twelve members, called regidors, according to the size of the city. The governor of the province was, ex officio, president of the Cabildo, with power to control or overrule its ordinances or decisions, in like manner as the viceroy could those of the royal audience, whenever he chose to take his seat, and act as president. The office of regidor, like most others in the Spanish Government, was venal; the price paid for it in Chili was about five hundred dollars; and I have reason to believe that in Buenos Ayres it was valued at about the same; it was held for life. Besides those to be had in the market, there were generally four other regidors, residents of the city, who were appointed by the viceroy. The alguacils, or sheriffs, and baliffs of this tribunal were venal, bought and sold at a given price, like any other merchantable commodity of the Spanish dominions. It is of these jurisdictions the present provinces of the Union have been constituted; and the Cabildos, thus organized, and which were continued by traffic, and the Chief Magistrate of the Union, for the time being, until the present form of government was adopted, are the sources, with little variation, whence sprang the existing Congress.

Besides these, there were appointed in districts too extensive for justice to be conveniently administered by the governor or the Cabildo, village or country alcaldes, or territorial justices. The jurisdiction of these officers, however, extended only to petty matters, or the apprehension of offenders; they were a sort of justices of the peace. In addition to these, there was, in the cities of Buenos Ayres and Montevideo, a tribunal called the consulado, invested with jurisdiction in commercial affairs only, from which there might be an appeal to the viceroy. These were the civil tribunals, into which the colonist entered, with his purse in one hand and his documents in the other, to seek protection and right, to ask for justice, and to obtain redress against the wrongdoer.

The right of patronage to all ecclesiastical benefices belonged exclusively to the King; but it is said there are a few unimportant livings in Buenos Ayres in the gift of individuals. All ecclesiastical affairs were cognizable only before the spiritual courts, of which each bishop had one, composed of the bishop himself, the fiscal, proctor or lawyer, and the provisor. These tribunals also were subject to the control of the viceroy.

But there was one tribunal which bore sway over all, and that was the tribunal of the holy inquisition, which had the power to fine, confiscate, imprison, hang, or burn for the offence of which the accused was convicted by it. The two viceroyalties of Buenos Ayres and Chili were subject to the jurisdiction of the holy inquisition of Lima, which tribunal appointed its commissioners in those two viceroyalties, who furnished it with information, had its process executed, and the accused sent forward for examination, trial, and suffering.

There was no tribunal, or any officer of any description whatever, emanating from the people, or appointed by them, or responsible to them, either directly or indirectly, in any manner. There was not, in the whole country, one single popular meeting allowed of, except at church for worship; or any such thing known as a legal and standing congregation of men, gathered from the people for any purpose whatever. Of all the various formal and informal means of which the people of our country have, at different times, availed themselves, to make an expression of their collected and united voices, not one of them, or any thing of the sort, ever appears to have been known in Buenos Ayres before the revolution. The people of that country appeared to have been governed with so total a disregard to their will, or with so watchful a determination that their voice should not be heard in any way, that they seemed to be strangers to the methods by which it may be collected and expressed to advantage, or not to have estimated them as they ought. The viceroy, with a suitable number of military coadjutors and underlings, took charge of the person and property, and the holy inquisition, by its commissaries, had the curacy of the mind of the humble colonist; which independent, irresponsible, and holy officers of the royal power could only be rendered merciful, or flexible, or just, by the secret but potent operations of tangible gold. The sword of the military and the faggot of the church thus executed the will of the monarch; no one dared resist; complaint was never heard; the colonist submitted in silence, suffered, and groaned inwardly.

The Spanish colonial Government of Buenos Ayres was of a character calculated to blight every hope of freedom, and make men passive and calm. Hence the people of those provinces did not begin their revolution in opposition to the oppressions of the mother country. They were not excited, like those of the United States, first to make head against the arbitrary attempts of the parent state, to claim their privileges, to declare their independence, and to resume a Government which had been abused by their transatlantic rulers. It was not until, by the great agitations of Europe, the gripe of the colonial power was loosened; until after the hand of the monarch had been by those struggles, for a time, taken off, that the colonists began to think and feel as men; not until after the people on the shores of the La Plata had been visited by a portion of the wars, and the blaze of those political conflicts of Europe, that they were aroused, and excited to seek, and to endeavor to obtain and defend their own long lost rights.

The British Government, for a long time past, appear to have had a very strong disposition to obtain a station or plant a colony on the shores of the La Plata. So early as the year 1740, the project was proposed, and the subject discussed. At the peace of Paris, in 1763, the subject was renewed, and the value of such an acquisition much urged. In the latter end of the year 1805, the expedition under Sir Home Popham made a formal attack, with a view to obtain possession of Buenos Ayres, but was driven back. And the disgraceful and unfortunate expedition under General Whitlocke, in the year 1807, appears to have quieted British notions of adding to their transmarine possessions in that quarter. At present, the British are pursuing with avidity a free, peaceful, and lucrative commerce, where, by their repeated wishes and attacks, they have failed in establishing conquest and monopoly. These attacks of the English gave the first shock to the colonial establishments of Buenos Ayres.

In the month of July, in the year 1807, a French Government vessel arrived in the river Plate with the intelligence that the old dynasty of the mother country had been pushed from the throne, and Joseph Bonaparte declared King in the place of a Bourbon. Liniers, the then viceroy of Buenos Ayres, wished to recognise the new King, and induce the people to acquiesce in the change. This, notwithstanding all their sufferings under the Bourbon line, they refused to do, drove Liniers from power, and declared their adhesion to the old dynasty, and to what they conceived to be the cause of their country. In this state of things, Cisneros came out from Spain, commissioned by the Junta of Cadiz as viceroy, and assumed the reins of government. Thus the old order of things, after having received a rude shock from the English, was thrown entirely into confusion. The British and other foreign traders, finding the old opposition removed or paralyzed, poured into the country; and the people, during these agitations and changes, began to perceive and to feel that a free commerce brought with it considerable advantages; that there were many abuses to reform; and that there was, in fact, no power in Spain which could be said to represent the Bourbon King, to whom they still were determined to adhere, notwithstanding all they had experienced and suffered.

In consequence of these agitations, to advise for the best, and restore harmony, a Junta was convened in Buenos Ayres, composed of some of the principal persons of that city, and their Cabildo. And on the 25th May, 1810, this Junta determined to take the government into their own hands until a Junta could be called and convened composed of representatives from the other provinces, into whose hands it should then be committed, until Spain should so far recover from its misfortunes as to be able to do justice to itself, and to redress the evils in the administrations of its colonies. Accordingly, Cisneros was stripped of all power, and permitted to depart in peace for Europe. This day is called the commencement of the revolution, and it is now noted among the fiestas civicas of the country as the day on which "the people of the United Provinces of the Rio de la Plata were, by a singular providence, delivered from the slavery which the Americans had suffered for three hundred years;" as the day of "the political regeneration of those provinces, by the free use of the rights of man, of which they had been despotically deprived by the Spaniards since the conquest of both Americas." There was still a hope or an expectation, however, that harmony and a union of some sort might some day be restored between them and the mother country, compatible with their freedom and self-government; which freedom from that day it became the ardent wish and determination of all good men to endeavor to obtain.

With this resolution to establish a free Government of their own, if possible, constantly present, and operating on the minds of a great and increasing majority of the people, the cause has been pushed forward with improving experience and brightening lights, amidst intrigues, and factions, and superstition, and angry passions, from a beginning where even rudiments were to be collected along a curious, crooked, and wavering line, to the present point, at which the people have finally resolved on independence, and totally renounced all prospect of returning to their allegiance to Spain. This declaration of independence was made by the Congress at Tucuman, on the 9th day of July, in the year 1816; and in the fiestas civicas of the country it stands noted as the declaration of their absolute independence, "De la declaracion de nuestra absoluta independencia." At this point the people now are where they seem to be much more disposed calmly to investigate, to learn, and impartially to decide, than their present rulers are willing to indulge the freedom of their speculations. I shall barely sketch out the path of this revolution from point to point so far, leaving the causes by which it has been impelled, and the obstacles by which it has been checked, to be more fully collected and understood from the history of the times, except so much as may be immediately necessary for the elucidation of the present state of things.

After Cisneros was displaced from the viceroyalty, in the year 1810, and compelled, with some of his adherents, natives of Spain, to embark for Europe, a Junta of seven was formed, and a General Congress was called. The Cabildos of the provinces, favorable to the cause of self-government, appointed deputies, who assembled in Buenos Ayres in the month of March of the following year; and, after a deal of altercation, were admitted as members of the Junta Provisional, of whom the historian Dean Funes, from Cordova, was one. A person named Saavedra, by intriguing with the sturdy and free-spirited gauchos of the pampas of Buenos Ayres, obtained their countenance and aid, by which means, on the 6th of April of the same year, he effected a change in the organization of the ruling power, and another set of men were placed at the helm: which change is distinguished by the name of Saavedra's revolution. On the 9th of October following, this ruling party was suppressed, many of its members imprisoned or banished, and a new one formed and placed at the head of affairs, called the triumvirate. The first triumvirs were Chicklana, Dr. Pasos, and Saratea, with Rividavia as secretary, all of Buenos Ayres. This triumvirate gave a new impulse to political movements, and caused great changes in the opinions of the people: "instead of following the public opinion for the independence and liberty of the people, it took the opinion of parties who sought to govern according to the interest of each faction." Hence jealousies, suspicions, fears, and rivalships were then sown, which have continued to rankle and grow from that to this time, and are not likely soon to be eradicated. One of them, Saratea, was sent to take the command of the patriot army at Montevideo, in the Banda Oriental, and had not been there long before he and José Artigas, who now commands that portion of the gaucho population, quarrelled. Artigas, being apprized in time of an attempt that was to be made on his person, fled to the plains, was soon followed by all the Orientals, and has been at war with Buenos Ayres, except at short intervals, ever since. Rividavia filled the seat of Saratea from the 10th of March, 1812, or thereabouts, until the 25th of May, when Pueyrredon, the present Director, arrived from the army in the high provinces as his successor, and Rividavia resumed his station as secretary until the month of July following, when, owing to some misunderstanding among the rival chiefs, Chicklana was expelled with disgrace, and Rividavia reinstated as a triumvir. This Rividavia is said to be a man of talents. He is now in France; and his object in visiting Europe is said to have been to ascertain the feelings of the monarchs of the old world toward the provinces of the new, which were struggling for independence; to see if the combined potentates could be propitiated, by concessions or otherwise, to mercy and forbearance; whether the angry principles by which they had been united would induce them to make an effort of their strength on this side of the Atlantic against the rising principles of reform; or whether they would be governed and divided by a rational view of their interests as regards the regions of the new world.

On the 9th of October of the same year, 1812, the Moreno faction overturned the triumvirate, and seized on the reins of Government. The Doctor Moreno who headed this faction was a man of a very fine and highly cultivated understanding; he died soon after, on his passage to England. The chiefs of this party were Larea, Lastelle, Pena, Asquinaga, Vieytes, and Posados, who effected the revolution by the assistance of José San Martin, now the commander-in-chief of the united army of the Andes in Chili, and Charles Alvear, who was then the colonel, and lieutenant colonel of a regiment of cavalry stationed in Buenos Ayres. Major Zapiola and Captain Igarasabel, of this regiment, being ordered by its commander to seize or destroy Pueyrredon, then a triumvir, now the Director, repaired to his house, and searched for him with naked weapons; and it is said he narrowly avoided assassination, and effected his escape in disguise, and was finally saved by remaining some time concealed. Of this party, Pena, Paso, and Jonte, were declared to be the ruling Junta, of which Pena was president. He was, after some time, displaced, and succeeded by Rondeau, who continued in office until the month of ——, when he went to take command of the army in the Banda Oriental. On representing the inconveniences attending an executive Junta, composed of three members, to the Congress, that body formed a single executive, and Posados was elected by it as Director, in December, 1813, and continued one year in office; when Lieutenant Colonel Charles Alvear was elected by the Congress to succeed him. This Alvear was a man of a bold, unbridled temper and disposition; he had been appointed by the Congress to the army of Peru; but, being rejected by the inferior officers, was obliged to relinquish that command, and return. In Buenos Ayres he quietly entered upon the duties to which he was elected. The people, however, were, from time to time, much provoked, by his highly offensive and arbitrary conduct; until, at length, roused past all forbearance, by the barbarous murder of Uvieda, a worthy citizen, on Easter Sunday night, in prison, they flew to arms, and put the city in a state of defence. The Director threatened to force his way in at the point of the bayonet, but was given to understand that his army would not obey him; and he then surrendered, under a guaranty of being permitted to embark on board a British ship then lying in the roads; and with the greatest difficulty made his way, alone and unattended, past an exasperated people, who pursued him to the boat on the shore, which the British commander sent to receive him. This man is now in Rio Janeiro, where he has taken refuge.

A Junta of the people of the city of Buenos Ayres was then summoned by sound of the Cabildo bell; which town meeting, or junta, after some warm debates, elected as Director, Colonel Ignacio Alvares, acting commander-in-chief of the troops, who had been faithful to the people, in opposition to Alvear; and, about the same time, the Congress passed an act, called the Statute Provincial, by which various restrictions were laid down to prevent abuses in the exercise of the directorial authority. The clamors of the people against Alvares, charging him with arbitrary proceedings, mismanagement, and peculation in office, caused him to resign his power on the day of the expiration of the term for which he was elected; and in April, 1815, Antonio Balcarce, now brigadier general in the united army of the Andes in Chili, was elected; and, after continuing in office about three months, was forced from his post by intrigue and faction. An executive, or government of three, was then again formed, composed of Francisco Escalada, Irregogen, and ———.

During all these various changes and revolutions there has existed a body called the representatives or deputies from the several provinces. The members of this assemblage were chosen or appointed by the Cabildos of the principal cities which had joined in the revolution; and it is said that there were instances and times when they were chosen by something like a popular election; the traces of such elections are, however, very faint and obscure, such as perhaps would not be deemed popular by the people of the United States, where the substance and outline of such elections are distinctly recollected by the very boys of the country. It does not appear that the members of this representative body were elected for any given time, or that the Cabildos, by whom they were chosen, were at all jealous of their length of service. Some of them have been members several years, some are newly elected, and others represent provinces in the possession of the enemy, who, therefore, can neither be rejected, recalled, nor re-elected by the provinces they represent. Nor does it appear that they were tenacious of the numbers sent from each province, or that they have been always the same. Buenos Ayres had only four, Mendoza two, and San Juan had two members in the Congress which met at Tucuman in 1816. Now, Buenos Ayres has seven members, and Mendoza and St. Juan only one member each; and yet the members vote in Congress numerically, and not by provinces. Nor does it appear that any stipulated, personal, or local qualification has been required. About half the body are priests; and the citizens of Buenos Ayres seem to be deemed eligible and suitable to represent any province; in consequence of which, the church and that city have always had their full influence. The body, it would seem, had changed its name almost as often as its component numbers and individuals; at first, it was called the Junta; then the Junta Provisional; then the National Constituent Assembly; and now it is styled the Sovereign Congress. Its deliberations appear to be conducted with religious solemnity and much debate; the yeas and nays are most generally recorded; yet the body is guarded by soldiery, usually negroes, deemed perfectly trustworthy; and there is neither frequent elections, nor a free press to call them to an account. Of all the passions and gales of the revolution, whose violence has broken in so many directions, this body has been struck by none. It seems to have glided on, preserving the even tenor of its way, and to have happily retained the buoyancy of its nature amidst every angry burst and threatening squall. Fortunately for itself, this august body has never undertaken to call any state delinquent to account, nor in any instance run counter to the will of the Chief Magistrate for the time being. If the Congresses of Venezuela, Mexico, and Chili, by a factious, headstrong disposition, (as has been solemnly said,) have repeatedly lost those countries to the patriot cause, no such restiveness of temper can be imputed to the Congress of Buenos Ayres; on the contrary, it has, at times, so highly respected the opinions of the people as to yield a little to a gaucho intrigue, or a town meeting, convened by the sound of a Cabildo bell.

Some of the acts of Congress have, however, been of vital importance to the best interests of the cause, and the Union. On the 9th of July, 1816, it made and promulgated a declaration of absolute independence. And thus it cast the die. The minds of the people were thus brought solemnly up, and finally fixed at that great point about which there had previously been some wavering. And in December 1817, its ordinance, called the reglamento provisorio, was ratified, establishing a temporary Government for the Union, in which is defined the forms of two popular elections; one of which, that of electing Cabildos, has since, with great ease and success, been reduced to actual practice. The form of electing members of Congress is also prescribed; but no time of election or term of service being specified, there has been no use made of the terms laid down. There have been two popular elections of Cabildos in Buenos Ayres; the first was made in 1816, when only about five hundred votes were taken; but when the same election came round, and was made, according to the provisions of the reglamento provisorio, in the year following, there were as many as three thousand five hundred votes given for the same officers. This is the first form of a popular election ever offered to the people of Spanish America; and although confined to mere police, or corporation offices, it is of great importance in its direct and indirect consequences. It is a beginning which must draw after it more valuable and efficient elections, and the whole representative system. And the great increase of votes is a proof of the readiness with which the nature and uses of the rights of franchise can be understood and adopted by any people.

The Congress which, on the 24th of March, 1816, had assembled in the city of Tucuman, elected Juan Martin Pueyrredon Supreme Director of the State; after which, it made the solemn declaration of absolute independence, and then founded the present temporary Government called the reglamento provisorio, (annexed and marked as exhibit G,*) and Pueyrredon has continued in office as Supreme Director from that time to this. By the sixth article of the first chapter of the third section of this provisional Government, it is declared that the person filling the station of Supreme Director shall continue in office until a constitution is formed, unless sooner displaced by Congress. The only check upon this loose and indefinite grant of executive power and influence, to control Congress, and postpone the formation of a constitution, is that of a residencia, designated in the ninth article of the last chapter. As this mode of responsibility by a residencia is an adoption of that by which it was intended under the colonial system, a governor or viceroy might be called to an account; and as it is wholly unlike any of the forms by which the responsibility of a public agent is secured by any of our political institutions, it may be well concisely to describe it. According to the Spanish laws of the Indies, when a viceroy or governor was removed from office, the King appointed an agent or commissioner, most commonly a lawyer of the country, to receive the residencia of the displaced officer; such commissioner accordingly repaired to the capital, and announced, in the most public manner, the time and place when and where he would be prepared to hear and determine on any complaint that might be made against the late officer, by any person, of whatever order or class, as well Indians as others. This scrutiny could only continue in the case of a governor for sixty days, and of a viceroy only six months after the date of the proclamation of its commencement; and no cause of complaint, however grievous, could be heard or inquired into, which was not made known by the commissioner of the residencia within the appointed time. This sort of impeachment of an officer, after the extinction of his functions, is not unlike the sage old Egyptian process of bringing the dead to justice. It may accord with Spanish colonial notions of calling a public functionary to account, but I should suppose it would be deemed widely different from what we should call republican responsibility.

Before the revolution there was a printing press in Buenos Ayres, whence issued a weekly newspaper, merely for the purpose of printing and publishing sundry papers and documents for the convenience of the viceroy, and under his sanction entirely. The profits of this press, for it yielded some, were given to an institution in the city of Buenos Ayres, called the Ninos Expositos, or Foundling Hospital; hence the press obtained that name. This press is still continued, and the ministerial paper, called the Buenos Ayres Gazette, issues from it weekly. There are, in all, three printing presses in Buenos Ayres, and from one or the other of them there are published four newspapers weekly. Besides these, there is a small weekly newspaper printed in Tucuman. From the second chapter of the seventh section of the reglamento provisorio, one would be induced to infer that there existed something like a freedom of the press; but nothing would be more fallacious than such an inference. The press has never been tolerated with a single day of genuine and manly freedom in Buenos Ayres. Nothing is published but what is flattering to the powers that be; nor is any thing inserted in the papers from abroad, without being curtailed or remoddelled to suit the taste of the ruling party. A few attempts have been made to discuss political subjects with severity, and to censure the political conduct of some men; the consequence of which has been, that, without ceremony, the parties have been instantly banished or imprisoned. The press of Buenos Ayres is a servile instrument, which neither has, nor merits, any respect or influence whatever. Public opinion receives its direction, and gives its impulse, not through that prostituted instrument of much good, but from books and papers read in the closet, and from verbal conversation and private discussions. And, in that manner, it has acted so efficiently as to turn a chief magistrate from his fort, or to chase a wicked Director into exile, at the very moment when this cowardly or crippled sentinel was going the rounds, and crying out all was well.

Laying aside the abstract principles contained in the reglamento provisorio, which speak for themselves, and the value of which depends on the accuracy with which they are expressed, the currency with which they are received, and the facility with which they can be applied and enforced, it appears that the Spanish code of laws, so far as it is compatible with the changes that have been made, has been adopted. This code, I take it for granted, like that of all others of the civilized nations of Europe, which has been gradually formed from that of ancient Rome, is, in the main, and in a moral point of view, a rational and excellent system. But, as to all the modes and forms of administration which give to a code the pure practical operation which its principles breathe, and which are generally understood to constitute the leading, if not sole distinctions between free and arbitrary institutions, the reglamento provisorio presents us with a beggarly account of provisions, with large exceptions, which do so allay the good precedent, and articles so pared away that there is left no bold promontory in all its coasts, behind which the storm-chased innocent skiff can take shelter from any of the gales of power. Except the case of the elections of the Cabildos, the whole is, substantially, a mere reorganization of the colonial viceroyalty. It is regarded as such in practice, and, therefore, has obtained little or none of the real respect and confidence of the people.

But the sentiments and wishes of the people, as in all similar circumstances, have had considerable sway over this newly-created Government. There is a point beyond which it dares not go; and a limit, as the numerous changes that have taken place clearly show, beyond which the forbearance of the people cannot be stretched. As the revolution has progressed, more information has been obtained; the people begin to have a correct knowledge of their rights; they are becoming more watchful, and their rulers more respectful. And, as the bounds of information are extended, the field of discussion enlarges, and the political horizon gradually clears and expands in all directions. The past changes and struggles would seem, at first view, to have been a fruitless waste of time and labor: it has not been so; the people have been instructed and improved by them. Public opinion, the pioneer and precursor of all revolutions and beneficial institutions, has been ripening, and the crisis is rapidly approaching when another and a firmer step will be taken, assisted by the newly-acquired lights and helps. More of the old system will be removed, and such institutions will be introduced as will furnish some practical evidence at home of the benefits of civil and political freedom, and the work of the revolution will approach its consummation. This crisis will be considerably accelerated by the present state of the provinces, their murmurings and civil wars; to pacify which, and for their own welfare and safety, it has obviously become necessary to make an entire change, and to introduce a new order of things. The voice of the people must and will be heard.

On inquiring for the causes of these unfortunate differences and hostilities among the several patriot causes, and after removing from about them all that mere vituperation and angry invective with which they have been too much mingled and confused, they will be found to be of vital importance; to have for their object principles materially affecting the good of the people, and to have originated in very rational views as to a frame of government best suited to their country, and which was most likely to promote and secure its general as well as its particular interests. The people of this part of Spanish America have, from the commencement of their struggles, looked towards the example and the precepts of the United States in the management of their revolution and the organization of their political institutions.

Without, in general, entering into any profound arguments or deep speculations, for which, from their previous education and habits, they were utterly unprepared, they took a view of their own situation en masse; they saw themselves, by the removal of the colonial institutions, almost at a single blow divested of every implement of civil government. They looked over the immense extent of their country, and saw that it had been cut up into provinces and jurisdictions, and in that manner governed. They then turned their eyes towards the United States, and saw, or thought they saw, many analogies, and a prosperity which evinced that all they beheld was worth copying. But whether these suggestions were made from such a comparative view, or from the nature of things, or from whatever other cause, the idea and utility of separate state Governments in each province, like those of the United States, with magistrates selected by its own people from among themselves, became very general, and was warmly embraced by a great portion of the patriots. This party, however, in favor of the system of confederation and representation, whatever might be its numerical strength, or the force of its reasonings, were, as they now are, by much the weakest in point of actual power and operation; because they had not the means, nor have ever been allowed to exhibit any examples of their principles; and, besides, they were obliged to address themselves to a people to whom the entire field of politics was a novelty; and they had no press to give stability and currency to their arguments. In opposition to those principles and this party, there arose a faction in Buenos Ayres, who, looking attentively to the interests and the aggrandizement of that city, wished to establish a consolidated Government under a Chief Magistrate invested with powers analogous to those of the late viceroy; but somewhat bridled and controlled with a revival of the political and civil institutions of the colony, so modified as to suit the existing state of things. And the general impression of the necessity of being constantly armed and prepared to meet the hostilities of the metropolis induced the people to yield a ready obedience to their military leaders for the time being. Hence, to get the command of the army, and take possession of the fort in Buenos Ayres, has hitherto been the same thing as a complete revolution. It has at once placed in the hands of such a chief the revenues; because Buenos Ayres has been the sole point of collecting all the customs, all the forces, and the entire command of the state, the affairs of which could be wielded and managed at pleasure by such a Chief Magistrate, according to the forms of the colonial institutions. While, on the other hand, the opposing popular party which advocated state Governments, and the representative system, never have, as yet, had any forms or means by which they could gather together and express their wishes, or even make a show of their numbers and power.

In October, 1812, while Saratea commanded in chief at Montevideo, and Artigas, before the same place, commanded the forces of the Banda Oriental, this great principle of separate state or provincial Governments, interwoven, as it very probably was, with personal and local considerations, gave rise to a heated controversy between them. Saratea, finding Artigas to be refractory, and unmanageable by temptations, threats, or persuasions, determined to have him arrested. Artigas, being apprized of this design, fled to the plains, and in a short time all the Orientals followed; in consequence of which, the further prosecution of the siege of Montevideo, at that time, was abandoned. The ruling party of Buenos Ayres, perceiving the popularity of the cause of Artigas, and his power, became extremely anxious to win him over, or at least to conciliate him. At the request of Artigas, therefore, who then thought, or affected to believe, that his controversy with Saratea was merely personal, Saratea and some others were removed from the command of the army, and his place was filled by Rondeau, and other officers put in command, whose principles, being unknown, were, therefore, not so obnoxious to the Oriental chief. But at the same time, Artigas followed up the controversy, and tested the designs of the Government of Buenos Ayres, by demanding, in form, that the Banda Oriental should be considered and treated as a state under its own government, and, as such, should be left to regulate its own concerns for itself, and be represented in due form and proportion in a General Congress. This was treated by Buenos Ayres as an open dereliction of the standard of the country; and a most unreasonable, criminal, and declared rebellion against the only legitimate Government of the union of all the provinces, which, as it contended, extended over the whole territory that had been subject to the late viceroyalty; of which the city of Buenos Ayres always had been, of right was then, and always ought to be, the capital, whence alone all authority should emanate. This Artigas opposed, and denounced as the assertion of a spirit of unjust and unreasonable domination on the part of Buenos Ayres, to which he could not, and would not submit. The parties were heated, reason was silenced, liberality banished, and they repaired from the field of argument to the field of battle. Artigas, either from an indisposition to push matters to the greatest extremity, from policy, or from a sense of his own inferiority in point of strength, has hitherto acted on the defensive, and confined himself within the territory of the Banda Oriental, or of the Entre Rios, since it has taken sides with his cause. It is said that, in this controversy, there have already been fought fifteen or sixteen sharp battles, in each of which conflicts Buenos Ayres has been defeated, and suffered severely. In the last, which was fought about the 1st of April last, near Santa Fé, on the northeastern side of the Paraguay, there were of the Buenos Ayres army, which was about nineteen hundred strong, eight hundred left dead on the field of battle, and the rest dispersed, so that the whole army may be said to have been extinguished at a blow. This fatal catastrophe was heard in silent gloom at Buenos Ayres; not a syllable about it was uttered from the press, yet all seemed to lament the policy by which it had been brought about, or rendered unavoidable.

Until the year 1814 the province of Santa Fé, or the district of country called Entre Rios, had a representative in the Congress of Buenos Ayres. Since that time it has withdrawn itself from the Union, and sided with Artigas and the people of the Banda Oriental. This change and desertion of the standard of the country are charged by the Government of Buenos Ayres to the intrigues and seductive principles of Artigas; but, if Artigas has been practising his arts with the people of Santa Fé, the acts of Buenos Ayres have most powerfully seconded his designs. By adverting to the situation of the population of the Union, and the various paths of internal commerce through it, by land and by water, it will be seen how very advantageously Santa Fé is situated as a port of entry and great depot for all the country to the west and north of it. As such it had opened itself; and commerce began to flow into it, when Buenos Ayres interposed, and declared that no trade should go to Santa Fé but what passed through the city of Buenos Ayres itself. This odious and unjust monopoly was at once revolting to the minds of the people of Entre Rios, and a proof of the correctness of the principles contended for by Artigas. They therefore abandoned Buenos Ayres, and are now the allies of Artigas.

In the year 1810 the Government of Buenos Ayres sent a force of five hundred men, under the command of General Belgrano, up to the province of Paraguay, to expel the royal authorities, and to introduce that province under the Government of the Union. But the people of Paraguay rejected the proffered Buenos Ayres auxiliaries. After some time, however, they of themselves expelled the Spanish authorities; and, refusing to submit either to a Spanish or a patriot viceroy, or chief planted in any way at Buenos Ayres, they attempted to establish a government of their own; and, from thenceforward until the present time, they have absolutely renounced and forbidden all intercourse or trade with Buenos Ayres. No active hostilities appear, however, to have been carried on as yet between these two provinces.

The Government of the people of the Banda Oriental and Entre Rios, since their alliance, has been altogether in the hands of Artigas, who rules by his will alone, like an absolute monarch, without attendant guards, or an Indian cusique. No frame of constitution is exhibited; none is pretended to exist. Justice is rendered voluntarily, or is administered according to the mandate of the chief.

In Paraguay the reins of government are held by Francias, who, it is said, makes a show of administering all political and civil affairs in the manner, and according to the forms, of the consular Government of ancient Rome.

The two powerful provinces of Cordova and Santiago del Estero have both been in rebellion against the ruling power of Buenos Ayres, which has charged Cordova with being a very godo, or tory province, and both of them with being seduced into an unnatural desertion of the cause of liberty by the arts and intrigues of Artigas. But Cordova has lost by the revolution its very profitable mule trade, the nature of which I have described, and both have suffered heavy contributions; and all their resources have been made tributary to the Buenos Ayres monopoly, and to sustain its pre-eminence. They have both been brought back by force of arms under the Union, and are now silent and passive. In short, it cannot nor ought it to be concealed that the ruling party of Buenos Ayres has managed the affairs of the Union in such a strain of domineering monopoly as to retard reform, delay the progress of the revolution, and to render the most patriotic provinces extremely dissatisfied. Mendoza occasionally murmurs, and San Juan is very much discontented with the present state of affairs; and the people of those two provinces heretofore most attached to the Union, begin to speak openly, and in sharp terms, of the domineering, monopolizing temper and conduct of Buenos Ayres.

Of the one million and eighty thousand souls which the late viceroyalty of Buenos Ayres has been estimated to contain, it will be seen, by the details I have furnished, that four hundred and eighty-three thousand, including Jujuy, are all that acknowledge themselves subject to the present Government of Buenos Ayres; that the patriot provinces at war with Buenos Ayres contain a population (exclusive of Indians) of one hundred and eighty thousand souls; and that so many of the high provinces in which there have been any revolutionary movements as contain four hundred and seventeen thousand souls, are at this time and have some of them been continually under the colonial yoke. The patriot provinces of Salta and Jujuy have been the chief seat of war from the commencement of the revolution. The royal army was once in possession of Salta, which is now the head-quarters of the patriot forces under Belgrano. And the patriot army was once so successful as to penetrate as far towards Lima as the city of Chayanta, in the province of Charcas; but they gave back from thence, and the Spanish army is now, it is said, in the possession of the city of Jujuy.

Such is the extent, nature, and circumstances of this new and revolutionary Union. The present bonds which hold it together are temporary in name, and more so in their nature. A final declaration of independence has been made; the people have renounced all expectation of a compromise with Spain; and the separation has been resolved on amidst such imbittering severities and cruelties, that any kind of return to their former allegiance is utterly impossible and impracticable. The expectation of reconquest is no less vain; and, to be convinced of it, it is only necessary to view the country, and reflect a few moments on its nature, and the situation and character of its inhabitants.
